THERE can be no doubt that Signor Salvini's reputation as an actor has been greatly lowered by the performances he has lately given at Covent Garden. He has been seen in three new parts during the present visit, and each has done something towards destroying his claim to be regarded as an actor of the first rank. With Signor Salvini's Lear we have already dealt. It was at best poor; but his Macbeth is poorer still, and more disappointing because in all externals, and more especially in his resonant voice, an ideal Macbeth is presented. The Italian player has brutalized the character of Othello and misunderstood the character of Hamlet—nothing further removed from the Hamlet of Shakspeare than Signor Salvini in his conduct of the wager with Laertes can easily be imagined. It is not surprising that Hamlet is not announced for representation during the present visit. His study of what he conceives to be the Macbeth of Shakspeare is merely a crude and clumsy outline. It is a part magnificently rich in suggestion. Few responsible actors have played Macbeth without throwing at least one or two fresh gleams of light upon the poet's creation; but Signor Salvini never passes beyond the merest commonplace. His remarks on the tragedy, in his lately published essays on Shakspearian characters, show no insight into what he says "is rightly considered the masterpiece of the great English poet"; and, masterpiece as he declares it to be, there is one thing in Macbeth which seemed to him "a matter of surprise." This is "that the sleep-walking scene was assigned to Lady Macbeth rather than to Macbeth himself." This naïve observation from a representative of Macbeth may perhaps tend to show how it is that the performance of the part falls so lamentably short. He obviously fails to understand how all-important is the share which Lady Macbeth has in the dread events at Inverness. The speech beginning, "Glamis thou art, and Cawdor," may well be recommended to Signor Salvini's attention, as also a later utterance of Macbeth himself:—

> We will proceed no further in this business:
> He hath honour'd me of late; and I have bought
> Golden opinions from all sorts of people,
> Which would be worn now in their newest gloss,
> Not cast so soon aside.

So Macbeth speaks; and his "Prythee, peace," to his wife's bitterly contemptuous answer might serve to convince Signor Salvini, if he would study the tragedy as a whole, that Lady Macbeth is the moving spirit of the work, and that in showing how her mind became unhinged as she vehemently pursued her desperate enterprise, Shakspeare was following to the end one of his most terribly truthful pictures of evil life. One can hardly write with patience of Signor Salvini's primly satirical little suggestion that, "Had the part been written in our time, the presumption would be"—the scene having been originally composed for Macbeth—"that the change was made at the caprice of some charming actress who did not find the part assigned to her sufficiently important." It is, perhaps, not worth while to inquire what end, in Signor Salvini's opinion, should have come to the character of Lady Macbeth. She it was who feared her husband's nature as being "too full o' the milk of human kindness to catch the nearest way." She it is who says,

> Hie thee hither,
> That I may pour my spirits in thine ear,
> And chastise with the valour of my tongue
> All that impedes thee from the golden round.

She is primarily guilty. No actor can rightly understand the character of Macbeth without rightly understanding the character of Lady Macbeth. Her "undaunted mettle" carries all before it when she has decided on the first horrible crime, and it revives when, at the supper where Banquo's ghost appears, Macbeth is terror-stricken; but (in a passage omitted from the Italian translation) it is seen that before this remorse has begun to overtake Lady Macbeth. When left to herself, crowned Queen, what are her words?—

> Nought's had, all's spent,
> Where our desire is got without content:
> 'Tis safer to be that which we destroy,
> Than by destruction dwell in doubtful joy.

This is her state of mind, nor can it be supposed that the fit is strange to her. When her courage comes again she bids her husband "Be bright and jovial among your guests to-night," and he replies, "So shall I, love; and so, I pray, be you." She is not always thus. The "undaunted mettle" has become feebler; it is he who must now strengthen and inspirit her, weakened by dwelling on desire got without content. She can no longer bear the apprehension of new crimes:—

> Be innocent of the knowledge, dearest chuck,
> Till thou applaud the deed.

Macbeth says, when he has dimly spoken of Banquo's approaching murder, and she has asked "What's to be done?" Thus the way is paved for the wonderful scene in which Lady Macbeth's mental agony is laid bare—a scene without which, as demonstrating how retribution overwhelms the head and front of Macbeth's offending, the tragedy would be incomplete. Conscience will not be stifled. Se judice nemo nocens absolvitur. In face of Shakspeare's working out of inexorable fate, Signor Salvini's supposition that the sleep-walking scene was transferred for the sake of some pretty actress whose part was not long enough to please her, surely tends conclusively to prove that the Italian actor is totally in the dark with regard to Shakspeare's Macbeth.

The art of soliloquy is altogether beyond Signor Salvini. He recites, with what is intended to be appropriate action. In the Dagger soliloquy, for example, the passage occurs—and, with a view to emphasizing the line, when he speaks of his eyes, he rubs them. How ludicrously prosaic this appears need not be said. Worse still, if possible, is the delivery of the line "E quell' Amen restommi entro la strozza." Here he absolutely rehearses to the wife the futile efforts he made to pronounce the "Amen." That after he has staggered up the steps to the door of his chamber to wash the blood from his hands he should return and bow in answer to the applause is neither more nor less than might have been expected from such a Macbeth. The absurdity of causing Banquo's ghost to hide under the table, hidden by the cloth, and affably to retire under the table again to make room for Macbeth, has been commented on. The omission of the lines, spoken by the Witch, which say that Macbeth "stands amazedly" after seeing the apparitions of future Scottish kings, whereas Signor Salvini is pleased to make his Macbeth faint and fall on the ground, has also been properly criticized. Macbeth was enraged at what the filthy hags showed him to "grieve his heart," but he was a man not given to fainting, and besides he had derived much comfort from the Apparitions.

> O che ludibrio
> Son gli occhi miei degli altri sensi—

> Be bloody, bold, and resolute; laugh to scorn
> The power of man, for none of woman born > Shall harm Macbeth.

This is what the Second Apparition had said, and the Third was also rich in "sweet bodements." Why, then, should Macbeth faint? There is no warrant for it, and as a stage trick it is poor, as Macbeth has to recover himself immediately and rise to call Lennox in. In the fifth act, the scenes of which are oddly jumbled up, Signor Salvini is wholly inadequate. There is not one single note of pathos in those infinitely pathetic speeches: "I have lived long enough," and "She should have died hereafter." There is not even what was to have been looked for from Signor Salvini, fierceness and terror in his wrath. Power, passion, pathos are alike wholly absent. To sum up. In the first act Signor Salvini, by his figure and bearing as well as by his delivery of the first lines—but only as a question of vocal effect—makes a highly favourable impression. From that point to the end of the tragedy he steadily strengthens the conviction that he is utterly incompetent to interpret the character of Macbeth. Injustice has been done to the support which Signor Salvini receives. The representation is felt to be unsatisfactory, and some writers have been far too prone to assume that the fault lies with the rank and file, or rather with the field officers of the general. It is not so. Signor Udina's Macduff, noisy and restless as it was, came certainly as near to Shakspeare as did the Macbeth of the leading player; and in the sleep-walking scene Signora T. Piamonti played with extraordinary force. There was something almost painfully intense in the deep breathing of the sleeping woman, of the woman who in fact was dying, as she stealthily strove to cleanse her hands; and the fixed glazed eyes were completely in keeping. The effect of an admirably played scene was of course utterly destroyed when the lady smilingly reappeared to acknowledge the applause she had well deserved. The stage management generally is disgraceful, and the fight between the opposing armies is a survival of Richardson's show.

Giacommetti's play La Morte Civile was given last week, and announced for repetition, but the announcement has been withdrawn—a significant occurrence. In the Salvini pamphlet, which unhappily experience has taught readers to distrust, comment is made on the "eloquent appreciation" this drama has received, and one French gentleman, who left the theatre "literally exhausted with emotion," found Signor Salvini "simply sublime." An exhausted critic is not, perhaps, to be implicitly depended upon; at any rate we wish the criticism did not so irresistibly suggest the lines of Ariosto:—

> Se non voléa pulir sua scusa tanto,
> Che la facesse di menzogna rea.

A duller play than La Morte Civile has rarely been written in three acts; and this is in five. The gloom is unrelieved. It is a story of an escaped convict, Conrado, who finds his wife and daughter, after an absence of fourteen years, domiciled with a Dr. Palmieri, who has assumed the paternity of the child, and desires to marry the child's mother. Conrado's return is a most unwelcome episode, and having grasped this unpleasant truth, Conrado dies, whether of poison or not the spectator is not informed. The husband's sin would be reckoned a venial one among the hot-blooded Southerners—the scene is laid in Calabria. He has been sorely persecuted by his wife's family; they have sought to take her from him, and he has killed her brother. There might well be some dignity about the husband who has avenged what he held to be a cruel wrong; but the Conrado of Signor Salvini is a feeble, lachrymose creature, who, so far from being pathetic, is at times actually grotesque. When a great actor has been on the stage one can rarely tell what he has worn; but the baggy suit of velveteen which Signor Salvini wears in the play is felt to be worse than unsightly. The attenuated plot drags its slow length along. Some of the speeches are of preposterous length. Something very touching might be made out of the character of the man who eagerly longs for his home, returns unexpectedly to it, and finds that he is an incumbrance; but Signor Salvini only succeeds in being very wearisome and monotonous. Here his voice and physique tell for nothing, and his admitted knowledge of stage resource finds no opportunity of application, at least until the death, which is elaborately treated till the final moment, when Conrado, the victim of some vague disease, suddenly doubles forward and falls from the chair in which he is sitting, head first to the ground. Signor V. Udina gave such support as was possible in the part of Palmieri. The adaptation of La Morte Civile, played a few years back at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, was more effective than the original—perhaps, for one reason, because it was shorter—and the general representation, including the performance of the principal character by Mr. Coghlan, was much superior on the English stage.

DAN'L DRUCE.

THE revival of Dan'l Druce at the Court last week was interesting in many ways. There was the natural curiosity of the public to witness Miss Fortescue's return to the stage, and her assumption of a part so entirely different from her former experience, and there was the opportunity of seeing Mr. Hermann Vezin resume one of his most striking characters. The part of Dorothy Druce, although not remarkably exacting, demands great self-restraint and repose of style. Its importance is due rather to its being the one female character in the play than to any strong individuality. Dorothy Druce has been educated according to the strictest Puritan code; her emotions have been governed, her passions chastened, by the continual exercise of repression, and when she attains womanhood her placidity of temper and habitual decorum are the natural fruit of this training. This conception is realized by Miss Fortescue with thorough consistency and nature. In the second act, when Geoffry Wynyard tells his love, the struggle between her affection and that self-control which with her has the force of religious principle is admirably portrayed. There is no touch of excess in her emotion, no distemperature, no warmth; it is suffered only momentarily to thaw her suddenly reserve. When her lover forecasts the future and pictures a hypothetical case with the design of testing her affection, her love and awakened jealousy are charmingly indicated without ever imperilling the integrity of her nature; her pure serenity is ruffled, but the depths are unstirred. This reticence of passion, so excellent in the scene with her lover, is a little misplaced in the last act, where the heartbroken Dan'l Druce leaves her to the care of Sir Jasper Combe. Here Miss Fortescue is a little cold and constrained, and fails to exhibit the perplexity of conflicting duties and the poignancy of grief; the situation is not grasped, and her failure to realize its significance is not accounted for by any expression of bewilderment or anguish. It would, however, be mere cynicism to ascribe the applause that greeted the actress at the close of the drama wholly to the impulsive generosity of the public. However Miss Fortescue's promotion may have been accelerated by recent events, her impersonation of Dorothy Druce must be allowed to be excellent in many respects. Here is not a case of "greatness thrust"; thus to designate her sudden advancement is to discount in some measure her performance in the present instance and to detract from its promise for the future.

Mr. Hermann Vezin's powerful rendering of Dan'l Druce is endowed with all its old unforgotten excellences. In pathos his range of expression is finely displayed in two well-contrasted situations. When the blacksmith surprises the lovers and listens to Dorothy's hesitating explanation, the solemn tone of his ejaculations "Well?" and "Go on" reveals his sense of approaching misery with masterly effect; the voice is eloquent with apprehension, and the slight words are burdened with anguish. Again, when he tears himself from Dorothy, the cry that bursts from his lips is like the ultimate expression of his long-pent agony, startling the ear with its appalling intensity. The Sir Jasper Combe of Mr. John Clayton is distinguished by force and dignity. In the last act the gradual awakening to the terrible truth, his horror on being confronted with the past, his overwhelming passion of remorse are very forcibly depicted, while his farewell words are delivered with an affecting and profound fervour. The humours of Mr. Mackintosh as Reuben Haines, the Royalist sergeant, are quaint and entertaining; but he plays too much in the spirit of Touchstone. The character is of the fantastic species Mr. Gilbert delights in—a little unreal, and not helpful in establishing an historical ensemble. Mr. Charles Hawtrey plays the sailor, Geoffry Wynyard, in a spiritless manner, and with a strange lack of spontaneity and freshness.

Mrs. John Wood and Mr. Arthur Cecil appear in a lively little piece by Mr. G. W. Godfrey called My Milliner's Bill, which is animated by the frolicsome spirit of burlesque. The burlesque element consists in a playful suggestion of Miss Mary Anderson's Comedy and Tragedy and Mrs. John Wood's racy song, "His heart was true to Poll." The piece is played with the utmost vivacity, and receives the fullest interpretation. Mrs. John Wood's singing and Mr. Arthur Cecil's impersonation of a bailiff elicit unbounded applause. My Milliner's Bill inculcates a timely lesson, and, as Dryden said of one of his most censured plays, "the moral is excellent, if well considered."

RECITALS AND ENTERTAINMENTS.

MR. CLIFFORD HARRISON'S fifth recital at the Steinway Hall last Saturday fully sustained our former impressions. On this occasion Mr. Harrison's rendering of Macaulay's Virginia was not only a fine piece of declamation, excellent in elocution and propriety of action; it exhibited those higher qualities of spiritual interpretation to which we have before referred, the subtle and delicate touches which afford fresh insight into the poet's work and extend the horizon of comprehension. The spirited address of Virginius to the people was delivered with impassioned force, and the pathos of his farewell to Virginia was natural and eloquent; the chief excellence of the recitation, however, lies in the comprehensive skill with which the whole scene is portrayed. With true dramatic feeling Macaulay imagines the reciter of the ballad to have been an eye-witness of what he describes; Mr. Harrison emphasizes this with great effect, and successfully preserves the illusion. The sacrifice, the craven face of Appius, the surging mob, the hustled lictors, and all the circumstances of the terrible drama are powerfully presented. Among other items of a varied programme Longfellow's King Robert of Sicily and a reading from Vanity Fair deserve commendation. The poem was interpreted with admirable discrimination; the fury of the dethroned monarch, his bitter penance, the tender and lofty sentiment of his repentance and victory, were rendered with great mastery of expression.

At the Piccadilly Hall the first of a series of recitals by Mr. G. A. Lubimoff, a Russian actor, was given last Saturday. The entertainment is varied by music; the vocalists being Miss Hesketh, Miss Delforce, and Mr. Sinclair Dunn. Mr. Lubimoff's powers were displayed to greater advantage in his French and Italian recitations than in English; his rendering of The Dream of Eugene Aram, though very vigorous and not without merit, was exaggerated and uneven. His recital of M. Coppée's La Grève des Forgerons displayed considerable elocutionary skill and genuine dramatic gifts; the appeal of the prisoner to the judge was given with concentrated force and feeling.

THE PROBABLE SURPLUS.

NOW that we have before us the returns of revenue and expenditure for the first forty-nine weeks of the current financial year, we are in a position to make an approximately correct forecast of the statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to lay before Parliament next month. It seems clear that the results he will have to announce will be highly satisfactory. Mr. Childers, in fact, took care last April to secure a surplus. It was evident to all competent judges that, unless there occurred some extremely untoward accident to put out all calculations, he had very greatly under-estimated the revenue. The opinion to that effect expressed by ourselves and others is already justified by the event. Up to Saturday night last the actual receipts amounted to 81,936,199*l.* To realize Mr. Childers's estimate there remained to be received only 4,613,000*l.*, while there were still three weeks and a day to be accounted for. During the ten weeks of the current calendar year then elapsed the receipts had averaged 2,157,000*l.* per week; and if this rate is maintained for the three weeks and a day still to be accounted for, there will be received up to the end of March an additional sum of 6,831,000*l.*, raising the total for the year to a little over 88½ millions. This would give an excess over Mr. Childers's estimate of not far short of 2¼ millions. Last week, it is true, the amount got in was considerably less than the average for the ten weeks. But even at last week's rate the receipts for the year would exceed Mr. Childers's estimate by 1,645,000*l.* The rate of a single week, however, cannot be taken as a basis of calculation, for necessarily there are fluctuations from week to week. On the other hand, there seems no reason why the average kept up since New Year's Day should not be maintained for the remaining three weeks. In any case it may safely be assumed, we think, that Mr. Childers's estimate will be exceeded by nearly, if not quite, two millions. Turning now to the expenditure, we find that up to Saturday night last it amounted to no more than 77,395,529*l.* When introducing the Budget in April last, Mr. Childers estimated the expenditure at a little over 85¾ millions. But the cost of the Soudan Expedition and other supplementary estimates have raised the total estimate of expenditure to nearly 87 millions. If we were to assume that this latter estimate would be realized, there would still remain over 9½ millions to be laid out. It is, however, improbable that the total estimate will be reached. Every year there are supplementary estimates; but it is found that, as a rule, savings in one or another direction counterbalance these supplementary estimates. It is not to be anticipated that the savings will counterbalance the expense of the Soudan Expedition. But the other supplementary estimates may reasonably be left out of account. If the Vote of Credit for the Soudan Expedition is not exceeded, the expenditure would be roughly about 86,300,000*l.*; while, as already pointed out, the receipts will probably not fall much short of 88½ millions, perhaps may be more. Even if the rate of collection is not as high during the three weeks still to be accounted for as during the past ten weeks, we may still reasonably expect an actual surplus of nearly two millions at the end of the year, always assuming, of course, that the expenditure on the Soudan Expedition is not greatly swelled and that no other large outlay is incurred. And it seems hardly possible that in two or three weeks that expenditure can be so much increased as seriously to affect the surplus. Apparently, therefore, we may conclude that the surplus can hardly be less than 1½ million, and may reach 2¼ millions, the most probable amount being between those extremes.

It will be seen from the foregoing that Mr. Childers took effectual measures for securing a handsome surplus, and a brief examination of details will make this plainer, as it will show that he did not remit as much taxation as he might have done last April, and that he concealed the fact by under-estimating his income. In fairness to him it must be borne in mind that he was new to his office, and that, if he were to err, it was better to err by over-caution. It may be, too, that even then he was contemplating a large operation, for whose success a handsome surplus was necessary. However this may be, he certainly under-estimated. For example, he estimated that the miscellaneous revenue would fall off, compared with last year, as much as 880,000*l.* This revenue last year, it is true, was exceptionally productive, but still to the well informed it appeared incredible that there could be so sudden and large a falling off. As, however, that revenue is made up of a great number of items, it was impossible to effectually challenge his estimate. It turns out now that within three weeks of the end of the financial year the total decrease in the miscellaneous revenue amounts to no more than 438,000*l.*, barely half what Mr. Childers estimated it would be last April. Of course there may yet be the diminution anticipated, but it seems unlikely. Again, Mr. Childers estimated that there would be a falling off in the Post Office and Telegraph revenues of 170,000*l.* As an actual fact, there is so far an increase of 351,000*l.* Lastly, he estimated that the reduction of the Income-tax by three-halfpence in the pound would cause a loss to the Exchequer of 2,135,000*l.*; but so far the loss has not exceeded 214,000*l.* It is only fair to admit that this latter result has surprised all observers. Neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor anybody else could have anticipated that the yield of a 5*d.* Income-tax would so nearly equal that of a 6¼*d.* tax. That he over-estimated the probable falling off was clear enough; but that the productiveness of the tax should have been so well maintained is certainly surprising. It is to be expected, indeed, that there will be a large falling off in the three weeks yet to be accounted for; but it is not likely to reach Mr. Childers's estimate. This seems to prove that the condition of trade is very much better than it would be supposed to be from the loud complaints we hear from people in business. It may be, no doubt, that the taxpayers give more conscientious returns of their incomes when the tax is low than when it is high; but a reduction of three-halfpence in the pound cannot make so great a difference as the figures cited prove. Here and there needy persons may be induced to underrate their incomes when an addition is made to the tax; but the general bulk of the taxpayers would hardly so greatly understate their incomes on account of so small an increase as would be necessary were that the cause of the phenomenon. The real explanation must be that the country is far more prosperous than it is the fashion just now to admit. Income-tax payers generally would not go on paying the tax on large incomes unless those large incomes were received. And large incomes could not be received if agriculture and trade were so depressed as they are represented to be. That trade is better than it is alleged to be seems also to be proved by the Customs and Excise duties. Up to Saturday night last Customs show a falling off of 60,000*l.*, while Excise show an increase of 62,000*l.*; so that the two together give an increase of 2,000*l.* compared with the corresponding period of last year. Stamps also give satisfactory results. The reduction of the railway-passenger duty was estimated by Mr. Childers to cause a loss to the Exchequer of 135,000*l.*; and, up to Saturday night last, the loss has been 158,000*l.*—somewhat larger than the estimate. No small part of the stamp revenue, however, is received from Stock Exchange transactions; and, as we all know, speculation on the Stock Exchange has collapsed during the past twelve months. Since, then, speculation has not kept up this special revenue, the bonâ fide business of the country must have been fully maintained. Thus we receive additional proof of the sound condition of the country.

As only one of the estimates for the coming year have yet been issued, it is impossible to foresee whether there will be much increase of expenditure. If, however, we may judge from the Army Estimates which have been published, the increase will not be large. And, as it may be assumed that next year there will be the normal increase in the revenue from the growth of population and wealth, it is probable that the surplus to be disposed of will not be far short of two millions; though this amount, of course, depends, firstly, upon the course of events in the Soudan; and, secondly, upon the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government in Egypt. If the operations in the Soudan should be protracted, and should assume larger proportions than are now contemplated, the expenditure might be considerably increased. So, again, if Mr. Gladstone should relieve the pressure upon the Egyptian finances by imposing upon this country the charge for the army of occupation, there would be another augmentation of our expenditure. Lastly, it is possible expenditure may be incurred in other directions. But, if the operations in the Soudan are speedily brought to an end, and if the cost of the army of occupation continues to be defrayed by Egypt, Mr. Childers will have a surplus of at least one million and a half to dispose of. This would enable him to reduce the Income-tax by a penny. But it is doubtful whether that would be the best course to adopt. We have already entered into a provisional arrangement with Spain, pledging ourselves to a reduction of the wine duty; and whether that arrangement is carried out or not, the demand for a modification of the wine duties is urged strongly on the Government by our own wine-producing colonies, and by all the foreign wine-producing countries. It is possible, therefore, that Mr. Childers may decide upon a considerable reduction of the wine duties. If so, he may deem it expedient to deal also with the spirit duties, and thus to effect a considerable reform in our system of taxation generally. Should he do so, he may perhaps decide upon carrying further the changes began by Sir Stafford Northcote and continued by Mr. Gladstone, in respect to the probate duties. All this would involve a change of great magnitude, and would render it desirable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have at his disposal a considerable surplus. Whether the surplus now in view would be large enough for the undertaking depends, of course, upon the extent of the changes to be made, and upon whether Mr. Childers sees his way to making up in some directions for the loss that would be incurred in others. But Mr. Childers may decide upon leaving these financial reforms over for another year, and may at once attempt in a tentative way a reduction of the interest upon the National Debt. The price of the new Two and a Half per Cents. is now about 6 per cent. higher than that of Consols in proportion to the interest yielded by both. The public, therefore, is evidently prepared for an early reduction of the interest on the debt; and Mr. Childers may think it desirable to anticipate a compulsory reduction by proposing a scheme of voluntary conversion. It may be said that the price of Consols is not yet high enough to encourage such a measure; but, if the conversion were left optional, no harm could be done; while the Government would be afforded a means of feeling the pulse of the market for the public funds. It is, for many reasons, desirable that the amount of Two and a Half per Cents. in the hands of the public should be increased. Dealers on the Stock Exchange never like to enter into transactions in a stock of very small amount, in which they cannot be sure of always being able to buy or sell when necessary. The larger, therefore, the new stock is made, the freer will be the market in it, and the more easy, therefore, will it be for the Government by and by to carry out its conversion of Consols. That the conversion must come in the course of a very few years is inevitable, provided we are not involved in a great war. And since this is so, it seems desirable that the way should be made smooth for the great operation that is coming.

REVIEWS.

GREAT books sometimes undergo strange fates at the hands of editors and improvers. Not more than half-a-dozen years ago, a misguided enthusiast, with the countenance of one of our most distinguished literary critics, set himself to shear away the redundancies of garrulous James Boswell of Auchinleck, to dock his parts of speech, and to compress his portly proportions within the compass of a measurable volume. The result, it is consolatory to reflect, was not successful, at all events with the critics. Compilations of this kind, however adroitly manipulated, are the Compressed Extract of literature. Certificates from the highest authorities may assure us that they are nourishing; but we can never quite persuade ourselves that they are palatable. Their native flavour seems gone; and, in its place, is a something that we vaguely associate with the commercial odours of the warehouse or manufactory. But in this maltreatment of masterpieces there are other evils besides compression—there is expansion; and to this, too, Boswell, in what has long passed for his best edition, has likewise been subjected. The late John Wilson Croker, for example, dealt with his author's work in the most conquering and arbitrary manner. Into the body of the book, as he received it from Malone and Chalmers—the former of whom had many sterling editorial recommendations—he foisted the entire "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," which had been published in separate form; inserted letters here and there; made text into notes and notes into text; and, as a rule, altered and omitted as it seemed good in his eyes. Of some of these curious vagaries he appears to have tardily repented; for, in his second edition, he withdrew from the text all the extracts from other works which he had before incorporated with it; and there is, therefore, no necessity at present, as Boswell's latest editor puts it in fine old crusted eighteenth-century phrase, for "castigating the mossic" of his first misdeeds. His penitence, however, was only partial. The Scotch Tour and the Welsh Tour were still left to dislocate the narrative; some letters not included in the original were retained; and, under Mr. Croker's direction (for Mr. Wright superintended this issue of 1835), another unjustifiable alteration was made—the book, which had been continuous, was broken up into chapters. There are some organizations, we believe, which, upon division and subdivision, become separate individualities. But this is not true of books; and it is obviously impossible, without endangering its completeness, to cut up into chapters any book which has not originally been composed in that way. These were Mr. Croker's errors. It must, nevertheless, be admitted that he had many special qualifications for his task. His knowledge of men and letters was most extensive; his learning was respectable; and his curiosity unbounded. His defects were that his bias occupied him too exclusively in the discussion of petty problems; that his prejudices were strong and often warped his judgment; and that, as an annotator pure and simple, he lacked the most essential of all qualities—the quality of continence. Yet these were trifling drawbacks compared with his treatment of Boswell's text; and it is not impossible that his labours would still continue to constitute the canonical edition of Johnson's Life were it not that the modern spirit demands inexorably that a classic writer shall be reproduced "in his habit as he lived," and shall not be sophisticated to suit the caprice of an editor or the fugitive fashion of as fugitive a taste.

The Rev. Alexander Napier, who is answerable for the new edition of Boswell just issued by Messrs. Bell, appears to have regarded his responsibilities in a more modest, and certainly a more practical, light than Mr. Croker did. He presents us with Boswell's text in its primitive integrity; he has substituted for the existing chapters the unbroken narrative of Boswell and Malone; he has relegated to his fourth volume the Tours in Wales and Scotland, and he has printed as appendices the interpolated letters. Many of Croker's purely excrescent notes have been removed and others have been added. Most of these are useful, concise, and to the point, although here and there the purist may detect some minor lapses which a more vigilant "castigation" of the proofs should have made impossible. For instance, it is cruel to poor Mr. Trevelyan, with all his other troubles, to cast upon him the odium of having cited the motto of the Monks of Medmenham as "Fays ce que vous voudras"; and the late Mr. Forster, who was notoriously sensitive upon this point, would assuredly have "squirmed" to find himself described in page after page of an important edition of his favourite Boswell as "Foster." Blemishes such as these, as well as misprints like "Palmeron of England," and so forth, can, however, be easily set right. Besides new notes, Mr. Napier has added in the form of supplement to his volumes discussions of several interesting Johnsonian cruces. In one he has embodied the autobiographical sketch of Johnson, published by Wright of Lichfield in 1805 with Miss Boothby's letters; in another he summarises Dr. Birkbeck Hill's account of Johnson's residence at Oxford. An account of the famous "History of Prince Titi" forms the subject of a third; and those who have ever read the anecdote related by Scott and others of a certain rencontre in which the "great lexicographer" and the author of the Wealth of Nations are said to have assailed each other in the style and vocabulary of fishfags will be rejoiced to learn that, by the simple test of chronology, Mr. Napier has successfully laid this unsavoury scandal. Other appendices deal with Theophilus Cibber's Lives of the Poets, with Carleton's Memoirs, with Mauritius Lowe's daughters, and other interesting questions. There is, of course, no finality in editing, and every thoroughly vital book, like Goldsmith's Traveller, "drags at each remove a lengthening chain" of illustration and comment; but until the next edition of Boswell makes its appearance, the reader who wishes to secure the latest researches on the subject will do well to procure Mr. Napier's handsome volumes.

But we must not quit them without speaking of that portion of them which, if proper regard be had both to the interests of novelty and the maxim of "place aux dames," should perhaps have come first in our survey, the collection of "Johnsoniana," edited, annotated, and prefaced by Mrs. Napier. She has wisely departed from the system of scrappy extract which has characterized former gatherings of this class, and gives us what she has found as completely as possible, taking no liberties with her original. Her volume (it is No. 5 in the series) leads off with what, after Boswell, must certainly take rank as the most valuable of the Johnsoniana, the "Anecdotes" of Mrs. Piozzi. That the whilom wife of the Tory member for Southwark was flighty, careless, and not over-scrupulous of speech, may be admitted, as also that her recollections were not recorded until long after date (they were, in fact, written and printed while she was in Italy); but she is thoroughly various, vivacious, and entertaining in the office which, like a true Della Cruscan, she describes in her preface as decorating Trajan's column with honeysuckle. Next to Mrs. Piozzi's "Anecdotes" in importance comes Murphy's sketch, originally prefixed to his edition of the works, and a far better performance than his slipshod and discursive memoir of Fielding. It contains, besides, his fine translation of Johnson's Latin poem on completing the Dictionary—a "copy of verses" which really deserves preservation as a piece of uncompromising self-portraiture. Besides these there are Cumberland's and Hawkins's anecdotes, Tom Tyers's sketch from Sylvanus Urban, letters and notes by Mrs. (Miss) Hill Boothby, Mrs. Hannah More, Madame d'Arblay, Sir Joshua's sister (Miss Reynolds), and even a few gleanings from the pleasant Twining correspondence published last year under the title of A Country Clergyman of the Last Century. But the real accession which Mrs. Napier makes to the literature of the subject is contained in the curious diary of Dr. Thomas Campbell, discovered behind an old press in one of the offices of the Supreme Court at Sydney, New South Wales, and first published there in 1854. Fortunately, no doubt exists about its authenticity; and its strange hiding place is accounted for by the fact that one of its writer's nephews was Sheriff and Provost Marshal of Sydney. It is entitled "A Diary of a Visit to England in 1775"; and its author, concerning whom Mr. Napier, in vol. ii., gives us sufficient particulars, was in his day a man of some repute as a historian, and an editor of Goldsmith. He came to this country from Ireland in February, and his desultory chronicle should supply several opportune quotations to the new editor of the Handbook of London. He lodges at the Hummums and the Grecian; dines at Dolly's; buys prints at the auction (? Cock's) in the Piazza; attends service at the Foundling and Dr. Dodd's chapel; goes to see Garrick in "Lusignan," and Woodward in the Suspicious Husband; inspects Magna Charta in the British Museum, and admires the "true sublime" in Sir Joshua—in short, makes completely what, circa 1770, was the provincial's "grand tour" of the metropolis. He met Johnson on more than one occasion at the Thrales's and elsewhere, and had a good opportunity of hearing the sage on various themes, for an account of which we must refer the reader to Mrs. Napier's pages. His description of the great man (of which she does not approve) is certainly more graphic than complimentary:—

> He has the aspect of an Idiot, without the faintest ray of sense gleaming from any one feature—with the most awkward garb, and unpowdered grey wig, on one side only of his head—he is for ever dancing the devil's jig, and sometimes he makes the most driveling effort to whistle some thought in his absent paroxisms. He came up to me and took me by the hand, then sat down on a sofa, and mumbled that he had heard two papers had appeared against him in the course of this week—one of which was—that he was to go to Ireland next summer in order to abuse the hospitality of that place also. His awkwardness at table is just what Chesterfield described, and his roughness of manners kept pace with that. When Mrs. Thrale quoted something from Foster's "Sermons" he flew in a passion and said that Foster was a man of mean ability and of no original thinking. All which tho' I took to be most true, yet I hold it not meet to have it so set down.

Such is Dr. Campbell's picture—verbatim et literatim, after Mrs. Napier's commendable fashion. Our only regret is that she should have been so economical of her notes, which, in many instances, are far more wanted here than in the remaining volumes. As a case in point, a harmony of the different accounts by Boswell, Cumberland, and Mrs. Piozzi of the sale of the Vicar of Wakefield would be a gain to literature. And is there not an error in her reprint of Dr. Barnard's kindly verses at p. 319?—

FIVE NOVELS.*

SURELY no five novels were ever gathered together that contained so little human interest as the five that lie before us, or so much bad French. From the latter defect, indeed, Mr. Charles Gibbon is free, and therefore he may be considered to have earned the right to be placed at the head of this list, which is rather like a certain "list" at Eton. It cannot be said that in other respects Fancy Free is in any way superior to the novels that come after it. The heroine, Davie Morison (Davie is an odd name for a woman) vindicates her claim to the title of Fancy Free by being more or less in love with two men at once; unless she was in love with neither, for it is not very easy to decide about the state of her heart. At any rate, she receives (and by no means rejects) a proposal of marriage in vol. i. p. 145 from a gentleman to whom she twice alludes by his surname of "Eglinton" (vol. i. p. 175 and vol. ii. p. 181), and thirty pages further on she listens with extraordinary calmness to a confession of love from her guardian. So strong is Davie's sense of humour that she thinks the first proposal a kind of joke, and listens to the second with "a sly twinkle." The interest of the book is meant to consist in the mystery hanging round a man named Davidson, who seeks a private interview with Davie, and informs her that he is her father, previously imagined to be long dead. It is plainly visible from the very beginning that he is nothing of the sort, therefore our excitement is but slightly roused in his unmasking. Thus the chief interest in the problem—is Davie, Davidson's daughter?—is discounted. There are several minor characters in the book, all more or less of a conventional type. There is a gentleman who owns a large property in Yorkshire, and is variously designated as "Bonsfield" (vol. i. pp. 6, 10), "Bousfield" through all the rest of the volume, and then "Bonsfield" again; there is a skittish widow from London, who drove over with Davie to church at Crathie, and was "highly excited by the pleasure of seeing royalty," and surprised to find the Queen seemed to be "like an ordinary woman." Many valuable details are given as to behaviour which is considered correct in Crathie Church, and concerning the manners of the preacher. "Her Majesty entered by the private staircase, and as much attention was shown in the eyes of the people to the Prince and Princess of Wales as to herself. The service proceeded without any distinct recognition of royalty being present." And not only did the preacher "proceed as calmly as if he had been preaching to an ordinary congregation," but "when the service was over the people quitted the church in quite as orderly a way as if no one of distinction had been present." Such self-control really hardly seems credible!

The remaining two short stories which fill the third volume are not on a higher level than Fancy Free. "One of his Inventions" reads as if it had been originally intended for a wild farce; for a mercenary man of business not merely allows himself to be tricked into a marriage for his daughter with a poor man whom he expects to inherit wealth, but he promptly falls on the neck of the plotter—his own father-in-law—who has taught him that "love was more than money." Mr. Nettleton must have advanced far on the road to perfection if he had learned to be grateful for being deceived in money affairs.

To Have and to Hold opens better. It starts with a shipwreck off the Goodwin Sands, and the launching of a lifeboat from Thanet to save the drowning passengers. Of course the hero is a volunteer in the lifeboat, and the heroine a passenger in the ship. There is plenty of vigour in the description of the rescue, though the reader feels injured that in such a sea absolutely no one should have been lost. All, however, are finally hauled on board, even down to the third seaman, "after his head is under water," and "his jaw has dropped"—a most unfortunate moment for a jaw to choose to do anything of the sort. Then begins the love story of Basil Chetwynd and Christina Winstone. Many obstacles are thrown in the way of their young affections. Letters are suppressed; hints of other attachments are thrown out; every possible weapon in the hands of parents and guardians employed. But love triumphs over all. Even in these days of liberty and excitement, Christina has a better time than most girls. The bare announcement of her dressmaker that she is a beauty and an heiress is sufficient to create a sensation in London society, and to make her a success. If only all dressmakers were equally powerful and considerate, what a charming thing life would become to the female sex! Her reputation once established, Christina is free to listen to the dictates of duty, which frequently oblige her to be scampering about over the country and through City alleys during the night, and enable her to inspire with confidence all who behold her. In one of these excursions she becomes involved with a money-lender and his son, Davidson by name, whom her reprobate uncle has paid with a forged cheque. The Davidsons are suspected, and are prosecuted on behalf of the bank. From this point the story ceases to be clear. Miss Stredder proves herself no cleverer at dealing with a court of justice than most other lady novelists. The counsel is impossible, the evidence hazy; but matters come to a climax when one of the witnesses for the defence "hears for the first time during the cross-examination that the name of the man she witnessed against was Winstone—a name enshrined among her most sacred memories of happier days." A great deal has been said about the curiosity of women, but surely the indifference of men could go no further than this. Miss Stredder has many of the qualities of a good novelist. She can describe well what she knows—as, for instance, the storms off Thanet, winter on the Lincolnshire coast, and a girl like Christina Winstone; and if she would confine herself to what she knows, she might produce a really interesting book. But she is not at home (her state is the more gracious) in legal matters, or with usurers, lawyers, or forgers. In reading her account of them we feel as little reality as if we were studying a description of the vegetation of Saturn. "To preach that which we do know" is more valuable advice than is commonly supposed.

The modest reader will hurry over the first chapter of The Roll-Call with a sense of discomfort at the love-making, even though it takes place between a heroine "beautiful as the craze of a Pygmalion," and a hero who had "passed the freshness of premier jeunesse" (sic). So lovely, indeed, was Esmé Gordon that even the attractions of a lady who is always spoken of as la belle, or those of a widow who on one occasion at least "coyly extended the tips of her black eyelashes" by way of salutation could not outweigh her charms. Coûte qui coûte, as our authoress says, following in the wake of many that have preceded her, Arthur Greatorix determines to marry his ward Esmé Gordon; but a hindrance unexpectedly arises in the person of a certain Alice, who orders Greatorix to go to Gibraltar on her business. Had he confessed the object of his journey to his betrothed, as he ought to have done, there would have been no mystery and no novel, and a great deal of trouble would have been saved all round; but the baleful influence of Alice was too much for Greatorix. In order that his weakness may not be hardly judged, we will give a specimen of the language of the lady. "Speaking more calmly than heretofore," she said, "with all the world against me; with deadly wrong in the place of right; with mourning where there should be rejoicing, and with misery where happiness should reign; with foes in the place of friends, and with treachery given back to me for truth; with my brain dizzy, my heart aching, and with my fair womanhood trampled in the dust; yet I protest that there lives not the human being who can deny my right to proceed to Gibraltar, if so I choose. You cannot gainsay me" (vol. i. p. 148). To his credit be it spoken, he does gainsay her, and departs to Gibraltar by himself. He appears both to write and to receive letters equally seldom, and only learns on his return to England that Esmé's uncle is dead. Esmé herself is pining away in his absence, and her home is broken up, owing to the unreasonable determination of her aunt, who refuses to allow the girl to remain and entertain Mr. Greatorix (when he comes) and Lord Oakdene "aux prince" (vol. ii. p. 30), while the mistress of the house is away. Matters are of course soon set straight by Greatorix, who leads Esmé to the altar. Her dress is not described; but no doubt she was bien ganté and bien chaussé for the occasion, as her aunt was in vol. iii. p. 53 when she went to a rendezvous. After this the love-making sets in again with undiminished vigour, till a thunderbolt falls on the peaceful household by the discovery by Esmé of a MS. named The Roll-Call. This tremendous document was written by the voluble Alice for the edification of Esmé's uncle, and contains the story of her life. Hence the name. Space forbids us to quote the whole, but we cannot refrain from giving a sentence or two. "With a thoughtlessness which, in its faulty degree, matched the entirety of a fearlessness such as that of those dauntless ones" (soldiers), "I stood before, and faced, the coming perils of my life." "Schoolgirls may chatter with impunity of their short-lived, innocent conquests; schoolboys may rave of their fleeting admiration for eyes black or blue, locks dark or golden; but not so lightly may those of riper years babble forth their tales of love" (vol. iii. pp. 85–87). The object of all this "babble" naturally is to declare that the writer is married to Arthur Greatorix. Esmé faints, and declines to see her husband until Alice appears and informs her that the hero of The Roll-Call is not Esmé's husband, but his uncle of the same name, of whom, of course, Esmé has never heard, and that she, Alice, is Esmé's erring but repentant aunt. So happiness is once more restored, and the curtain falls on renewed love-making. The quotations we have given, both in French and English, form the best comment on the story.

Whatever may be the merits of the Boston of to-day, in one respect they were probably outshone by the Boston of a century ago, written about by a lady calling herself "A. de Grasse Stevens." Great as is the intellectual activity of the modern inhabitants of Boston, we doubt if they could produce from among their ranks a second Lady Troubridge, who at the age of a hundred and eleven was able to give word for word conversations that took place ninety-five years before (vol. i. pp. 79, 80). This remarkable person appears, according to her own account, to have played a considerable part in the troubles with England, together with her friend Anaïs de Grasse. Anaïs and her sister Dorothy, or Dot, were both brought up in France by their French relations. They do not, however, seem to have made much use of their opportunities, for the French they are fond of employing is quite the worst we have encountered even among this batch of novels. In vol. i. p. 117 Dot observes in her diary that she and her sister were sent to America, where their uncle held a pied de terre. We do not know what this cherished possession of the Comte de Grasse may have been. Had it any relation to the feet of clay belonging to the celebrated idol of Scripture? Dot's sister might have been deeply versed in modern novels, from the glibness with which she talks about a chaperone (vol. i. p. 240), but their biographer is alone responsible for the hero's débonnaire eyes (vol. i. p. 246). We cannot take any poignant interest in the fortunes of the virtuous Dot or the brilliant Anaïs, neither does it appear very probable that two French-bred girls would converse with each other and their old Bretonne nurse in a jargon of clumsy English and bad French. Both sisters fall in love with the same man, the captain with the débonnaire eyes. We hear a great deal about this gentleman's youth, but if he really was young, it must have been with the spurious youth of Claudian; for he speaks (vol. ii. p. 28) of the determined look worn by the Americans at the battle of Lexington as being the same which he had "often noted on the battle-fields of Arcot and Dettingen." Now an interval of thirty-two years separates the battle of Dettingen, fought in 1743, from that of Lexington, fought in 1775. The wearing of a doublet in 1759 may have been an idiosyncrasy on the part of Louis de Ventadore or his parents, but certainly we are familiar with no such garment in the pictures of the period.

The Story of Meg is not a good story. It is very jerky; it begins with a sentence of fifteen lines; its paragraphs frequently end in dashes, but it is the one novel of all the five which it is possible to read with interest. Meg was a pretty and forlorn little creature, living with an uncle and three female cousins, to whom she was absolutely unsympathetic. These cousins are formed a little too much on the model of Cinderella's sisters. Women are often neglectful or indifferent, but they are seldom actively spiteful for long together, as the Miss Harmans were. Meg's only hope lay in her unseen and unknown guardian, one Mr. Arlathnot, whose curious bringing up, partly in the fashionable world and partly among the strictest sect of the Pharisees, is very well described. He was equally unfortunate both in his wife and son, and on the news of the death of the latter made preparations for taking Meg to live with him, knowing that she was unhappy at home. Unluckily Meg was not informed of his intentions, and one morning, goaded by some fresh instance of unkindness on the part of her cousins, she ran away. She intended to go to her old nurse, but when, after many mishaps, she reached the nurse's address, it was only to find that the old woman had been dead for a year. The story of the dismal months that followed in the poorest and roughest of respectable lodging-houses is well told, and the account of the frightened Meg's solitary attempt to sit as a model to several young artists is exceedingly graphic. When she was reduced to her lowest ebb, a small newspaper hack, who was lodging in the same house, offered to marry her, and Meg, believing that after all it was the only loop-hole of escape from dying of starvation or returning to her uncle, did not say no. Before she gave her answer, however, she accidentally came across Mr. Arlathnot, who tried to induce her to return to her uncle's house; but she, thinking that she would avoid troubling them all for the future, quietly went back to her lodgings, and was married to her lover the next day. This seems to us unnatural. A childish creature like Meg would have been so thankful to see a familiar face, especially that of a person in whom she believed, that she would have obeyed him unquestioningly, and so have escaped all the sorrows in store for her. These sorrows were many. Her husband became first moody and jealous, and then took to drinking, and finally threw her in the way of most undesirable acquaintances. Arlathnot was powerless to help her, and her troubles ended only with her death. We hope next time Miss Curtois will apply the powers which she undoubtedly has to inventing a tale less consistently miserable.

CHRONICLES OF THE REIGNS OF EDWARD I. AND EDWARD II.*

THIS second volume of Chronicles of the Reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. is of unusual interest. The four works here brought together under the general name of "Chronicles" are in themselves interesting, not so much from a literary point of view—for, artistically considered, the mediæval Latin school of historians was in its decadence in the Edwardian age—but as throwing light upon an obscure period of history which is "singularly deficient in first-rate authorities." In the next place, two of the pieces—the Commendatio and the Bridlington Gesta—are here printed, as the editor believes, for the first time. Then, in the introduction, Canon Stubbs has given us some valuable pages upon portions of the history of the reign, and an inquiry into the origin of the Vita et Mors Edwardi II., and into the history of its reputed author, Sir Thomas de la Moore; he has also fulfilled his promise to set before us the results of his examination into the strange tale which brings the murdered Edward of Caernarvon to life as a hermit in Lombardy. Altogether there is fine foraging in the preface; although, a large part of it being necessarily given up to an account of the MSS. on which the text is founded, it cannot, as a literary composition, take equal rank with the historical essays which Canon Stubbs has given us as introductions to some of his earlier volumes of Chronicles.

Taking the pieces as they come, we begin with the Commendatio lamentabilis, a sort of mortuary eulogium or funeral sermon upon Edward I.—or Edward IV., as he is here more accurately styled—dedicated to his widow Margaret of France by the author, who appears to have been one John of London. "A less distinctive appellation," as the editor sadly remarks, "could scarcely have been invented"; and, though attempts have been made to identify him with various Johns of Westminster and London, and with the editor of the Flores Historiarum, the conclusion of Canon Stubbs is that we must wait for more evidence. In the meanwhile he seems to lean towards identifying him with a John of London, who in 1312 was a minor canon of St. Paul's and custos of the new fabric, and who may possibly have been the author of the Annales Paulini, printed in the first volume of this collection. The Commendatio, though hitherto unprinted, is by no means unknown, having been used and cited by Sharon Turner, Pauli, and others, and its authorship having long been a subject of discussion. It belongs to what is usually considered a dull class of compositions; and the literary merit of this particular specimen is not high. But it has nevertheless great value, as being evidently written shortly after Edward's death, as giving a detailed personal description of the great king, and "as showing that the points in the character and policy of Edward I. which have recommended themselves most strongly to the admiration of posterity were not lost out of sight among the men of his own days." The personal description of Edward would have been still more valuable if John of London would only have given it wholly in his own words; but this, he says, exceeded his ability. He therefore hit upon the odd device of adapting the well-known description by Peter of Blois of Henry II. to suit Edward I. Now, as Henry was of middle height, stout, and reddish-haired, while Edward was tall, wiry, and black-haired, the feat might be thought to present insuperable difficulties; but, by altering the adjectives when necessary, and inserting a non and a but here and there, they are successfully surmounted. In the end, in spite of the clumsiness of the method, we get a lively idea of Edward, towering like King Saul above his subjects, broad-chested and sinewy, and, till his last illness, "upright as a palm-tree" and active as a youth. He was never out of spirits, except at the death of his dear ones (carorum); his health was good, almost to the last—"rarissime ægrotavit"—which the writer attributes to constant work and exercise; like Henry, he was an ardent hunter and hawker—"vehemens amator nemorum et ferarum." To the last also—and he lived to be sixty-eight, a long life for a mediæval layman—he retained his eyesight and his teeth unimpaired, though his black and curling hair had grown grey. In spite of the difference in height and colouring, he had in physical, as in mental, constitution many points in common with the founder of his dynasty; he had Henry's round head, and eyes which changed from mild to fierce, according to their owner's mood—"scintillantes ignem," in the phrase of Peter of Blois and John of London, whereby we see that heroes with fire-flashing eyes are not, as is frequently believed, the invention of modern novelists. Like Henry before him, Edward was indifferent to, or rather impatient of, regal pomp; the weight of his crown oppressed him, not figuratively, but literally, so that after his coronation he refused to wear it again; and he habitually dressed "sicut unus ex plebeis," and all in one colour, eschewing purple and scarlet.

The Commendatio proceeds in the form of lamentations put into the mouths of the Pope, of Edward's brother kings, his widow, his bishops, earls, barons, and knights, and the clergy and laity generally. There is one marked omission; no lamentation is ascribed to his son and successor. The widow mourns with a profusion of Scriptural phrases, but with little that seems characteristic or appropriate. That she reckons it among his merits "quod parliamenta uniret" is an interesting fact, but one would expect to find it insisted upon by his subjects in general, rather than by his French wife in particular. The Pope and the clergy of course do not mention the little unpleasantnesses which now and then had occurred between Edward and the Church; and the bishops are made especially to praise his justice and moderation in the exercise of his rights over Church property—praise which, as the editor remarks, a monk would scarcely give to "the author of the statute De religiosis," and which therefore makes against the theory adopted by Sir Thomas Hardy, that the writer of the Commendatio was John Bever, a monk of Westminster. The lamentations of the earls, barons, and knights—who say nothing about the struggle over the Confirmation of the Charters, or the famous "Go or hang" dialogue—are the most characteristic. They show us who were then the accepted worthies of our insular history. Edward, say the knights, has excelled Brutus, Arthur, Eadgar, and Richard. It is worth noting that the exile of the "perfida multitudo Judæorum" is mentioned with approbation, not, as might be expected, by the clergy, but by the knights. Probably the gallant gentlemen had had painful experience of money-lenders. The earls and barons set forth other good deeds of Edward—his protection of the liberties of the Church, his magnificent gifts to shrines, his expenditure on castles and fortifications, his laying out of parks and fish-ponds, and his prowess in tournaments—a catalogue which shows us what "in the mind of a healthily constituted baron of the age" went to make up the ideal man. To the bishops it is among his merits that "Edwardus expugnavit Sarracenos, Francos, Scotos, Walenses, perfidos Christianos." The notion that his dealings with Wales and Scotland were matter of reproach had not yet come up. Under the guidance of Scottish poets and historians, we have been taught to condemn Edward for that "inveterate hatred to Scotland" which even the near approach of death could not soften.

> Such hate was his on Solway's strand,
> When vengeance clench'd his palsied hand,
> That pointed yet to Scotland's land.

In the Commendatio of the clergy the same facts are looked at from the contemporary English point of view:—

> Et ecce plusquam Saul hic et multo beatior rex Edwardus, qui, cum diem mortis suæ revelante spiritu sentiret imminere suique impotens equitare nihilominus lecticam parat, ad bellum properat, sanguinem in ecclesia fusum dampnat, dum parricidas decapitat et incendiarios flamma incinerat, deridentesque decrepitum deliros mortuficat moriturus.

It will be said that all this comes from a panegyrist; and no doubt we must make due allowance for Edward's being painted, both morally and physically, en beau. His faults and his errors are, by the nature of the composition, as completely ignored as the drooping left eyelid which, we know from other sources, marred the symmetry of his face. But a panegyrist may be supposed at least to have picked out the strongest points of his hero; and it is clear that Edward's efforts to unite and organize Britain were by Englishmen of his own day looked upon as among his titles to fame.

The work which follows—the Bridlington book, as it may be called for brevity—consists of a chronicle of Edward II., written by a canon of the Augustinian Priory, and a compilation of annals of the reign of Edward III., embellished with extracts from the poetical prophecies of a real or supposed worthy of the same house, John of Bridlington. Perhaps one of the most remarkable and novel points in the Gesta Edwardi de Carnarvon is the account of the judicial proceedings against Piers Gaveston, which, "if true," is "an important addition to our knowledge of the events preceding his execution." If we are to believe the writer, Piers, instead of being simply lynched by the Earls of Lancaster, Hereford, and Warwick, was brought before the judges William Inge and Henry Spigurnell, or Sprigurelle, then sitting to deliver the gaol of Warwick, and, on the ground of his breach of the ordinance for his perpetual banishment, was—by the judges, as is implied—sentenced to decapitation.

> The statement is circumstantial enough, and, if these two judges were really sitting at Warwick at the time of the arrest, the earls may not improbably have fortified their action with some show of legality. I am not aware of any confirmative evidence on this point, nor is it likely from what we know of the political connexions of the judges that they would be willing instruments of the vindictive policy of the earls, Inge at least belonged to the unpopular party.

The work also contains, as we might expect from a Bridlington writer, some interesting notes of Yorkshire history, much information as to the inroads of the Scots, and "the fullest account extant" of the "White Battle" of Myton in 1319. Canon Stubbs particularly calls attention to the account of the Earl of Lancaster's proceedings in Yorkshire in 1321 as "one of the most valuable portions of the present chronicle," "illustrating a period which has only been very partially examined by historians." There are also some curious points in the account of the civil war which ended with the battle of Boroughbridge, the most striking incident being one in which Edward of Caernarvon's second favourite, the younger Hugh le Despenser, plays the chief part, and which is described with the circumstantiality of an eye-witness. The King, accompanied by Despenser, having forded the Trent, and made ready to give battle to the rebel earls in occupation of the town and bridge of Burton, was about to order the royal standard to be unfurled, a formal declaration of war which preserved its significance down to the days of Charles I. At this, Hugh le Despenser sprang from his destrarius, and prostrating himself with his arms extended on the snow-covered ground—an attitude no doubt intended to move to mercy by recalling the crucifix—implored the King not to unfurl his standard and thus involve the whole kingdom in civil war. The incident sets the younger Hugh in a favourable light; but, as Canon Stubbs observes, it is the last occasion on which he appears as "counselling even a show of moderation," and, "after joining in the judicial murder of Earl Thomas and the other rebel lords, he is found pursuing a career of avarice and aggression indistinguishable from that of his father."

The chief interest of the annals of Edward III. is in the circumstantial narrative of Edward Balliol's expedition to Scotland in 1332, which "redeems the second portion of the work from the obstacle of a mere compilation or abridgment of common material." On the third work contained in this volume, the Vita Edwardi II., already printed by Hearne, and by him attributed, "on a very insufficient conjecture," to a monk of Malmesbury, our space will not allow us to dwell, though much might be said, both as to its authorship and date, and upon the work itself, which has a marked and vigorous character. We must pass rapidly on to the Vita et Mors, first printed by Camden in 1602, and attributed to one Sir Thomas de la Moore, for whom, by guesswork and inference, a family history has been concocted, which Canon Stubbs demolishes, much as Mr. Blades has demolished the received accounts of Juliana Berners. Sir Thomas de la Moore, however, is not whittled away so nearly to nothingness as the sporting lady has been. The pedigree hitherto assigned to him as lord of Eldland in Gloucestershire must be set aside; but he may have been a cadet of the Eldland family, or he may be more probably identified with an Oxfordshire knight of the same name who represented that county in Parliament in 1340, 1343, and 1351. This last supposition fits in well with what we know for certain about the literary Sir Thomas—namely, that he was the patron of the Oxfordshire chronicler, Geoffrey le Baker of Swinbrook. The fact that Sir Thomas wrote in French some sort of a life or memoir of Edward II., whose forced abdication at Kenilworth he had witnessed, really comes to us upon the sole authority of Geoffrey, who in his chronicle acknowledges his obligations to the work of his knightly patron. Of this French life the Vita et Mors printed by Camden is professedly a translation; but, as Canon Stubbs informs us, it proves on examination to be a refacimento of Geoffrey le Baker's work. Of the original French memoir no trace has yet been found, though Canon Stubbs still cherishes hopes of its rediscovery. It is from Sir Thomas de la Moore, filtered through Geoffrey le Baker, that the received accounts of the insults and tortures inflicted upon the fallen Edward are chiefly derived—the shaving with ditchwater, a story which is stated to have come directly from one of the ex-King's escort, and which, reaching as it does the sublime of ignominious misery, has laid hold of the fancy of Marlowe in his tragedy, and of Croker and Dickens in their children's histories—the confinement in a chamber above a charnel-house, which is artistically preferable to Marlowe's filthy dungeon—"the shrieks of death, thro' Berkley's roof that ring," foretold by Gray's Bard. But the method in which the murder was supposed to have been accomplished had got abroad before De la Moore wrote, and appears in the Polychronicon. This brings us to the question which has been recently raised whether this crowning atrocity ever took place. We refer to the discovery a few years ago in the archives of the department of Hérault of a letter to Edward III. from Manuel Fieschi, Papal notary and sometime Archdeacon of Nottingham, purporting to contain the "confession" of Edward II. as to his escape from Berkeley Castle, and his subsequent wanderings till he ended as a hermit in Lombardy. The letter, which was first brought by Mr. Bent under the notice of English historians, and of which we spoke in our review of his history of Genoa, is now reprinted by Canon Stubbs from the Publications de la Société Archéologique de Montpellier. Probably most readers will expect to find it followed by a crushing refutation, but this is far from being the case. Canon Stubbs indeed believes the story to be a fabrication, and points out some difficulties in the way of receiving it; but the difficulty of accounting for the existence of the letter remains. It has been written by some one who was sufficiently well acquainted with the circumstances of the King's imprisonment to be able to draw up the details without giving an opening for ready refutation. Down to a certain point it corresponds with the accepted facts, and there are no impossibilities in the later details:—

> I can only suggest three theories to account for it: either it was part of a political trick devised in the French court at the beginning of the great war to throw discredit on Edward III. and possibly to create disaffection in England; or it was the pretended confession of some person well acquainted with the circumstances of Edward's death and probably implicated in it, who wished to secure his own safety and subsistence by counterfeiting the character; or it was the real confession of a madman. There is great difficulty in the last supposition, for there is too much true and consistent detail to have been arranged by a thoroughly disordered brain; if the first be accepted, the plan of which the letter was a part must have been so completely abortive as to be otherwise unknown, and the second supposition seems almost as improbable as the authenticity of the letter. There the fact remains, at present inexplicable.

Our notice of the chronicles contained in this volume has run to a length which forbids us to dwell, as we should like, upon the most valuable parts of the editor's preface—his sketch of the character of Edward II., and of the position of Gaveston and the Despensers; his remarks upon "the constitutional opposition" which, suspended under Edward I. (except on the occasion of the great struggle of 1297), revived under his son; his sketch of the period of the Earl of Lancaster's ascendency, and his striking picture of the revolution which overthrew the Despensers, and with them their unhappy master. In the account of the commotions in the City of London, in which the unpopular Bishop Stapleton of Exeter was seized by the mob and beheaded with a "panade" or butcher's knife, we have one of those pieces of clear and vigorous narrative which Canon Stubbs too seldom gives us. His fame as a constitutional historian is widely spread, but his power as a narrator is hardly known beyond the comparatively small circle of students of the Record publications.

In conclusion, we must thank him for having added so much to our knowledge of the reign of Edward II.—a reign of which the history has yet to be written.

INDIAN RACING REMINISCENCES.*

CAPTAIN HAYES has written a good deal at one time or another about horses. In one of his books he professes to teach how to ride both on the flat and across country; in another he gives a number of veterinary notes for horse owners; and in a third he instructs his readers about the training and management of horses in India. Moreover, he has invented an instrument called the "horseman's knife," which to the uninitiated looks very like an ordinary many-bladed knife, though it may possibly possess virtues of which we are ignorant. His latest production is the work before us, which consists of exactly what its title would lead one to expect—a thing that cannot be said of all books. The author deserves some credit for the modest and candid manner in which he speaks of his own writings. Of one of his books he says, "In the first edition I expressed myself badly, but I had something new to tell. As the reading public was indulgent, I did better the next time. I went home to study at the new veterinary college," &c., the result being that the following edition "has now been before the public for eight years," and has "been a steady income to" him during that time. This being the case, Captain Hayes can surely afford to laugh at his critics. He is very confiding as to the occasional difficulties of horsey authors, for he tells us that he arrived at a certain race-meeting in India in the worst of spirits, because he did not see his "way to win a race or get the wherewithal to pay stable bill and" his expenses to England, where he "wanted to go at the end of the season to write a book."

A book of stories about India, chiefly of a personal character, will be more interesting to those who know the places and the people described than to the ordinary reader; but even racing men who have never been in India may find something to interest them in the descriptions of the system of handicapping which prevails there, as well as in the comparisons between the different breeds of horses that meet together in Indian races. All horsemen are well aware that Arabs cannot compete successfully with modern English racehorses; but, while the author admits that, "from an English point of view, they cannot gallop, to use a common expression, fast enough to keep themselves warm," he contends "that there is a great deal to be said in their favour as high-mettled racers." One of their advantages is that they are usually so sound that an inexperienced trainer may try a great many foolish experiments with them without breaking them down; and, as trainers in India are usually amateurs, this is a great point. Another good thing about Arabs, as far as racing among themselves is concerned, is that they do not, as a rule, vary very greatly in their speed. Captain Hayes goes so far as to say "that in a two-mile weight-for-age race with ten or twelve Arabs, we would [sic] be right, three times out of four, in predicting that the proverbial table-cloth would cover the field up to the distance post, and that the verdict would be in doubt up to the last stride." Arabs, again, "have such a knack of improving with age and good treatment, that the owner of one which moves in anything like good form need never despair of winning a race with him." In India, English and Australian horses give Arabs 3 st.; country-breds 2 st.; and Cape horses 14 lbs. Even with these liberal allowances, Arabs and Indian horses have not much chance, at any distance, with English or Australian horses. Captain Hayes tells us that in many parts of India, where the climate is hot and damp, it is practically impossible to breed horses which would serve any useful purpose. "Thoroughbred English dams and sires will produce in India a foal that will be, to a certainty, unmistakable as a country-bred, while the second or third generation will possess but few European characteristics." While treating of the subject of breeding from English horses in India, it would have been well to refer to the efforts that have been made for some years by the Government to send good English sires to improve the breed of native horses. For several years twenty-five thoroughbred and twenty-five Norfolk stallions were sent out annually to India, and although the number is reduced, the exportation of English sires still continues. As this is a matter of importance, we should like to have seen something about it in a chapter on horse-breeding in India. We may observe that great success has followed the system of sending out these carefully-selected stallions, and in a future edition of his work the author would do well to take some notice of it.

The chief difficulty in managing races in India is to "bring the horses together," as racing men say. We mean, of course, at the winning and not at the starting-posts. English handicappers can vouch for the pains required to make a good race between well-known horses of one breed; but the difficulties are increased a hundredfold when many of the horses are unknown to the handicapper and are of different breeds. An instance is quoted in the book before us of a handicap in which one horse had to be handicapped at 12 st. 7 lbs. and another at 6 st. 7 lbs. to put the pair on anything like fair terms. Weight is sometimes allowed for difference of height in India, 4 lbs. per inch being the usual scale. At one time there was some difference between the scale of weight-for-age at Bombay and at Calcutta which greatly added to the difficulties of handicapping. Another cause of confusion was the difference in the time of foaling in India, in Australia, and at the Cape. As all horses in Indian racing law took their age from May 1st, horses bred at another time of year ran at a great advantage or disadvantage as the case might be. Much has been done to improve and equalize the scale of weights through the energy of Lord Ulick Browne, who has been for many years the Admiral Rous of India.

Much importance is attached in India to what is called the "time test." In England the practice of timing races is of less importance, because there is a great variety in the nature of our racecourses, both as regards their soil and their inclinations. The great difference, again, in the state of the ground on different days at even one meeting, owing to variable weather, will often make a considerable margin between the length of time required to traverse the same course on one day and on another in this country. In India, on the other hand, the majority of racecourses are very like each other, being in most cases perfectly flat, with "light going." Trainers in that country consequently find stop-watches very useful in testing the progress of their horses, and in training a single horse by himself the time test is especially valuable. If the racecourses in India are generally like each other, the same cannot be said of the steeplechase courses, which are of every conceivable—we might almost say inconceivable—character. In one place the author says that he and his friends "made a steeplechase course across a cricket-field, over the shingle, and down the hard road in front of the Assembly Rooms." He rode in one steeplechase which had among its obstacles a wall 4 ft. 9 in. high. The negotiation of this wall is thus described:—

> I endeavoured to get Mr. Hartwell to give me a lead over the big wall, but he, seeing what I wanted, kept behind, so I hardened my heart and sent Bowman at the masonry. He tried to "cut it," but I held him too straight and kept him going too fast to allow him to do so. He took off too soon, struck the wall with his chest, and rolled over with me on the other side. I was knocked insensible for a few moments, for there was a terrible lot of "bone" in the ground, as the bloodthirsty stewards had taken good care not to make "the falling" soft. When I came to myself I found I was sitting on the ground, and saw, as if in a dream, Day break with Mr. Short see-sawing on the wall, his head and fore legs on my side of it, his hind legs on the other, and his body wedged in the gap I had made.

There is much variety, too, in the uses to which Indian racehorses are put. One great steeplechase rider "never hesitated at putting his racehorses and chasers into a trap without any previous training, and, as he invariably used harness 'as rotten as pears,' and scorned to go on the high road when he could take a short cut across country, he seldom escaped without an accident or two." A scarcely safer charioteer was the hero of the following anecdote:—

> On one occasion, after a very jolly dinner with the 2nd Bengal Cavalry at Segowlee, one of the planters who had been playing polo, and who had driven in a tandem pair, was obliged to go home instead of sleeping in the station as usual. As the night was very dark, and the road narrow and raised, his friends tried to induce him to unharness the leader. But as he had just enough champagne to make him "contrary," the mere suggestion that he was not able to manage a tandem in the dark was sufficient to make him insist on displaying his ability to do so. A happy thought struck one of his friends, so they ceased endeavouring to persuade him, and, when the trap was announced, they had all the lights taken away from the mess verandah. They gave the syce a rupee to hold his tongue, took off the leader, and fastened both pairs of reins to the wheeler. The jovial planter climbed up, started off immensely proud of himself, and never found out his mistake until he arrived home safe and sound.

But those who ride races get hardened to accidents. The best gentleman rider on the flat that Captain Hayes ever beheld, either at home or abroad, once "got a desperate fall, and smashed his nose almost into a pulp. By way of breaking the news gently to his wife, he telegraphed to her, 'Nose knocked into a jelly, what shape would you like it?'" Nor are race-riders' mounts always very comfortable. We are told of a native racer that was the most fidgetty and impetuous animal the author ever knew. She was the most unpleasant hack he ever sat on, for she would neither walk, trot, nor canter. "She would passage, shoulder-in, progress tail first, waltz, or go in any mad style of her own, but travel as a rational hack ought to do, she would not. On the racecourse she would run away for five furlongs, and then speedy-cut herself and be laid up for a couple of weeks." Of a steeplechase mare we read that "she had a nasty habit of dragging her hind legs after her when jumping a wall or timber," and full descriptions are given of many other racehorses that must have been anything but pleasant to ride.

It would hardly be fair to criticize a book of this kind too severely; good horsemen cannot always be expected to be "litery gents." We may, however, point out that the long stories of the author's personal racing experiences are very tedious. Here and there we find an amusing anecdote, but, taken as a whole, the book is dreary reading. Yet it is a consolation to remember that works of this sort are not often read through from end to end by many readers, and it may amuse some people to dip into this little volume for half an hour or so. We must not omit to notice the illustrations, which consist principally of portraits. It will be sufficient to say that we do not admire them, and we venture to think that the book would have been more attractive without them. Generally speaking, the illustrations are the best parts of sporting works, but the book before us is an exception to this rule.

A LIFE OF HERDER.*

In several respects Mr. Nevinson's book deserves considerable praise. Though he does not seem to us to have grasped the true significance of Herder's intellectual position, or to have formed a just estimate of the influence he has exercised—somewhat indirectly, it is true—on the whole subsequent course of German thought, he has at least made an earnest effort to do the former. He is evidently familiarly acquainted with the works of the author whom he has made the subject of his sketch; and to become really familiar with them is a hard and rather repulsive task, for Herder was one of those men who can proclaim the truth that is in them only in the fragmentary and semi-dogmatic way which often strikes contemporaries so strongly, only to become utterly intolerable to their children. It is but just to add that the immense intellectual influence of Herder has greatly contributed to make his prose writings so unreadable. The truth that is in them, which once seemed the breaking of a new dawn, is now absorbed into the common light of day, and on turning their pages we are struck only by what is crude, false, and inadequate, because there is nothing new to us in the great thoughts that once announced the advent of our own period. The merits of such a writer can be known to the general public of his own country only by means of a digest, and it is well that such a man as Herder should be known far beyond the limits of his own country. English readers ought therefore to be grateful for the summary that is here offered them, but we must warn them that Mr. Nevinson is entirely, and indeed confessedly, incompetent as soon as he enters upon any question connected with philosophy, that his knowledge of the literature of Germany before the birth and after the death of Herder is exceedingly limited or rather superficial, and that he is therefore inclined to dwell on the parts of Herder's teaching which have an interest for the Englishman of to-day rather than on those which gave a new impulse to the thought of Germany a century ago. He seems also to have an unfortunate contempt of modern authorities. During the last ten or fifteen years a great deal has been written upon the subject in various German reviews which is not entirely unworthy of any reader's attention, and which might have prevented him from treating Herder's guesses as to the creation of species as an isolated, or indeed a very important, part of his speculations.

Mr. Nevinson is far more successful in dealing with the life and times of Herder. His knowledge of the latter is very creditable, though it has evidently been got up for the occasion—that is to say, it is the result of careful study for a given purpose, not of a disinterested love of the letters, the memoirs, and the literature of the period. The Life is deserving of all praise; we, who do not profess to be specialists on this subject, know of none other in which the materials are brought together in so convenient and manageable a form, though we must confess that we differ from the author in the estimate he has formed of the character of his hero, and of many of the other persons who are mentioned. In this respect it is not unlikely that the work may be found useful, even in Germany.

But, as soon as we turn from the materials to the form in which they are presented to the public, all praise must cease. Like most of us, Mr. Nevinson is an admirer of Thomas Carlyle; but unlike most of us, he seems to think it a sign of reverence to travesty his style, which he mimics in much the same way as a clever monkey mimics the gestures of his master. There is a certain likeness, but it is that of a caricature; and the more solemn the action imitated is, the more ludicrous does the copy of it become. We have too great a respect for the original and for things higher than the original to follow Mr. Nevinson into this sphere, and prefer giving a specimen or two of his familiar discourse. Of "the laughing locomotive" (p. 87) we can only say with Polonius, "That's good; the laughing locomotive is good." The irreverence of the statement that "Herder cured souls after the Lutheran fashion" might, if it stood alone, be excused, but unfortunately it does not stand alone; it is the most innocent of a number of similar remarks which we have noted, but refrain from reproducing. We do not charge the author with a desire to offend; he seems to be simply ignorant of the fact that there are certain subjects on which Englishmen of culture, whatever their opinions may be, are accustomed to write seriously if they write at all. Here we would pause, did not sympathy with the lonely and unfortunate foreigner induce us to make one more quotation. Mr. Barnum's Buddhist priests must have been sadly shocked at the unceremonious way in which their charge has been treated by the English press; will it not refresh their souls to know that an English author speaks of an elephant, even when it is neither white nor sacred, as "the dreamlike Indian beast, the type of sensitive intellect" (p. 415)? Such kind words, it may be hoped, will even soothe Jumbo in his exile.

LANCASHIRE GLEANINGS.†

We wonder whether it has ever occurred to the worthy persons who delight in statistics as to the number of volumes published in successive years to ask themselves the apposite question, When is a book not a book? Perhaps more solutions than one might be suggested for the problem; but it would not be a mere bookbinder's reply to say that, in order to deserve its name, a book ought to cohere. Judged by such a test, we fear that not a few collections of altogether or semi-detached papers would be refused a place on the register, and this volume of Lancashire Gleanings among the number. Its author, Mr. Axon, has gained some reputation among librarians and elsewhere by his researches in the local history and archæology of Lancashire; and he is true to the character of a genuine student in refraining, as a rule, from any endeavour to set off such curiosities as he has picked up by encasing them in the imitation morocco of would-be fine writing. With the exception of an introductory flourish or two about "Lancashire fair women," and "the pale martyr in his sheet of fire," and an occasional verbosity such as "the snowy regions of Muscovia," or "the myriad-peopled city of Manchester," he preserves a sobriety of style befitting studies which it is no dispraise to call dry. But there is no general connecting thread between the numerous sections of this volume beyond what its title implies; and there is no trace in it of so much as an attempt at arrangement. Religious, political, and literary traditions or anecdotes have all been jagoted as they came to hand; and the result is a compilation which undoubtedly may be taken up at almost any page, but which dissipates interest almost as speedily as it excites it. An emphatically trivial bunch of "Curiosities of Street Literature" is found lying between a genealogical notice of the "Sherburnes in America" and a short narrative of the adventurous military careers of two sons of Dr. John Ferriar. A tribute to the services rendered by Roscoe and others to the beginnings of the cultivation of art in Liverpool follows upon a noteworthy account of the great Chadwick claim—a Jarndyce v. Jarndyce of real life, with a dénouement hardly less complete than that of the story—and precedes a critical notice of a pseudo-analogon to the story of Bürger's Lenore. Now, this kind of disorder is neither avoidable nor inappropriate in a magazine for dilettanti; but in a book it is rendered irritating by its needlessness. We must add that, though there is no lack of matter that will be fresh to most readers in Mr. Axon's volume, he occasionally intermixes it with information familiar to ninety-nine out of a hundred students of English manners and customs. There cannot be many such readers desirous of hearing any more about the origin of the morris-dance, or to whom the menus of King James I.'s Sunday dinners, cited from Nichols's Progresses, will have the charm of novelty.

Mr. Axon might in other respects have improved this volume by bestowing greater care upon the revision of its contents. Thus he might have avoided repetitions; for it could not be necessary to tell twice over an anecdote as to the Young Pretender's supposed visits to the Swan Inn at Manchester in the year 1744, or to refer, once with a queer misprint and once correctly, to the "eternal want of pence that vexes public men." Indeed, his printers do not appear to stand on nice points, and he has by no means corrected all their vagaries. Their French accentuation is occasionally fantastic, and the note mentioned above on the story of Bürger's famous ballad is introduced by the following quotation à faire peur:—

> Die Todten reiten schnelle!
> Wir sind, wir sind zür snelle.

Again, we may take it upon ourselves to assert that it was Henry VI. and not Henry VII., whom a tradition preserved by the Manchester antiquary, Thomas Barritt, sent into Lancashire, instead of Scotland, after the battle of Towton. Similarly, how can it be possible that "in 1189 and 1199 we read of Jews who held land by a statute passed in the reign of Henry III."? Mr. Justice Eyre (whose name may be seen in the list of subscribers to Greenwich Hospital in Evelyn's papers), though his name is rightly spelt on p. 104, on pp. 138 and 139 becomes Mr. Justice Eyres. Such slips are the more irritating inasmuch as Mr. Axon is, in general, an accurate collector of facts, who evidently has a dislike of statements uncorroborated by chapter and verse, and who, so far as we have observed, is not himself obnoxious to any charge of looseness of expression. Perhaps, by the way, the mysterious naval operations of Spain in 1599 can hardly be called "the second attempted invasion of the Spaniards," but the matter may admit of dispute.

Mr. Axon's curious, though disjointed, collection of Lancashire memorabilia vividly reflects the contrasts which are to this day, and perhaps more now than ever, observable among its inhabitants. Nowhere is political feeling apt to run higher, because nowhere have the historical foundations of both Conservative and Liberal opinion been more deeply and more broadly laid. Nowhere is the Church of England in closer and more intimate contact with the life of the people, although both the Church of Rome, on the one hand, and the principal Nonconformist sects on the other, command the loyal adherence of large numbers, because they have all closely intertwined their history with that of different parts of the population, so that the Unitarians have their antiquities as well as the Roman Catholics. It is well known how, at the outbreak of the great Civil War, the discordance between the opposing elements in Lancashire made it difficult, if not impossible, to calculate with certainty upon the part the county would play in the contest. Clarendon's passage on the subject is worth quoting, as illustrating, by a statement characteristically involved, the clashing against one another of Lancashire opinions and interests:—

> The town of Manchester had, from the beginning (out of that factious humour which possessed most corporations, and the pride of their wealth), opposed the King, and declared magisterially for the Parliament. But, as a great part of the county [the original MS. reads "the major part"] consisted of papists, of whose insurrections they had made such use in the beginning of the Parliament, when they had a mind to alarm the people with dangers; as it was confidently believed that there was not one man of ten throughout that county who meant not to be dutiful and loyal to the King; yet the restless spirit of the seditious party was so sedulous and industrious, and every one of the party so ready to be engaged, and punctually to obey; and, on the other hand, the Earl of Derby so inactive, and so uncomplying with those who were fuller of alacrity, and would have proceeded more vigorously against the enemy; or, through want of experience, so irresolute, that, instead of countenancing the King's party in Cheshire, which was expected from him, the Earl, insensibly, found Lancashire to be almost possessed against him; the rebels every day gaining and fortifying all the strong towns, and surprising his troops, without any considerable encounter.

As one turns over Mr. Axon's pages, with their mingled records of Jacobite longings and Puritan endeavours, one understands more readily than ever not only the trouble and turmoil, but also the vigour and vitality, which contrasts such as these have helped to produce in Lancashire. Of course there have been important personages, and even families, that have instinctively, whatever their sympathies or antipathies, kept the barque of their fortunes before the wind. The important family of the Moskys, lords of the manor of Manchester till a comparatively recent date, seem on the whole to have belonged to this class, though the "delinquent" Sir Edward Mosley in the Civil War period had to thank the moderation of the Parliament rather than his own discretion for his escape from worse consequences than a decimation fine. Another Edward Mosley, however, was one of Cromwell's Commissioners for the administration of justice in Scotland, and having had the misfortune to lose his three sons before they had reached manhood, "appears," says Mr. Axon, "to have sought the consolations which Puritan convictions could impart." His only daughter and heiress, who became by marriage Lady Ann Bland, who inherited with the manorial rights the Low Church tendencies of her father, was the chief founder of St. Ann's Church in Manchester, the foundation of which "is generally regarded as having been intended as a protest against the High Church views held at the Collegiate Church." She was a strong opponent of the Jacobitism that was rife in Lancashire during the earlier part of the eighteenth century, and on one occasion was so annoyed "at the eruption of Stuart tartan" in the Manchester Assembly Rooms "that, at the head of the ladies who wore the Orange favours, she went into the street and danced in the moonlight in testimony of her loyal affection to the Protestant succession." On her death the manorial rights passed to the other line of the family, the Jacobitism of whose representative in the days of the '45 does not seem to have involved him in any serious trouble. Ancoats Hall, the ancestral seat of the family, has long passed away, and the rural lanes around it have likewise become a thing of the past. But Ancoats is not altogether devoid of literary and artistic associations of even more recent date, so that the eye of the antiquary may be excused for dwelling lovingly upon its past in the midst of its present griminess.

In conclusion, we may content ourselves with touching on one division of Mr. Axon's multifarious gleanings which has reference to a branch of literary art connected since mediæval times with Lancashire. We may pass by his notes on the traces of the performance of mysteries in this county incidentally given in a rather discursive paper on "Sunday in the Olden Time." If, by the way, the story of the old man who had never heard of the Saviour except in a Corpus Christi play at Kendall proves "that the religious teaching of the mysteries was not very effective" (p. 43), it proves rather more than this against the religious teaching of the period in general, inasmuch as the old man in question "constantly went to Common Prayer" (p. 115). Nor need we more than touch upon a note which scarcely fulfils the expectations excited by its title, "Did Shakspere Visit Lancashire?" and by the motto from "Charlotte Cushman," who seems to be a favourite of Mr. Axon's. The Queen's players were "in the furthest part of Laugkeshire" in 1589, at the New Park in Lathom in 1588, and at Knowsley in 1590; but there is no proof, as Mr. Axon judiciously admits, that Shakspeare was among them, or even a member of the company. Of greater interest is a short paper on "Fair Em," a play with the sub-title of "The Miller's Daughter of Manchester," which, "flat and unprofitable" as Mr. Axon justly calls it, has some claim to notice as having been attributed to Shakspeare. The supposition is absurd, as is the more plausible one which attributed it to Greene, and which is refuted in that most interesting collection, The School of Shakspeare, unhappily the last work of its accomplished editor, the late Mr. Richard Simpson. Whether it is possible to accept Mr. Simpson's demonstration, intended to show that not only is Fair Em a satire upon Greene (an imitation it in part certainly is), but that he believed Shakspeare to be its author, and retorted upon him accordingly, is a more difficult question. Mr. Axon points out that the play, which was performed by Lord Strange's servants (very possibly, or, as Mr. Fleay thinks, very probably, the company in which Shakspeare first acted) and bears the spread eagle, the badge of La Tremouille, on its title-page, contains a few local allusions; we may well suppose it to have been played on occasion at Lathom or Knowsley, where Fair Em, whose father had sought a quiet retreat in a mill at Manchester, would have been a popular heroine. Another dramatic note of Mr. Axon's suggests a curious speculation as to the way in which, after facts have been turned into fiction, fiction may be manufactured back into facts. Some of our readers may remember to have read (for it can scarcely keep the stage now in any form) Lillo's "domestic tragedy" of The Fatal Curiosity. Lillo is the reverse of contemptible as a playwright; and, though his declamation is often hollow and his pathos rancid of the footlights, he was at times able to treat a terrible situation with real intensity. Lessing paid him the most genuine of all compliments—that of imitating him. The particular play called The Fatal Curiosity is not to our mind his most powerful work; but it can hardly be read without something of the horror which the author designed to excite, and, as Mr. Axon reminds us, it suggested one of the most successful of German Schicksalstragödien, Zacharias Werner's 24 Februar. (He might have added that the suggestion came through Goethe, who produced the piece at Weimar, excusing himself to Wieland on the plea that wine-drinkers occasionally like a glass of brandy by way of a change.) The story of Lillo's tragedy is, to put it briefly, that of a father and mother who, being reduced to the extremity of want, murder a visitor to their house for the sake of his casket of jewels, and afterwards find that their victim was their son. Returning home after an absence of many years, he had been prompted by curiosity to visit his parents incognito in the first instance, and his mother, in her turn, had had the curiosity to examine the stranger's box while he was taking an opportune nap. This story Lillo took from a pamphlet purporting to narrate the catastrophe (with a slight variation) as having occurred at "Perin" (Penryn, the scene of the drama) in the year 1616. As observed, the play, or adaptations of it, were frequently performed in England in the last century, and it has not remained unknown in Germany. Dunlop, cited by Mr. Axon, mentions the same story as told by Vincenzo Reta in a novella written early in the last century, but not printed till 1794. Its scene is here laid at Brescia: in another version mentioned by Dunlop the story plays in a Norman inn. Under these circumstances, is Mr. Axon justified in a sceptical surmise that a very similar story, which thrilled the readers of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse early in June 1880, was only another version of the same myth? The Young Wilmot of the play is here a young Viennese who had made his fortune in America, and the mother, who perpetrates the deed alone, is an innkeeper. But there is no other essential difference in the plot, the "weak" or "unnatural" part of which is the wish of the returning son to keep his identity concealed for a few days from his mother after revealing it to his brothers (just as Wilmot in the play reveals himself to his loved Charlot and to an old servant). We commend the investigation to those who are interested in the freaks of legend, or in the freaks of journalists, as well as to those who believe that crime, too, occasionally repeats itself. While on the subject of dramatic materials, we cannot help expressing our surprise that in permitting himself (very unnecessarily, we should say) "a slight digression" on a certain famous but apocryphal seigniorial right, Mr. Axon should have forgotten the use made of the tradition by Beaumarchais.

Much curious information of different kinds, on which it would be difficult to comment without giving to this article the looseness of texture to which we have taken exception in Mr. Axon's volume, will be found scattered through his pages. His research, the fruits of which are not likely to have been exhausted by his present production, his industry, of which it gives abundant proofs, and the good sense and good humour with which he treats his varied themes, encourage us to look for further and more solid work from the same hand.

THE CUP AND THE FALCON.[*]

IN their present form Lord Tennyson's latest dramatic works reveal, even more clearly than their stage presentment did, the slightness of their dramatic quality. Deprived of the glamour that enveloped their production at the theatres, where the magnificence of the mise-en-scène was scarcely less notable than the excellence of the interpretation, their defects become manifest. Despite several admirable passages of splendid rhetoric and glowing declamation, both The Cup and The Falcon are strangely deficient in vitality, in actuality, and in animation. It is unnecessary to add that they contain much poetic beauty, an exquisite felicity of language, and striking imagery. But there is also much mere verbal sonority and imposing harmony in the verse which, pleasurable to the ear, possesses little significance on the stage. With singular lack of discrimination, some of the most impressive and exalted poetry in The Cup is delivered by the treacherous voluptuary Synorix, and elsewhere the poet has distributed the jewels of his unequalled store of diction with strange impartiality. Hence the characters are deficient in force, are shadowy and colourless, and excite neither interest nor emotion. Sinnatus and Synorix are very feebly opposed; the excellence of the one, the villainy of the other, are not dramatically displayed and vividly contrasted by gradual and subtle self-revelation: Camma is a beautiful and stately figure, and nothing more; she has suffered unpardonable affront and inexpiable wrong; she meditates revenge, and yet moves us not, and with the most tremendous passion in her heart, is cold, self-contained, and statuesque to the end. When Sinnatus discovers the supposed Strato to be the notorious Synorix, and might well surmise the nature of his interview with Camma, he expresses himself with scarcely any of the sudden wrath of an ingenuous nature. THE RADICAL DE PROFUNDIS.

THE state of mind into which the scare of last Saturday appears to have thrown a considerable section of the Liberal party is natural but amusing. The occultation of Mr. GLADSTONE (whose illness deserves and meets with much sympathy), the narrow escape from defeat, and the growing difficulties of their favourite Administration appear to have produced in Radicals a mingled state of wrath and terror, which they must pardon unconcerned persons for finding somewhat ludicrous. Accordingly all the methods available are being tried. There is plenty of strong language, from the HOME SECRETARY'S "dirty "trick" (which it would be very unfair to attribute to Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT) downwards. The fiery cross has been sent round to rouse the Caucuses; the robust provincial Liberal is entreated to march metaphorically on this wicked London. And, finally, irregular regiments of correspondents are rapidly recruited for the purpose of writing to express the disgust of "independent Conserva- "tives," the wrath of patriotic Liberals, and the desire of Liberals generally for a good Reform Bill "to reunite the "party." This last somewhat naïf cry has at least one advantage over the remaining notes in the rather discordant concert. It sounds genuine. This is a great deal more than can be said for the passionate demonstrations of the unpatriotic conduct of the Opposition which some Radicals (as Mr. LABOUCHERE unkindly reminds them) have been transcribing almost textually from the Tory newspapers of five or six years ago. Now the honest correspondent who has just been quoted about reuniting the party (there are several of them, and they vary between "reuniting," "in- "spiriting," and so forth) is at any rate honest. He is a JOHNSTONE imploring MAXWELLS to lay aside little differences, and join in a merry expedition to lift the cattle of the glaikit Englisher; a FAGIN striving to compose the differences of Mr. SIKES and Mr. CRACKIT for the better confusion of householders with bloated plate-chests. In him and in his kind there is at least no hypocrisy.

But with the other and larger kind, from Home Secretaries to halfpenny newspaper-writers, who talk about dirty tricks and whine over the base attempts of the Opposition to undermine the best of Governments, the case is different. If they are in earnest they must be very silly people indeed; if they are not in earnest their language is simply blague, and not very clever blague. From every point of view, from the lowest to the highest, the recent conduct of the Opposition is perfectly defensible. How often have Radicals, with a frankness that happened to suit their purpose, informed the world that at least one main object of this Franchise Bill is to cut the ground from under the feet of their political opponents? It is patriotism, it seems, to bring in Bills with such an object, and it is want of patriotism in the other side to delay them. Again, even the political child-in-arms is scarcely deceivable by the application of the term "dirty trick" to the division of Saturday. To whom was this Saturday sitting in the second month of the Session due? To the Government. Whose business was it, knowing perfectly well that any subject can be raised in Supply, and that this subject certainly would be raised, to be ready for votes and voices? The Government's. The other talk about "unholy alliances" and the like is made up of another variety of the same stuff and the same nonsense. When, as Liberals have done constantly, and Conservatives oftener than they should, Englishmen have stooped to buy Irish votes by tampering with Irish treason, that is an unholy alliance. If Conservatives had voted for a motion Radical in substance, that would be an unholy alliance. But what was Mr. LABOUCHERE'S motion? That the necessity for the costly battles of Teb and Tamanieb "has not been made "apparent." Will any Ministerialist deny that that is the honest and repeatedly expressed opinion of every man on the Tory benches and, it may be added, the honest opinion, if they dared express it, of a good many men on the Liberal benches? Are Conservatives—or, for the matter of that, are in the parallel case Liberals—to be debarred from voting for a proposition which they have steadily contended for because the mover happens to be a person with whom on other points they disagree? The thing is absurd, and the men who say it know it to be absurd, and only say it because they are at their wits' end what to say, and are yet conscious, with the desperate consciousness of fear, that they must say something. Whatever comes of this Radical panic, one curious fact is not likely to be forgotten, and that is the way in which mere reliance on Mr. GLADSTONE has taken the place of argument, common sense, and everything else with the Radical party. It is a pity that there is no independent political caricaturist of genius among us now. The sudden outburst of shrieks, and complaints, and calls for aid directly Mr. GLADSTONE goes away for a day or two may be seen exactly represented by the individual human infant when it is abandoned by its nurse and a naughty boy teases it.

All this, however, is merely the ludicrous side of the matter. There is a much more serious side as well. The intolerable bungling of the Government in Egypt is admitted by all but the staunchest led-captains and sworn advocates of the party. The very journals in the country as well as in the capital which support the Ministry and denounce the Opposition in almost every case accompany their support and their denunciations by wishes that Mr. GLADSTONE would accept the situation a little more fully, by confessions that grave mistakes have been committed hitherto, by hints that the country would like a more definite and a more definitely announced policy. Yet when the Opposition takes the only steps possible to satisfy these reasonable wishes, when it translates them from the bated breath of humble friendliness into the straightforward language of men who have no reason to mince their words, a howl about factiousness, and want of patriotism, and want of scruple rises from Liberal lips. Now every one of the gravest faults of the Government was committed while it was free from the criticism of the Opposition, and every advance towards an intelligible and reasonable policy has been made under the direct pressure (and directly as a consequence of the pressure) which Ministerial advocates choose to describe as obstruction, and faction, and exultation in national disasters. Had Parliament been sitting continuously, it is nearly certain that HICKS PASHA'S expedition would have been either definitely prohibited or properly equipped. It is quite certain that Sinkat would not have fallen, and that BAKER PASHA'S expedition would never have met with its disaster. It is all but certain that General GRAHAM'S expedition would not have been required at all. Yet for exercising the beneficial influence that it has exercised; for doing its duty to the country; for insisting, and in spite of only partial success continuing to insist, that the policy of pottering and blundering shall be given up, the Opposition is stated and shrieked at. Not that it is accused, even by such critics, of having caused any disaster in Egypt; that, in the face of the facts, would be too much even for English gullibility. Not that it is interposing difficulties in the way of the Government action; for all the difficulties that exist are, and are known to be, of the Government's own creation. The reason for censure is avowedly that this attention of the nation's representatives to the most important business of the nation interferes with the progress of a partisan measure which is openly announced as partisan, as to the future effect of which many even of those who support it have, in their places in Parliament, avowed the gravest misgivings, and in favour of which the desperate efforts of Caucuses and Federations and all the rest of the Radical machinery have failed hitherto to produce the slightest manifestation of national enthusiasm. It is infamous to delay discussion of the point whether Wesleyan ministers shall have votes by insisting that the lives of English soldiers shall not be flung away without some clear prospect of advantage to England. It is a crime to demand some statement of the intentions of the English Government in dealing with the greatest windfall which has ever dropped into England's lap because the demand interferes with ingenious operations destined to make the return of a Tory majority impossible for some years. Of course no one who puts these arguments forward, and not one in three of those who hear or read them, really attaches the slightest weight to them. But that they should be gravely put forward at all shows one of three things. Either the Radical party has completely lost its head; or its political perspective is in a hopelessly distorted condition; or, lastly (the least complimentary, but the most probable, solution), its leaders and spokesmen consider that anything is good enough for their followers. Of that they must be the best judges. But no one who is reasonably impartial, and has any power of political judgment, will find fault with the tactics of the Opposition, except that they might have lost less time in beginning to apply them, and have applied them more vigorously. For they have on two different grounds the strongest possible right to oppose the Government à outrance. Every Englishman has a right to insist that the interests of England shall not be neglected. Every politician has a right to insist that a party move to his own disadvantage shall not take precedence of those interests.

CONTINENTAL ALLIANCES.

A RECENT revival or extension of friendly relations between Germany and Russia has probably not been recorded in any formal document. A great Russian noble of high diplomatic rank has been transferred from Paris to Berlin, where he is personally acceptable both to the Court and to the Minister. Official and semi-official journals discontinue for the time their notices of concentrations of troops on the Western frontier of Russia, and they rather hint than assert that Russia has explicitly or practically joined the alliance to which Germany, Austria, and to a certain extent Italy, are parties. It is not yet known whether the new combination is heartily approved at Vienna; but there is no doubt that a cordial understanding with Austria is an essential element in Prince BISMARCK's foreign policy. His main object is the maintenance of peace, which is only liable to be disturbed by concert between France and either Austria or Russia. The greatest diplomatic triumph of his life was the neutralization of one of the two Imperial Powers by the aid of the other during the French war of 1870. Austria, which was then held in check by fear of a Russian attack, is now united with Germany by ties of friendship founded originally on a common distrust of Russia. It was only when Prince GORTCHAKOFF openly courted a French alliance that Prince BISMARCK formed a close union with Austria. As long as it lasts Germany has little need to fear a French war of retaliation, while Austria is guaranteed against Panslavonic intrigues and secured in the possession of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It is improbable that any serious cause of direct quarrel should arise between Germany and Russia; and there is still less chance that the interests of France should clash with those of Austria. It was a master-stroke of policy to find in the Austrian jealousy of Russia a security against the danger of French resentment. The exclusion of Austria from the German Federation in 1866 had already ended the secular rivalry with Prussia which rendered, as long as it existed, the restoration of German unity impossible.

The reconciliation between Germany and Russia has naturally caused a certain feeling of anxiety among Austrian statesmen. The Chancellor, Count KALNOKY, is understood to retain the friendly feeling to Russia which he cultivated during his embassy to St. Petersburg. The PRIME MINISTER of Hungary is perhaps less easily satisfied. In answer to an interpellation in the Hungarian Parliament, Mr. TISZA, without expressing any opinion on Prince BISMARCK's latest political measure, contented himself with the statement that no change was likely to occur in the relations between the German Empire and the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. As long as the alliance is cordially maintained nothing is to be feared from Russia either as a friend or an enemy. A rumour that the Russian Government has offered once more to recognize the possession by Austria of the Balkan provinces is proved by internal evidence to be inaccurate. The engagements to which Russia assented in the Treaty of Berlin could only be weakened by a repetition, which would imply that they had been originally insufficient. Periodical or chronic struggles for influence in the minor neighbouring States will probably continue in spite of any understanding which may be established. For the time Roumania and Servia seem to incline to the policy of Austria; Bulgaria will perhaps be always a dependency of Russia. One of the advantages which Austria derives from the German alliance consists in the assured good-will of the Italian Government. A separate understanding with Austria might perhaps have been unpopular in Italy; but even a qualified admission to the league of the two Empires forms the best security against French aggression. Modern theories on nationality had served the purpose of Italian patriots so well that sanguine politicians might in the first instance be excused for thinking it possible to annex the former provinces of Venice on the eastern coast of the Adriatic. More serious politicians understood the danger of perpetuating a contest with the superior force of Austria; and the movement has long since fallen under the exclusive control of revolutionary demagogues. The Republicans who utter empty threats against Austria are also the professed enemies of the Italian Constitution and dynasty; and consequently both Governments have a common interest in repressing a troublesome agitation.

Prince BISMARCK has caused some surprise by ostentatiously courting the friendship of Spain for the apparent purpose of completing the isolation of France. In this, as in other combinations, he has probably taken into consideration domestic as well as foreign politics. Although the doctrines avowed by the Holy Alliance of seventy years ago are not likely to be openly professed in the present day, statesmen who are charged with the maintenance of social order are not likely to regard with indifference the advance of democracy, and the simultaneous progress of anarchy. The communism of Germany, of Russia, and of Spain has many characteristics in common; and probably the Nihilist agitation has had something to do with the late approximation of the CZAR to the Central European League. The Government of France is probably regarded with suspicion merely because it is Republican, although it has never been seriously accused of reviving the propagandism of the old Convention. The conspiracies against the Spanish monarchy which have been organized by ZORRILLA and his confederates are of Spanish origin, though private French sympathizers may perhaps have been concerned in some of the plots. A more important circumstance is the undisputed dependence of the foreign policy of Spain on the form of its Government. King ALFONSO has given a cordial reception to the overtures which were made through the Imperial CROWN PRINCE; and probably his present Minister concurs in his leaning to the German alliance. The re-establishment of the Republic would imply a close union between Spain and France, which might possibly affect the balance of power in Europe. The same leaning of the Conservative party to Germany and of democratic politicians to France is found in Italy; but in that country the dynasty appears to be more firmly established than in Spain. The Italian Government has also been exempt from military mutinies of the Spanish type; though GARIBALDI, while he lived, more than once assumed for himself the right of making war without the sanction of his Government.

English curiosity as to the Continental relations of their own Government is compelled to satisfy itself with occasional assurances that there is a friendly understanding with the two great central Powers. There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement as far as Germany is concerned; nor is Austria likely to cultivate the irritation which was formerly justified by the rash language of the present PRIME MINISTER. A further advance from Bosnia in the direction of Salonica would perhaps still excite Mr. GLADSTONE's whimsical susceptibilities; but probably no such movement is at present intended, and the great majority of English politicians would prefer that Austria rather than Russia should profit by the decadence of Turkey. The encouragement or toleration which Prince BISMARCK has extended to English schemes of aggrandizement has been consistent, though it may proceed from motives not always flattering to national vanity. Some years ago Prince BISMARCK is believed to have offered Egypt to Lord BEACONSFIELD, perhaps for the same reasons which had induced the Emperor NICHOLAS to make a similar suggestion thirty years ago. A statesman not directly interested in the matter might perhaps dispassionately approve an intelligible and consistent policy; but he could scarcely regret the probable antagonism which might be aroused between France and England. There can be little doubt that on the same grounds Prince BISMARCK regards with complacency the destruction of English property by French bombardments in Madagascar, the approaching exclusion of English commerce from Tonquin, and the fantastic efforts to monopolize the trade of the Congo. As long as such enterprises are systematically prosecuted, no treaty or negotiation is needed to detach England from a French alliance.

It would be unwise to attach excessive importance to the reconciliation between the Governments of Germany and of Russia. The understanding, even if it had been embodied in a formal treaty, would only last as long as the causes which rendered a friendly understanding expedient. Any serious difference would probably lead to the renewal of intrigues between France and Russia. The position of Austria in the Balkan peninsula furnishes the most likely pretext for a quarrel, in which Germany would almost certainly take the part of her most favoured ally. The combinations and ruptures between Germany and Russia have been repeatedly and rapidly modified. Only a few years have passed since the Berlin Note, signed by the three Imperial Powers, seemed to indicate a permanent union for the execution of a settled policy. A year or two afterwards Prince BISMARCK thwarted the designs of Russia at the Berlin Conference, and facilitated the acquisition by Austria of two Turkish provinces. The change which has since occurred may be partially explained by personal reasons. Prince GORTCHAKOFF was supposed to have become in his later years jealous of Prince BISMARCK's conspicuous success, and of the primacy which was voluntarily assigned to him by European statesmen. M. DE GIERS is more judicious and more temperate, and the Emperor ALEXANDER III. is believed at present not to cherish ambitious aspirations. If he should become desirous of an increase of territory, his new ally will have no wish to counteract schemes of aggrandizement in Central Asia. The project of SKOBELEFF to overrun the plains of India with the wild cavalry of Central Asia has not been officially accepted as a part of the civilizing mission of Russia. SKOBELEFF's amiable watchword of "Blood and Russia" is not yet pronounced.

EGYPT.

THE reported flight of OSMAN DIGMA would, if confirmed, be chiefly important because there would then be no danger of Admiral HEWETT's ill-advised and now cancelled Proclamation being taken too literally. Its effect on future operations, at least immediate operations, is not likely to be great. The tremendous slaughter at Teb and Tamanieb has probably not broken the spirit of the tribes, but it has left comparatively few of them with any spirit to break. Unless the Government is prepared to order a march to Berber—and this must be ordered at once unless the hot season is to be faced—it is very far from evident what other gain has been derived from the two battles. They have not undone the mischief of General BARER's defeat, and they have not recalled the dead garrison of Sinkat to life. But this is an old story, and Radical apologists who have not the consistency of Mr. LABOUCHERE may be left to argue that OSMAN DIGMA could only be prevented from throwing the garrison of Souakim into the sea, not by letting him come and try it, but by going out in two different directions into the country and killing or wounding some ten thousand Arabs. If the result of the expedition to Souakim is that a proper hold is established on the Nile at Berber, a good thing will have been done in an extremely expensive and clumsy way. If that is not its result, and it is now a result by no means easy to bring about with European troops, the bloodshed, the expenditure, and the exhibition of bungling and hesitation will have been entirely fruitless.

The relative ignorance of some weeks ago as to Khartoum has been changed into ignorance positive and complete. Some days have now passed since the telegraph was cut above Berber, and nothing is known of General GORDON's position, save from disquieting rumours and from the fact that just before the cutting of the wire his prospects were far from cheerful. The rumours are now very disquieting indeed, and they come from quarters not very likely to be alarmist. It is said that Khartoum is surrounded on all sides but the river, and that the besiegers are in earnest, and led by fanatical chiefs. Against them General GORDON has nothing but the troops of whose unworthiness Colonel DE COETLOGON gave a too convincing account months ago, and his force is in point of numbers even more inadequate to the holding of a large extent of works, such as that which defends Khartoum, than was his predecessor's. The movements of these excitable barbarians are so rapid that it is quite possible the next despatch may tell of their dispersal. But it should not be forgotten that it is reliance on these "quite possibles" which has brought about every disaster in the whole mismanaged business. The most enthusiastic advocates of the Government plan of waiting for a miracle admit that the death of General GORDON, if not the capture of Khartoum, would be an almost crushing blow to Mr. GLADSTONE and his policy. Yet there is nothing to avert such a blow except the chapter of accidents, although Khartoum might long ago have been made impregnable. Even now the old cuckoo cry of danger to General GORDON if troops were sent is faintly raised. It is only to be hoped that the very obvious danger which awaits General GORDON because troops have not been sent may be prevented by one of those miracles which it seems to be thought are at the special disposal of the PRIME MINISTER, even when he refuses his miracle-worker the rods and tackle which he demands. The actual fall of Khartoum would be so great a disaster that, though it would be still less of a disaster than of a crime on the part of the Ministry, it is impossible not to hope even against reason and probability. It is now announced positively, though not officially, that the Government will not assent to General GORDON's request for ZOBEIR as a diadochus. Considering that the Government asserted and reiterated that he went out with full powers and their entire confidence, that this is his first recommendation of importance, and that they have refused it, the complete darkness which rests upon their policy and intentions can only be said to have become still more palpable. Whether anything passed on the subject in those mysterious Cabinet Councils of which no two Ministers give the same account, but in which Mr. GLADSTONE seems to have played the part of the once famous Invisible Girl, has not yet been ascertained; and the breaking of the telegraph gives the Government a convenient excuse for exercising their one talent of silence. Meanwhile, though the importance of maintaining Anglo-Egyptian rule at Khartoum, which has been argued for steadily since November last, has been somewhat compromised by the fantastic kind of support which it has received in some quarters, it is evidently becoming more and more familiar to the country. The bold speech of Mr. LAING some days ago, and the scanty support which the Government was able to muster on Saturday, alike showed this in different ways. It has been said—not by a Conservative journal, nor by a corrupt organ of London Liberalism inspired by wicked men who frequent Pall Mall Clubs and have relations in the army, but by a provincial Liberal paper of the first rank, the Manchester Guardian—that "we shall probably end in advancing to Berber and "Khartoum," and that "the Government has a big game "to play, but the country will support it in playing that "game." It may be wished that Liberals had spoken thus plainly a few months ago, for it would have saved many lives, much money, and a lamentable display of political incapacity. But it is all the more satisfactory that they should speak so now.

The game to play in the Soudan is, and has been for more than a quarter of a year, perfectly plain to any one of political capacity. The relief of the smaller and less important garrisons in the East, the recall (if their maintenance seemed impossible and their withdrawal possible) of the remoter, the support at all hazards of Khartoum and any other posts necessary for the retention of the river highway, in order that at a more fortunate moment the interior may once more be opened up—these things formed the programme which seemed best four months ago, and it is the programme which seems best now, though some of its minor parts are past praying for, though the season in which it was feasible at once and with ease has passed by, and though heavy additional disasters have followed on its neglect. It is not too late, however, even now, and there is no doubt that half the difficulties of the Government would vanish if Mr. GLADSTONE could bring himself to accept the facts. In itself the release of the Government from those difficulties which it has created for itself is not a matter about which it is necessary to be very enthusiastic. But Englishmen who are not mere partisans care much less for the person who is benefitted by consulting the interests of England than for the interests of England themselves. It is unfortunately not those interests only which are suffering from Mr. GLADSTONE'S obstinate irresolution in Egypt proper. Under the withering influence of an occupation which may terminate at any moment, and which yet interferes with the whole government of the country in a tentative and half-hearted way, that luckless country is becoming one of the most distressful in the world. Its credit is paralysed because the bombarders of Alexandria will not say the word which, at no cost to themselves, would cause funds to flow in to pay the expenses of the bombardment. It has an army pour rire of its own and an army to fight of Englishmen, both of which it has to pay for. It cannot exercise those police regulations which are necessary in Eastern countries, because European Consuls support the malefactors. It is not allowed to govern itself in its own way, and we refuse to govern it effectively in ours. In a fortnight's time Egypt, if Mr. GLADSTONE would only allow it, could be put under a government as cheap, as efficient, as just, as profitable, as its present government is costly, paralytic, unjust, and ruinous. The scandalous and ridiculous trios of English and French officials to trip up each other, with an Egyptian official to look on, would vanish; the conflict of native habit and English judicial ideas would be resolved at once by experienced Indian officials; the public estates would be managed at half the cost and with twice the efficiency; the constantly ebullient freaks of popular insolence and military mutiny would be suppressed once for all. In the way of this there is nothing but the fancied indignation of the European Powers and the real reluctance of Mr. GLADSTONE to confess that he has been wrong. The European Powers have no locus standi in objecting to anything except annexation or a definitely perpetual protectorate, neither of which is necessary nor desirable; and, if Mr. GLADSTONE'S susceptibilities stand in the way of the plain needs of England and of Egypt, there is an extremely easy way out of that difficulty.

THE CATTLE BILL.

THE debate on the second reading of Mr. DODSON'S Cattle Bill in the House of Commons does not promise well for the Parliamentary future of the measure. Several of the supporters of the Government announced that they would only vote for Mr. DODSON now on the distinct understanding that they were going to support him in trying to remove the amendments made in the House of Lords. The Opposition, for their part, consider these very amendments as the most essential part of the Bill. A difference of opinion of this magnitude will lead doubtless to prolonged and angry debates in Committee, in the course of which Liberal members who represent the agricultural interest may again have the unpleasant experience of finding themselves in the presence of a divided duty. For the present, and in spite of the good-will of a great majority of the House, the Bill has had difficulties on the second reading. Liberals may be willing to get it into Committee with the intention of removing the Duke of RICHMOND'S corrections, and Conservatives may be ready to help with precisely opposite designs, but the Irish members must first have their say. Of course the intervention of these gentlemen took the traditional form. They discovered with all their usual sagacity that Ireland was threatened with a new grievance. They found cause to believe that Irish cattle might be excluded from the English market under the terms of the Bill. There is absolutely nothing either in the measure itself or in the speeches made by English speakers to suggest that the Irish cattle trade would ever be liable to any such danger; but it was enough that Mr. HEALY and Mr. KENNY saw it in the far distance, and therefore they proceeded to talk the Bill out. Its further progress will depend on the zeal felt by the Ministry for the Franchise Bill. It was a more satisfactory feature of the debate that the opponents of the Bill contrived to argue with tolerable good temper. Mr. FORSTER, who has lately been helping to cook an agitation against it in London by threatening the inhabitants of towns with a vast increase in their butcher's bill, to be imposed by law for the benefit of landlords, confined himself in the House of Commons to giving reminiscences of his own anxieties in the days when he was President of the Council. Mr. BRYCE did not go much beyond complaining that he and another had been accused by Mr. CHAPLIN of speaking as the mouthpieces of a butchers' ring. He found this habit of imputing ignoble motives to one's opponents unfair, and it is hoped that he will succeed in bringing some of his allies over to his opinion. Even Mr. ARNOLD was temperate. He was concerned for the good of the souls of the Ministers who have to carry out the Bill, and who may be subjected to the temptation to use it for purposes of protection against other things than foot-and-mouth disease. Even the fear of Protection, however, did not lead him to do more than accuse the country members of old-fashioned opinions.

The merits of the question have already been so thoroughly discussed that nothing new could well be said in the course of Tuesday's debate. Authorities on the subject of foot-and-mouth disease have not yet been able to decide whether it is wholly a foreign importation, or whether it has not contrived to naturalize itself in this country. The view they respectively take seems to depend on the degree of their connexion with the business of cattle rearing. Sir L. PLAYFAIR, who can afford to consider the whole subject in a scientific spirit, gave some unpleasantly plausible reasons for his belief that, although the plague was undoubtedly a foreigner fifty years ago, it has now taken its place among our native evils. He and other speakers who think cheap meat of more importance than the prosperity of farmers made the most of the argument that it is impossible to keep out infection completely. The representatives of the country constituencies did not attempt to deny the proposition; but, as Mr. CHAPLIN insisted, it does not follow that because we must run some danger, we should run more than is absolutely necessary. It has been proved by experience that the foot-and-mouth disease can be kept out, or, when it has once appeared, can be stamped out by rigid measures of precaution. The example of Ireland is in favour of Mr. CHAPLIN'S view. Foot-and-mouth disease has only appeared there once, and then it was undoubtedly imported from England. If Ireland can be defended by measures of rigid precaution, so can Great Britain. The real question is, what amount of sacrifice the country may be reasonably asked to make for the sake of the agricultural interest. There can be no doubt that, if all importation is to be prohibited from countries in which the disease has appeared, there will be some fall in the foreign meat supply. It has not yet been even approximately settled what the deficiency will be. The calculations made range from six to twenty-five per cent. The latter of these figures is unquestionably a gross exaggeration, but some deficiency is inevitable. It may be made good in time by the increased importation of dead meat, but for the moment the loss will be felt. The advocates of the Bill have, however, no reason for fearing to look the fact in the face. A permanent injury to the agricultural interest is a far greater evil than a temporary increase in the price of meat, and the country may fairly be asked to make the sacrifice for its own ultimate good. At present the loss falls almost wholly on the farmers and the landed interest. The loss of home-grown meat is made good to the town population by importation from abroad. In the long run, however, the loss must fall on the country at large, and by protecting the farmers the towns are also protecting themselves.

When the Bill does at length reach Committee, the House will be mainly engaged in deciding how far the measures of precaution to be taken are to extend. The Ministry, having the fear of the next General Election before its eyes, has made up its mind that something must be done; but it differs from the Opposition as to the amount. As the Bill has been amended by the Duke of RICHMOND, the Privy Council will be bound to prohibit the landing of cattle from countries as to which it is not sure that the laws and the general sanitary condition "are such as to afford reasonable security against the "importation therefrom of animals afflicted with foot and-"mouth disease." The Ministry had only asked for powers to prohibit importation when there was not a reasonable security that the laws of the country from which the cattle came and its general sanitary condition were satisfactory. This apparently slight variation in the words of the Government Bill make all the difference between leaving the Privy Council a discretion and leaving it none at all. The House of Lords has also struck out a sixth clause, by which the operation of the Bill was limited to two years. Mr. DODSON has announced that the House of Commons will be asked to reject both the amendments of the Lords. Unless, however, the majority which supported Mr. CHAPLIN last Session has greatly modified its opinion, he can scarcely hope to restore the Bill to its original form. The complaint of country members has always been that the Privy Council used the powers it already had too timidly, and they wish to see it tightly bound down to carry out measures of strict precaution. From the moment that Mr. DODSON asks for a wider discretion for the Privy Council, he may reasonably be suspected of intending to do as little as possible. The same objection applies to his proposal to restore the two years' limit. The farmers do not look upon the Bill as an experiment. In their opinion, the question of the necessity of putting a stop to importation from tainted countries has been settled, and what they ask for is a permanent defence. They declare themselves ready to submit to severe local restrictions, but they insist that they must not be subjected to unnecessary risk Neither they nor their representatives nor anybody who has a serious interest in the prosperity of agriculture will be content with a Bill which has all the appearance of an expedient to tide over a Ministerial difficulty.

THE ROMANCE OF LONDON.

"SWINBURNE began with light carnations," Mr. MONCURE CONWAY has been telling the Sunday Lecture Society. This is the kind of remark that one needs to take home and ponder on piously, till next Sunday at least. "SWINBURNE began with light carnations"; it sounds like the voice of one crying "TENNYSON began with "mixed biscuits," or "BROWNING started in variegated "annuals." However Mr. MONCURE CONWAY has been all round the world, with his eagle eye fixed on London during the whole time of his wanderings, and his gifted intellect occupied in studying the town from the most remote points of view. His remarks, though occasionally enigmatic, are, on the whole, creditable specimens of anecdotic rhetoric, sporting about on a Sunday evening. Before examining the Vision of Romantic London as vouchsafed to Mr. CONWAY, we must make an effort to explain what is meant by Mr. SWINBURNE and the light carnations. For our own part, if we had been asked to describe Mr. SWINBURNE'S beginning, we should have said that he began by getting the Spectator to print Faustine. That was a stroke of humour. But by "light carnations" Mr. CONWAY means trifles like Anactoria and Dolores, blossoms of fire and foam, so to speak, which Mr. SWINBURNE wove before he came into contact with life in London. "The "great dumb heart of London appealed to him," as the great dumb heart had previously appealed, Mr. CONWAY declares, to Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD and CHARLES KINGSLEY. The dumbness proved catching in the case of these bards, and they sang no more. One might explain this by the hypothesis that they had passed the singing age; but Mr. CONWAY has a right to his own opinion. The great dumb heart, when it appealed to Mr. SWINBURNE, made him drop his light carnations, "and burst out with "his sublime Songs before Sunrise." There must be a good deal to say about London if it can really turn two poets dumb and another vocal, "flaring like a dreary dawn," with diverse consequences, on three modern MEMNONS.

Wandering round the world in his romantic way, Mr CONWAY finds that London's hand goes forth to every land. Everywhere almost you find the more than Chemitic pyramid of Bass, the greatest pyramid of all. Everywhere, by paying a trifle, you can get a private view of the design in which some wild ducks are rising from the bubbling fount of Apollinaris Water. These things do indeed fill a man's heart with "cosmic emotion," which Mr. CONWAY says he feels when he stands on London Bridge. "The picturesque effect of the forest of masts is height-"ened by a cosmic emotion"—and cheap at the price —"for we behold the argosies whose silver sails are "bearing benefits to every part of the earth, fulfilling "dreams that lured JASON and ULYSSES and all who "voyaged beyond old sunsets to find new dawns for "humanity." This is the right kind of eloquence for a pleasant Sunday evening. Mr. CONWAY spoke, with some natural contempt, of the mere every-day parson and his Sunday toils. "When will terminate the great weekly Sab-"batarian sacrifice by which the culture and refinement of "the poor are bound on the altar of a heartless dogma," while "the human praying-machines around us grind out "long prayers to empty pews or sleepy congregations!" There are still men not wholly devoid of taste who prefer the liturgy of the Church of England to silver sails and cosmic emotion. But Mr. CONWAY must not think that the clergy are all mere praying-machines. We have heard a humble probationer of the Kirk of Scotland deliver an address before which even the carnations of Mr. CONWAY would pale. He was speaking to the descendants of the Cameronians in a kirk surrounded by the graves of martyrs like precious Mr. PEDEN. "My brethren," he cried, and we think his remarks quite deserve a place beside Mr. CONWAY'S, "fix your eyes on a small island, far, far away in "the western main. A man is sitting on a rock with his "gaze sweeping the mysterious sea; he is CHRISTOPHER "COLUMBUS, and the island is Terceira. That man is dis-"covering the new world. But look again, on a yet "smaller island in the Mediterranean Sea. There sits "another man with his gaze fixed on the skies. The island "is Patmos; the man is St. JOHN. He is discovering the "only geographical fact known to us about the world of the "future, that there shall be no more sea. Where is "Christopher Columbus now?"

It will be admitted that cosmic emotion and daring eloquence are not peculiar to Sunday lecturers who have just circumnavigated the globe. To our mind the humble preacher in "the land of the wild Scots" could give points even to Mr. MONCURE CONWAY. That cosmic emotion can be got out of the reflection that sized shirtings and "park "palings" are carried everywhere by our silver sails, proves the accuracy of Mr. CONWAY'S ingenious theory. "We are "adapting ourselves to coal soot in a mental way also." That is precisely what we are doing, and what, to be fair, Mr. CONWAY helps us to do. Spartam nactus es, he seems to say to the cockney; you have London for your portion, make the best of it. The gist of Mr. CONWAY'S remarks in this direction is perfectly sensible, true, and manly. Here we all are, millions of people, condemned by circumstance to live in London. It is dirty (pace Mr. CONWAY), it is unhealthy, it is hideous, it is unnatural. But let us make the best of it, improve it when we can, reflect on the historical romance of it, and oppose the Parks Railway Bill. The last piece of advice is not Mr. CONWAY'S, but it is not unworthy of his eloquence. He shows us, what is true enough, that better men than we have tolerated London. Mr. ARNOLD, despite "the rural PAN," told the American reporters that he liked the "dear damned delightful town," though he did not venture on that quotation. CARLYLE told Mr. CONWAY, "I can't help liking London, if only for its sublime in-"difference to what one says about it." Ecclefechan might not have shown the same indifference to Mr. CARLYLE'S strictures, and the results might have been unpleasant for the Prophet of Cheyne Walk. Even Mr. CONWAY'S enthusiasm gives up our street architecture, but he consoles himself by the romance of Dick Whittington. But, remembering that it was Sunday, Mr. CONWAY passed, by an agreeable transition, from the moral Whittington and his business-like cat to the aristocratic profligacy of the Marquis de Carabas and the irregularities of Puss in Boots. From these things to ABRAHAM LINCOLN, splitting rails, is the shortest step on a Sunday evening, and thence it is no distance to SWEDENBORG, whose visions began after too much beefsteak at the "Blue Posts." The real romance of London consists in its endless number of historical, mythical, social associations. Protestants used to be burned at Smithfield before Mr. CONWAY'S time. When he came up to town atheists used to lecture there on Sunday. Here is change, if you like, here is progress, but "that, too, was not found useful," as Mr. CONWAY puts it, mildly. The atheists, as he says, with really diverting satire, were "invited to go to the Hall of Science and a "Meat Market appeared there"—in Smithfield, that is, not in the Hall of Science. That a meat market is more useful than atheists, and less inhuman than the roasting of Protestants; that the migration of atheism to the Hall of Science is a natural evolution; that the whole whirligig of change is highly romantic, who will deny? Mr. CONWAY is, perhaps, no less interesting when he describes the sea as "that proud institution." "The necessities," he cries, "of "millions are at work like the minute coral-builders beneath "the sea: presently that proud institution will split on a "reef, and at length a fair island will be seen above the "waste of waters."

London, like the majestic ocean, is a proud institution. Its waves roar raging (Mr. CONWAY'S eloquence is infectious) down the narrow straits of the Strand, or thunder all the week long through Piccadilly. The winds of commerce, law, politics beat on the surface of the metropolitan abyss, and churn its fierce fluid into foam. But on Sunday the winds fall, and there is a shining calm. Then the waves lap laughing round the fairy isle of St. George's Hall, Langham Place—the isle of which Mr. MONCURE CONWAY is the harmless siren or the friendly CIRCE.

PRIVATE BILLS.

IN his speech on Private Bill legislation Mr. CRAIG SELLAR judiciously abstained from repeating some of the extravagant statistics which he had last year hastily accepted as true; but he was unable to suggest any desirable alternative for the practice which he condemns. Opponents of the present system invariably complain of the uncertainty of decision, which is, in fact, an indication that inquiries are undertaken by an impartial and competent tribunal. The result of an arbitration, or of a trial at Nisi Prius, must be uncertain or incapable of being known beforehand, as long as facts to be ascertained by evidence justify varying conclusions. The duty of balancing considerations of public expediency against private or corporate interests has never been so well discharged as by Parliamentary Committees. The heavy cost of such investigations has given rise to several experiments in the transfer of jurisdiction to other tribunals. Local inquiries have almost always added to the expense, without contributing to the satisfactory determination of the important issues involved. In the majority of cases there is no economy in removing similar investigations from London. The Railway Commissioners have sometimes, with the laudable intention of saving money to litigants, held sittings in Ireland under a power which they possess. The consequence has been that on certain occasions Commissioners, leading counsel, agents, and professional witnesses have crossed the Irish Channel together, instead of avoiding expense and trouble by staying in London. The fees of counsel in election petitions have naturally become heavier since they were compelled to follow the election judges into remote country places.

A much graver objection to a fixed tribunal consists in its inevitable adherence to rigid technical rules. Nearly twenty years ago the Referees who now confine themselves to more modest functions were charged by Parliament with the duty of determining absolutely all engineering and financial questions which might arise on Private Bills. Amongst other matters they were required to report on the sufficiency of the estimates; and their decisions on all points within their jurisdiction were binding on Select Committees, and absolutely final. It happened by unusual good fortune that the chief Referee, Mr. HASSARD, was a former member of Parliament, possessing remarkable judicial ability; yet the result of the experiment was so unsatisfactory that after two or three years the whole inquiry was once more remitted to the Committees. On one occasion the London and North-Western and the Midland Companies jointly promoted a railway four miles long in the West Riding of Yorkshire. The opposition of interested parties on the merits appeared not to be formidable; but the petitioners proved that the estimate was insufficient to the extent of a few thousands of pounds. The Referees were not authorized to take notice of the notorious ability of the two great Companies to supply the deficiency out of their vast resources; and consequently the Bill was rejected before the promoters could produce evidence of its public utility. In numerous instances an engineering objection which a Committee would have overruled proved fatal to schemes which were undoubtedly expedient. Still greater dissatisfaction would have been felt if the Referees had been authorized to usurp the discretionary authority of Parliament.

It is unlucky that these periodical discussions are almost uniformly conducted on one side by disputants who have no practical knowledge. Mr. HORACE DAVEY says that his own want of familiarity with private legislation is an advantage, because it secures him against prejudice. It was not through unacquaintance with the principles and practice of Equity that Mr. DAVEY deservedly rose to the highest rank in his profession. Although the most experienced practitioners are subject to the remark that they are interested witnesses, those who wish to understand the subject will do well to study the remarks of one of the most eminent of London solicitors in a recent letter to the Times. Mr. CLABON, ex-President of the Incorporated Law Society, has probably no strong personal interest in the question; and he would certainly not be biassed by any selfish motive in expressing his opinion. He admits that the Railway Companies spend about a shilling a year on each 100*l.* of their capital in Parliamentary expenses; but he shows that litigants have been relieved of heavy charges, especially by the discontinuance of local inquiries. The direction of a line of railway, the choice between two competing schemes of water supply, the question whether private interests shall be sacrificed to public convenience, are, as Mr. CLABON says, proper subjects for a Court of Arbitration consisting of men of the world. Many Committees, he adds, sit at once, and no remanet is ever left at the end of a Session. "Will the "country permit many new tribunals consisting of paid "judges or arbitrators to be established; or, if only one or "two such tribunals are constituted, what will the Com-"panies and opponents say to the inevitable delay? The "business of one Session would not be at an end before "another Session began, and the old local inquiries and spe-"cial modern inquiries, such as that relating to the Thames "Valley drainage, give a lesson as to delay and cost."

The ignorant confusion which prevails among some of the critics of Private Bill legislation was well illustrated in a communication to which the honour of large print was accorded in the same number of the Times which contained Mr. CLABON'S letter. The favoured correspondent complained that, not a Select Committee, but the House of Commons, had on a single night discussed the Metropolitan Water Bill, the Parks Railway Bill, and the Bill for protecting the Thames for purposes of pleasure; and that on another day it had devoted a certain time to the consideration of the Metropolitan Board of Works Money Bill. It was wisely suggested that Parliament might be relieved of all of these inquiries if a London municipal reform was effected. The probable mischief of a Metropolitan Incorporation has often been explained; but the most inveterate enemies of the scheme have not suspected that a Common Council, elected by household suffrage, would be allowed to decide judicially important questions, in which it would be itself an interested party. The City Water Bill included, among other startling provisions, a proposal that a freehold landed estate should be confiscated without compensation for the benefit of the water consumers, who would be nearly identical with the constituents of the new Municipality. It was sufficiently audacious to ask the sanction of Parliament to such a mode of dealing with property; but even the promoters of the Bill would have shrunk from the suggestion that many millions should be taken from the present owners at the will of the claimant who was to profit by the transfer. The inhabitants of Northumberland have as good a right as the inhabitants of London to the lands of the New River Company; but it has not been suggested that their future County Board should exercise the powers which are attributed to the forthcoming London Municipality.

The Parks Railway Bill, though far less important, interests almost all members of Parliament; and, indeed, the protection of the London Parks is a matter of Imperial concern. No municipality would be allowed to inclose any part of the space, or to raise a revenue by applying it to purposes of profit. The Select Committee which will consider Mr. STORY-MASKELYNE'S Bill must enter into a difficult and laborious investigation of private rights and of public convenience. It was not unreasonable that the reference of such a measure to a Committee should be preceded by a short debate. Few persons will be disposed to complain that Parliament exercises a certain supervision over the expenditure or the taxing powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works or of any body which may hereafter take its place. Even the controversy between Railway Companies and the protectors of picturesque districts involves a question of principle which could not be determined by a strictly judicial tribunal. The charms of solitude or seclusion and the advantage of bringing to market minerals are incommensurable quantities which can only be balanced against one another by the intervention of a supreme authority. The Times' correspondent holds that the Railway Commission would be more competent than a Parliamentary Committee to consider the merits and disadvantages of the proposed Ennerdale Railway. The Commission, which stands alone among tribunals in the want of confidence felt by litigants in its judgment, has established more than one novel and questionable doctrine of political economy; but its æsthetic qualifications have still to be tested. If the issue is to be decided by reference to precedent, the Bill must be passed, because the Thirlmere Water Bill was passed three or four years ago. Whether Ennerdale is more beautiful than Thirlmere, whether a railway or an alteration in the level of a lake is a greater eyesore, is a question which the Railway Commission is not especially qualified to solve. It is, indeed, doubtful whether the ingenious writer would leave any room for judicial intervention. "There is," he says, "no reason why rival "Companies should be allowed to appear before a Railway "Commission at all." They have, as he contends, no right to object to the construction of competing lines running side by side with their own. Whether any railway would have been constructed, if the assumptions of the Times' correspondent were well founded, is a question too practical to have attracted his attention. Intellectual perversity or feebleness not unfrequently obliterates all perception of justice. It would be as unfair as it would be discourteous to place Mr. SELLAR or Mr. DAVEY on the same level with their anonymous supporter; but it can scarcely be said that they have appreciated the difficulties of the subject.

SIGNOR SELLA.

THE death of Signor SELLA removes from the political life of Italy one of its most distinguished figures. Of late years, indeed, he had been less prominently before the world than was once the case. The party to which he belonged lost office almost exactly eight years before his death, and has never since returned to power; and in opposition he has taken a less active part than many of his political allies. But he was pre-eminently the man to whom the country looked in case of need. Himself free from personal ambition, occupied with many things besides politics, indifferent to office except as a means of serving Italy, respected by men of all parties both for his capacity and his sturdy independence of character, he was felt to be one of the men on whom the country could always rely when more showy, noisy, and pushing politicians failed. QUINTINO SELLA was born near Biella in the year 1827. The inhabitants of that district, like the Scotch in this island, have in Italy the proverbial name of being especially shrewd and hard-headed. His reputation was already made as a scientific man when he was first returned to Parliament in the year 1860. It was in that year that the whole of Italy, with the exception of Venetia and the Patrimony of St. Peter, was united under the House of SAVOY. The youth and early manhood of SELLA were passed during a period fitted, more than any other in modern history, to develop political talent. The question whether Italy was to be a nation or a geographical expression was the one which, during that generation, occupied more than any other the minds of Italians. Solution after solution had been proposed, had been tried, and had failed. As popular feeling gradually worked itself clear, and as the unalterable facts of the situation became more and more evident, a class of statesmen was formed, of whom CAVOUR was the chief among many, to whom patriotism was a religion, and who had acquired a wide and versatile capacity in public affairs. We have only to contrast the politicians formed in Italy before, during, and after this period to illustrate the power which the interest that a nation takes in its own politics has to call forth strong politicians.

Signor SELLA was a member of three Italian Cabinets—first as Minister of Finance in the year 1862, under the short-lived Ministry of RATTAZZI, and twice again since, the last time for nearly four years. He found the public finances in an apparently hopeless condition, and took a chief part in bringing them again into order. It was largely owing to him and to his labours that an Italian bank-note, like an English bank-note, is now worth as much as gold. The preliminary work, which a few years later made it possible for the opposite party to complete the great financial reform, was done by him. The political events of 1859 and 1860 had heavily burdened the finances of the new Kingdom of Italy, and foreign investors were for a considerable time suspicious of its credit. Whether the unification of Italy would be completed, and whether the new State, when constituted, would be able to pay its way, were questions which affected the price of Italian stock on every Exchange in Europe. For some years both the good faith and the ability to pay of the new Italian Government were on their trial; and the steady rise during those years in the value of Italian bonds was due in no small degree to the confidence which was generally felt in the capacity and integrity of Signor SELLA. Several of the measures which are due to him were far from being popular. It was necessary to impose taxes which should, in order to raise a sufficient revenue, reach the whole body of consumers in Italy, and such taxes are never popular. The Grist-tax, which would be equivalent to an Excise duty on corn in England, was his work; and, disliked as the tax was, it was the only means by which the country could meet the financial difficulties which beset it. Italy is still one of the most heavily-taxed countries in Europe; and the want of a wealthy middle and upper class causes the incidence of taxation to press with especial weight on the poor. The sacrifices which the country has made for the sake of its independence have not been confined to the battle-field. They have been borne, in the shape of heavy taxes on the necessaries and the cheapest enjoyments of life, by every household in the kingdom.

On a memorable juncture in history the personal influence of Signor SELLA is believed to have been of decisive weight in determining the policy of Italy. As is now well known, attempts were made, between the years 1866 and 1870, to form a triple alliance, directed against Germany, between France, Italy, and Austria. There were various reasons which at that time predisposed public opinion in Italy in favour of the French alliance. The services which France has rendered to Italy in 1859 were fresh in the memory of Italians. The alliance with Prussia in 1866 had brought with it defeat and mortification, and the practical gain of that alliance—the cession of Venetia—Italy received, at least in form, at the hands of the Emperor NAPOLEON. The personal feelings of leading Italian statesmen had been deeply wounded and their personal honour deeply compromised in the course of the negotiations between Italy and Prussia. The sympathies of the late KING were on the side of France. The sympathies of the Republican party in Italy, whose nullity and impotence were not then recognized, were on the side of France as soon as the EMPEROR was deposed. Throughout Italy, and, in fact, throughout Europe generally, it was believed that Germany would win, if at all, only after a long and hard struggle. Even in Germany the full extent of the rottenness of the French military system was not understood. For several weeks the Italian Cabinet wavered as to joining France or not. By joining France the victory of the French, already deemed probable, would, as was then believed, be made certain; and then Rome would have been the reward for this alliance; while, on the other hand, if France had conquered without the aid of Italy, the latter could have no right to expect the EMPEROR to offend the Vatican and the Clerical party in France by sacrificing the Temporal Power of the POPE. The question had become one of sentiment for the Roman Catholic Church. During the lifetime of CAVOUR the proposal of a "Free Church in a Free State" had been the subject of serious negotiation between the Vatican and the Italian Government; and it is probable that, had Italy aided France in a war fomented, if not produced, by the Clerical party, the Temporal Power would have then been amicably surrendered. A number of considerations thus combined to urge the Italian Cabinet to take part with France. That the country decided to be neutral in the Franco-German war, and to occupy Rome without anybody's leave, is believed to be due, most of all, to the personal influence of Signor SELLA.

Since then the character of Italian politics has more and more changed. The new national question of the existence of Italy as a united people and the old international question of the Temporal Power have both been finally solved. What remained after their solution was the gradual reorganization of the country. The Parliamentary life of Italy has, during the last few years, been unfavourable to men of the stamp of Signor SELLA. No great question has been before the country. No great political crisis, either in home or foreign politics, has occurred. The humdrum, every-day work of political life has now come upon a nation stirred only a few years ago into political activity by the greatest questions that can interest mankind. The leading men whom those questions brought to the front have almost all died. Of those who, as younger men, won a name in the formation of the kingdom of Italy, the few who survive are now old. The questions themselves are now only matters of history. But men of Signor SELLA's stamp are wanted more than any other in the political life of all modern States. He was a man equal to great emergencies, able and willing to do the troublesome and unrewarded work of which the public hears little, and careless of the prizes which bring smaller natures into a public career. Had the course of affairs during the last ten years been less smooth for Italy, Signor SELLA would have been even more distinguished than he actually was. In political circles and by public opinion he was felt to be above all trustworthy. He had neither the defects nor the tastes which suit a man to excel in the intrigues and wire pulling which have been too frequent in recent Italian politics; but he was a politician who, when the resources of intrigue and wire-pulling were exhausted, was able to guide the country.

THE ESTIMATES.

THE Englishman who can read the questions, answers, and speeches of last Monday night in the House of Commons without feeling something more than uneasiness must be afflicted with an incurable levity of disposition. The Marquess of HARTINGTON introduced the Army Estimates in the course of the evening with an appropriate official speech; but before he got so far he had to listen to a good deal of criticism and answer a variety of unpleasant questions. For various reasons, almost all this talk was equally unsatisfactory. With the single exception of Mr. TOTTENHAM, the speakers shirked the real difficulty set before the country. The essential thing is that we have an army which is barely able to meet the calls on the service in time of peace, and which would certainly prove insufficient in a great crisis. Compared with that the pedantry of the War Office in its method of examining officers for promotion, and its fussy activity in the reform of regimental tailoring, are things of comparatively no importance. Debate about them is, however, by no means useless, as the mouthpiece of the Adjutant General's department professes to think. It is well to know that our War Office imposes a system of examination on officers which is apparently designed to encourage those who shirk their regimental duties as much as possible. Earl PERCY's question and the answer to it show that the captain who has served with his regiment in the field has less chance of becoming a major than his fellow-officer who has been diligently using pen and ink at home. In an army which is called upon for an infinite variety of service, the application of a hard-and-fast system of examination is absurd enough, and it is something that the Marquess of HARTINGTON has been made to promise that the War Office will take some notice of facts in future. Again, Sir H. MAXWELL did some good by asking what it was proposed to get by taking their hat from the Black Watch. A species of depressed shako covered with ostrich feathers is certainly not a very admirable object in itself; and, in spite of JAMIESON's portrait of the Earl of MORAY on which Sir H. MAXWELL relied, it is particularly absurd on the head of a Highlander. But in such an army as ours, these things are not to be looked at with the eye of pure reason. The feathered hat is dear to the men of the Forty-Second, and to the class from which it is recruited the shako and the plumes are the outward and visible signs of the regiment's glories. To everybody who is not a pedant in tailoring these seem good reasons for leaving the head-dress of the Black Watch alone. It is a species of medal conferred on the regiment, and taking it away would be equivalent to depriving an officer of his Victoria Cross because it is a mere ornament and serves no practical purpose. This business of the hat is one of the proofs daily given by the War Office that it is consumed with zeal about little things. Perhaps if it finds itself snubbed and pulled up by protest or ridicule, it will at last turn its attention, just for a change, to the weightier matters of the law.

That these weightier matters are calling for instant and serious attention is proved for the hundredth time by the speeches of Sir G. CAMPBELL, Mr. TOTTENHAM, and the Marquess of HARTINGTON himself. At the end of the SECRETARY for WAR's business details about the few thousand pounds saved here, and the few thousand more spent there, one thing came out very clearly indeed. It is that the army is not only too weak for the work it may have to do, but is barely able to meet the daily calls of the service. The issue was, as usual, obscured by disputes as to the value of this or the other system. Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL laid the blame on short service, and of course he was met by the usual answer. The old system had also failed, and we have a reserve of 44,000 men. In the face of that, Lord HARTINGTON asks, can it be said that Lord CARDWELL'S scheme has broken down? To anybody who remembers what that egregious reform promised it will be obvious that only one answer is possible. According to the plan of 1871 we were to have a Reserve of about 180,000 men in twelve years, and meanwhile the first line was to have done the work of our constant little wars. By 1883 the Reserve has reached 44,000 men. In the interval Lord CARDWELL'S scheme has been hacked and pruned several times. The terms of enlistment have been changed; time-expired men have been bribed to continue in the ranks; Reserve men have been coaxed to return. We could not send an army corps to Egypt without calling upon ten thousand of them. There are thousands in the ranks at this day. Meanwhile what is the condition of the standing army? According to Mr. TOTTENHAM, who has remained unanswered on Monday and since, it is this—that the army at home consists mainly of boys, and can just supply men enough to keep the battalions on foreign service at something like their proper strength. In some of those at home the non-commissioned officers outnumber the efficient privates. The 2nd battalion of the Rifle Brigade, stationed at the Curragh, is by way of being a type of the whole army at home. It is supposed to contain nine-ten men over its establishment, and it can turn out exactly twelve men fit for guard or garrison duty. Two battalions which lately left Aldershot for Egypt took 770 recruits of less than one year's service in a total strength of 1,695 privates. The Marquess of HARTINGTON'S answer is more damaging even than these figures themselves to the case of the War Office. He parades the fact that fewer men are rejected now as physically unfit than in 1882, as if everybody did not know that the standard has been lowered. He could not deny that the reports on recruiting represented the quality of the men as less than good in forty-eight districts, as against twenty-nine. The utmost he can say is that the boys enlisted will become good soldiers in time, and that the regiments in General GRAHAM'S army fought very well, although they are "precisely the same men who have "been complained of and cavilled at and abused" as recruits. If, however, the present system is ever to prove of practical value, the men in the ranks must be trustworthy while they are there, and not only become fit for military service when they are about to pass into the Reserve. The Marquess of HARTINGTON'S citation of the men who fought at El Teb and Tamanieb was peculiarly unhappy; for those regiments have been for some time on foreign service, and have therefore been filled up by the pick of the army at home. It is also just as well not to overlook the fact that a considerable part of General GRAHAM'S force consisted of marines and bluejackets.

But, even if the SECRETARY for WAR was right in saying that the army can do the work it is now called on to do, he has not answered its critics. It is not enough that our army should be just able to relieve the Colonial garrisons, and supply a few thousand men now and then for an expedition when subjected to careful skimming. The country may be called upon to find an army of sixty or ninety thousand men for a great war. If that call were made, and it may be made between this week and next, where are those two or three army corps to be found? The forty-four thousand men of the Reserve are there, or may be, but behind them there is nothing at all. The mob of half-grown lads at present in our barracks are utterly unfit for foreign service. They might fight a battle, but they would only fill the hospitals under the stream of a prolonged campaign. In any discussion on the state of the army, it is absolutely necessary to keep the probability of a war on a large scale steadily in view, and the efficiency of the force must be judged by its capability to render good service at such a crisis. It would require a confidence bordering on impudence in any Minister to assert that our army is to be trusted for any such work in its present state. Lord CARDWELL'S scheme, however, undertook to give the country an army which, at a great crisis, could supply a force in the field bearing at least the same proportion to our population and the vast armaments of the Continent as the army sent to the Crimea bore to those of the time. It is manifest that we are in no such state of readiness, after the new army organization has been on trial for nearly twelve years, and, therefore, Lord CARDWELL'S plan has failed to keep its promise. The failure may have been due to short service or to some other cause, but in any case it is palpable. That fact leaves no doubt as to what is the manifest duty of every honest politician. There should be an end of makeshifts and juggling with figures, and a resolute effort should be made to put an end for good to a state of things which is a danger and a disgrace to the country. Unfortunately there seems to be little prospect of such an end. The Navy Estimates as introduced by Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN show the same parsimony, the same pottering, the same unwillingness to face facts. But as they are to be discussed in detail in Parliament after Easter it is unnecessary to comment on them further now.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

WE have so much of technical education now that it is not easy to remember how young the term is, and how meaningless it would have seemed before 1871. The admirable workmanship of the French and Italian objects then exhibited surprised us in spite of their execrable taste. German work at that time, except in the one department of printing, was as bad as English. Our workmen were intent entirely on cheap imitations. The great arts of the makers of furniture were veneering and graining; and experiments were daily being made in gutta-percha and papier-maché as substitutes for mahogany and oak. It was the same in everything. NASH'S plaster for stone was still generally in use, and was even then being employed for Buckingham Palace. The skilled builder of thirty years ago did not see, or was only beginning to see, that Portland cement and Portland stone produced very different effects in architecture even with the same design. But if one in a thousand knew that our arts were all out of joint, not even one knew how to set them right. One school of critics was all for going to the thirteenth century for examples, and there was perhaps more to be said for this view than for any other; but, unfortunately, plate glass and iron girders could not properly work in with true mediæval feeling. It was the same with the Renascence doctrine, as it was called. That we should set up principles for ourselves and work them out under new conditions did, indeed, occur as an idea to some, but in practice the difficulties were found to be insuperable. A large number of preachers could say "Do not," but few were found to say "Do."

The question thus presented has gradually solved itself. Our workmen of the better sort have acquired or inherited better traditions. English furniture, for example, is, in mere market value, superior now to French; and this is no accident—it is in consequence of real improvement in the two items of design and execution. Probably we might say the same of every branch of art industry with the single exception of silver-working. No one in England can design and make such a cup as SAMUEL PEPYS gave to the Clothworkers' Company. But in other things there has been a vast improvement. Textile fabrics, for example, bookbinding, stone and brick carving, pottery, glass, coachmaking, inlay—all these, and many more, have partaken of the same advance, and are all superior to what they were a single generation ago. To maintain that advance should now be our object, and it is satisfactory to find that the "City and Guilds of London Institute," in spite of its strange title, is seriously undertaking the task. At the annual meeting held on Wednesday at the Mercers' Hall in Cheap, a most satisfactory report was presented. The new house will contain properly fitted laboratories, workshops and drawing offices, under a properly qualified staff of teachers, "with a view to give "instruction which should combine the elements of those "fundamental sciences that underlie the arts and manu- "factures with as much of a practical character as can con- "veniently be given to them." The practice of foreign schools will serve for example as well as for warning, though indeed the directors will not have far to look from their new Brompton home for a little example and a great deal of warning. Indeed, while we read the LORD CHANCELLOR'S speech at the meeting, we seem to hear an echo of what South Kensington was to do for the working-man in the speeches of a quarter of a century ago. Absit omen!

The funds for this great undertaking have to be found by voluntary subscription. The Clothworkers' Company has come forward with three exhibitions, and other similar donations may be expected; but the Institute has exhausted its funds, if not its credit, to build and furnish the new house. It might have attracted fewer subscriptions had it taken the success of Finsbury College as an indication that it should remain where it was, or move, if necessary, rather further, perhaps, to the eastward. However, so far the Institute has prospered under Sir F. BRAMWELL, and has deserved to prosper, though the death of Sir W. SIEMENS is a great loss to the governing body. It must avoid the mistakes which have brought discredit on even more promising schemes. In its new neighbourhood, as we have observed, it will require, literally, circumspection. Meanwhile, it is satisfactory to find that some of the City Companies are beginning to come forward with pecuniary assistance, though the recent policy of threats and cajolements is not precisely calculated to open their purses. A very strong appeal has been made directly to the so-called "Guilds," emphasized by a letter from a very exalted personage. An idea seems to prevail that, because a charitable and social body is called by the name of a trade, it should justify its existence by giving largely to advance the cause of technical education; but those who make the demand should remember that the gift is as purely voluntary as that of a private individual, and must divert funds which would otherwise in all probability be spent on some different but equally deserving case. To talk about the funds of the City Companies as so many do is either nonsense or something very like Communism.

LASSOING AND BULL-TAILING.

THE high courage and agility of the bull have caused him to be selected as an object of sport by different nations. Our own ancestors could find no better way of procuring amusement at the expense of the noble beast than the brutal plan of baiting him with dogs—a practice undeserving of the name of sport, and devoid of the one redeeming point in the Spanish bull-fight, namely, the element of personal risk incurred by the men engaged in it. Bull-fighting was, with certain modifications which will be mentioned below, introduced by the Spaniards into the New World; but they also struck out for themselves there some new forms of sport which are infinitely more deserving of admiration, as affording equal opportunities for the display of activity and skill without the gross cruelty which disgusts one in the Spanish bull-ring. The most characteristic of these is the use of the lasso. This instrument, a necessity in managing the herds of cattle that range over the vast plains of America, is somewhat different in form and application in the prairies of the North and the pampas of the South. The lasso employed by the gaucho of the Rio de la Plata is a thin rope made of plaited thongs of raw hide; one end of it is always attached to a ring on the saddle-bow, so that when any animal has been caught in its coils the horse and not the rider has to hold it and stand the strain. The Mexican lasso (which, by the way, is rarely called by that name, but is known by that of the reata—the rope par excellence) is never made fast to the saddle when in use. Some description of the Mexican saddle is necessary to a proper understanding of the sport. It is a modification of the Arab saddle as used in Spain. The tree consists of two pieces of wood, sloping towards each other like the roof of a house, but without a ridge; they are separated by a space of about three inches in width, and, rising towards the pommel and cantle, are joined there above the level of the horse's back, so that the weight rests on his ribs without touching the backbone, along which there is a free current of air, even when the rider is on his seat. The cantle is very high, almost like that of the old tilting saddle to be seen in any armoury; the pommel rises to a neck of solid wood, which spreads out to a flat head sloping forwards and upwards. This is called the cabeza or head, and varies in size according to fashion, being sometimes as large as a breakfast plate. In saddles intended for display on the paseo, the whole of the head, as well as the rim leading up to it and that of the cantle, is covered with solid silver, often beautifully embossed; but in those intended for real work the wood is covered, not with leather, but with parchment or varnished canvas, glued down. Right and left of the head, and just below it, hang two thongs of soft deer skin; those on the near side are used for tying up the end of the head-stall, which always forms part of the horse's headgear, while those on the off side hold the reata, neatly coiled up, and thus always ready to the rider's right hand. It can be loosened in a moment by a pull at the thong. The stirrups, which are four or five inches wide and six high, are of iron, often inlaid with silver; they hang from broad straps, which go round one side of the tree. This cumbrous saddle is invariably placed on a leathern saddle-cloth, called the zaparilla, generally made of goatskin, with the hair on, and the edges embroidered with gold and silver; it covers the loins of the horse, and is fitted underneath with large pockets or bags, which are most useful on a journey. On top of this, and across the horse's back, immediately behind the cantle, is fastened the serape, a sort of plaid with a diamond-shaped pattern in the centre; it is neatly rolled up so as to show the gay-coloured diamond, and is tied with two pairs of deerskin thongs, corresponding to those in front. A long holster for carrying a rifle sometimes hangs on the off flank, immediately behind the rider's thigh; while a sword may be placed diagonally under his left leg, so that the handle comes just where he wants it if he should have occasion to draw it in a hurry. The revolver, an inseparable companion, is rarely placed in a holster on the horse, but is worn by the prudent ranchero on a belt round his waist, so as never to be separated from him. The bridle and head-stall are not made of leather, as with us, but of thin rope, ornamented with silver bosses. The bit, also derived from the Arabs, is, or rather might be, a very severe one; the curb consists of a solid ring of iron passing round the lower jaw, and jointed to a powerful port, three or four inches long, inside the horse's mouth. Great leverage is given by the length of the bars outside, from the bottom ring of which hang a few links of chain, to which is attached the single rope rein; this is formed in the middle into a loop, which is carried loosely on the little finger of the left hand; no grasping with finger and thumb is required, a slight touch of this powerful bit being sufficient at any time to throw the horse on to his haunches. Mexican horses have beautiful mouths, and cannot be ridden by any one who wants to "hold on by the reins." It will thus be seen that the right hand is left free to wield the lasso; when not so employed, it is used to hold the eternal cigarette, which, not being gummed together, cannot be kept in the lips, but must be pinched tight by the thumb and two fingers. The Mexican seat is very different to ours; the legs are nearly straight, the knees being almost thrown back; they do not grip with the knees, but ride by balance, and sit well down into the saddle; for a long journey it is perhaps less fatiguing than ours. There are no fences in Mexico, so no jumping is required; indeed, it would be almost impossible with the high pommel. The horses are small, rarely exceeding fifteen hands, and often much less; yet they carry all this weight without apparent effort. The lasso itself is a rope made of the twisted fibre of the maguey, or aloe, known in European markets as Sisal hemp. There is a great difference in the quality; the best and strongest are twisted so extremely tight that it is almost impossible to untwist the strands. One end is worked into a small loop, lined inside with leather, through which, when about to throw the lasso, the other end is passed. The rope is about thirty feet long; about one-third of it is formed into a noose which is grasped a little above the loop—i.e. where the rope is double; the rest of it is coiled round and held in the left hand, ready to let go, the extreme end being kept separate and of course retained. The noose should hang well clear of the ground when held level with the shoulder, and, when open, forms a circle of four or five feet in diameter. The lasso is swung over the head and left shoulder, and back over the right shoulder, a peculiar turn of the wrist as it begins to return keeping the noose open. It is thus made to circle round and round his head by the thrower until he is within distance of his object, when it is launched and flies off at a tangent, the noose assuming a circular form, and settling quietly round the object aimed at. Before it settles the thrower seizes the other end with his right hand, and gives it two rapid turns round the cabeza of his saddle, so as to get a purchase. If he is not quick enough at this, and the bull tightens the rope before a good purchase has been effected, the result is that the fingers get caught between the rope and the cabeza and very much injured. It is no unfrequent thing to see a man who has lost one or two fingers in learning the art. It is beautiful to see the exactitude with which an adept will throw the lasso from or to any point, over either shoulder, behind or in front. There is no credit in catching a bull by the horns, for he cannot be thrown by them; but considerable skill is required to pitch the noose just in front of him when he is at full gallop, so that next step he treads into it; then, on its being tightened with a sudden jerk, rolls over in the dust. The horse, too, has to learn his part of the business, and bear at the right moment in the opposite direction, or he might be thrown instead of the bull, to which indeed he is often inferior in weight. It is considered disgraceful to have to loosen the lasso, and to let the bull carry it off with him. A good hand at it will catch by either leg alone a bull galloping past at any angle. The most difficult feat of all is to lasso him round the quarters when at full gallop at the moment when his hind legs are doubled up under him. Usually the noose slips off, and nothing happens; but if it be thrown precisely at the right instant, his hind legs are pinned tight up under his belly, and he is brought to a standstill in the position of a sitting dog, looking indescribably silly in such an unwonted position. These and other feats of lassoing are seen at their best at a hacienda, on the occasion of the annual herradero, when the young bulls are driven in from the plains, thrown down, and marked with a hot iron with the initials of their proprietors' names. Friends and neighbours come together from afar, and vie with one another in the display of dexterity and horsemanship.

Another peculiarly Mexican sport—to colear, or "tail" the bull—may be seen to advantage at such meetings as these. As Englishmen in India when out "pig-sticking" ride against one another for the honour of the first spear, so do the young rancheros in Mexico race for the tail of the bull. Two horsemen ride up on either flank of a bull, who gallops off head down and tail extended; whichever gets up to him first, when within touching distance reaches down his hand as low as his stirrup, and grasps the tail by the tuft of hair at the end, with which he takes a turn round his hand. He then lifts his leg over the bull's tail, so as to get a good "nip" at it between his knee and the saddle, while at the same moment he spurs his horse with the other heel, and makes him rush suddenly forward, and a little on one side. If done right, the bull is spun round, thrown off his hind legs, and rolls over in the dust. If the momentum of the horseman be not sufficient, or be not applied at the right moment, the bull does not fall, while the horse frequently does. At any rate, the other rider gets a chance, and in his turn lays hold of the tail. Most exciting races are the result, but a bull who has been colcado before will frequently baffle his adversaries by the simple expedient of refusing to gallop, for a throw can only be effected when he is at his best pace. "Once bit, twice shy," holds good with him. No shouting and yelling "Ah, toro," has any effect on him if he has once felt that nasty tug at his tail; he either trots sulkily on, or else faces round and presents his horns instead of the other extremity to his enemy. A Mexican always considers a bull, no matter whose it be, fair game. Even when travelling quietly along the road, if he sees one feeding at a distance, he will dash off after him like wildfire in the hopes of being able to colear him, or at least to roll him over with his reata; and no word in the voluble Spanish vocabulary is bad enough for poor toro if he declines to show sport.

Most Mexican cities are provided with a plaza de toros, but a bull fight is by no means the necessary Sunday amusement that it is in Spain. Moreover, the picadores, instead of being mounted on wretched screws which they take no sort of pains to keep from being gored, are very often young rancheros showing off their own horses; it becomes therefore, as far as they are concerned, a fair contest between horseman and bull, and the rider must do the best he knows to prevent his steed from being touched by the horns of his active antagonist. Amateur fights, in which the bulls are not killed, but only worried, are often got up at haciendas in honour of a distinguished guest. Mexicans delight in all kinds of fancy methods of irritating them. Two men, for instance, are put into a large pair of scales made of hide; the bull tosses one, and down comes the other. Sometimes life-size images are made on the principle of the pith toys with a leaden bottom, which jump up as fast as the bull knocks them over. A most dangerous performance is to ride a bull. He is first thrown with a lasso, and held fast while a rope is knotted round him like a surcingle; a man then bestrides him, holding on to this rope, and the bull is loosed. Off he rushes, bellowing and kicking under the unaccustomed burden; and woe betide the foolhardy rider if the rope should give; he is gored to death long before the bystanders can distract the attention of the infuriated animal. The bull must be lassoed and held by his hind and fore legs before the man can dismount with safety. Many a broken limb, if not worse, is the result of such sports as these; but their practice has not been without its value in producing a race of horsemen whose seat and hands will compare favourably with those of any riders in the world.

"ORION" HORNE.

IN a farewell utterance to his American friends Mr. Matthew Arnold spoke of himself as entirely sustained and encouraged by the sympathy of the literary class. "Should the literary class cease to support me," he said, "I should fall." In the case of a very old man who has just passed away, the fate which Mr. Arnold fantastically and needlessly supposed for himself was actually realized. The poet of Orion and of Cosmo de' Medici was supported by the literary class, and about thirty years ago that class removed its support from him, and he declined into obscurity. If Mr. Horne had died in 1844, instead of 1884, there can be no question that he would have taken his place at once among the principal stars of the Victorian constellation. He was admired by all his contemporaries, and most of all by the greatest. Leigh Hunt and Edgar Poe, Walter Savage Landor and Lord Tennyson, Mr. and Mrs. Browning accepted him as without question belonging to their kith and kin; and though he never reached the general public, he possessed from the first that inner and professional recognition which is, usually, so much safer than the light plaudits of the crowd. Of the poet who died in such obscurity last week, Carlyle declared that "the fire of the stars" was in him, and G. H. Lewes that he was "a man of the most unquestionable genius." But the works that called forth this praise were produced during a single oasis of seven years in a desert of fourscore, and the beautiful things he wrote in his prime were obscured by the mass of poor things written almost until the day of his death. He presents us therefore with a curious and pathetic literary phenomenon.

Richard Henry Horne was born so exactly at midnight on the last night of the year that it could never be decided whether he came into the world in 1802 or in 1803. He showed no early determination to letters. He wished to be a soldier, and was trained for the army. He went to school at Tottenham, where Tom Keats, the poet's brother, and Charles Wells, the author of Joseph and his Brethren, were his schoolfellows. An interesting reminiscence which he was ready to repeat in old age was that he was scampering out of school one frosty afternoon, when he saw the surgeon's trap at the schoolhouse door, and John Keats holding the reins, and nodding on the box with sleep. Horne threw a snowball at the great poet, who was then better known as a determined fellow with his fists, saw it break on Keats's hat, and fled round the corner from fear of condign chastisement. At Tottenham, too, he knew Miss Hitchener, the grim educational spinster, known in the history of Shelley as "the Brown Demon." He was privy to the savage practical joke played on Tom Keats, which severed the friendship between John Keats and Charles Wells; and when Mrs. Shelley, after her widowhood, arrived in London, Horne was the first to call upon her, and express his enthusiasm and sorrow. Charles Wells had introduced him to Leigh Hunt, and he was thus in the centre of that Cockney School which has now so much romantic interest for us all. Hazlitt he never saw in life, but was taken by Charles Wells to see his dead body in 1830.

Horne, however, though the companion of poets, had at first no thought of writing himself. He was, on the contrary, allured by the pleasures of a life of action. He was destined, as we have hinted, for Sandhurst; but just when he should have entered the Royal Military College, he was lured away to America by an adventurous friend, who had dreams of assisting at the declaration of Mexican independence. Horne entered the Mexican navy as a midshipman, and took a prominent part under fire at the bombardment of Vera Cruz and at the siege of San Juan Ulloa. He was a vigorous and spirited young fellow, and then, no doubt, as later on in life, a little what the late Mr. Prowse would have called "vanity-glorious." It was certainly in a spirit of "bustiousness" that he stripped within range of the guns of Vera Cruz, and very nearly perished, not by an ill-directed Spanish cannon, but by a fatally calculating shark. A little later on, again through sheer foolhardiness, he fell into the hands of the Spaniards at Puerto Rico, and was within an ace of being shot as certainly a pirate and probably a spy.

After the war was over, with a certain number of Mexican doubloons in his belt, he went northward and visited the great Indian tribes, the Mohawks, the Hurons, and the Oneidas, and after many strange adventures found himself at Niagara. Here, for a wager, he must needs bathe under the cataract, and was dragged out more dead than alive, with two of his ribs broken. When he was getting well, at the Niagara Hotel, he played billiards with some gentlemanly-looking men, who relieved him of the last of the hard-earned Mexican doubloons. He worked his way to Montreal, and took a steerage-passage in a vessel that was wrecked in the St. Lawrence. He walked across country to Halifax, Nova Scotia, and there started again in a timber-ship, the crew of which rose in mutiny, and put fire to her in mid-ocean. At last, after adventures equalled only by those of the cheerful young persons who take ship in M. Jules Verne's delightful romances, he found himself once more in London, where his relations and friends killed the fatted calf in his honour.

Among these friends was an old gentleman, a Mr. Hengist, who showed so strong a tendency to adopt him that Horne took his name. It was more a joke than anything else at first, and as late as 1864, on the title-page of Prometheus the Fire-Bringer, the name is still given Richard Henry Horne. But for the last twenty years of his life he dropped the Henry, and substituted Hengist for it. He was more than thirty before he began to write. The adventures we have briefly sketched occupied the whole of his early youth. It was in 1833 that he came forward with his first book, an anonymous volume, called Exposition of the False Medium and Barriers excluding Men of Genius from the Public. This was a direct appeal to the sympathies of the literary class, and it had its reward in a success among authors. It is written in somewhat crude prose, with interesting early praise of men then little appreciated by the public, such as Shelley, Wells, and Lytton. The little period between 1837 and 1844, however, contains all that is best in Horne's imaginative production. For his reputation's sake he should have died forty years ago. In 1837 he published his historical tragedy of Cosmo de' Medici. It was well received, and in the same year he brought out his tragical scene called The Death of Marlowe, the poem most analogous to a proverbe by Alfred de Musset which we possess in English. In 1840, having in vain for a year waited for Macready to produce his tragedy of Gregory VII., Horne withdrew it from his hands and published it. In 1843 he brought out his famous epic poem Orion, which was published at a farthing, to express the author's sense of the public contempt for epic poetry. Finally, in 1844, he published in two volumes his critical survey of contemporary literature, entitled A New Spirit of the Age. We have now mentioned the five works which justify the admiration lavished on Horne by his most eminent contemporaries, and it will be perceived that their publication was comprised within one-twelfth of his long career.

The decline of his poetic felicity was almost sudden. After the great success of Orion, his next volume of verse, Ballad Romances, in 1846, was a partial failure, and the miracle-play of Judas Iscariot, in 1848, still less successful. Horne should have perceived that his magic had deserted him, and should have withdrawn from literature. But at no time of his life did he possess the critical faculty with regard to his own writings, and he was totally unable to see any difference between the fiascos of his later years and the impassioned and melodious verses of his Marlowe and his Orion. Meanwhile he plunged once more into restless adventure. It is not possible in a short article to chronicle all the journeys he undertook, all the enterprises he dashed into, all the hairbreadth escapes which he courted. He was sub-editor of Household Words under Charles Dickens, and Special Correspondent in Ireland to the Daily News when that paper was first started in the midst of the great Irish famine. In 1852 Horne went to Australia, and perhaps no man of letters has ever been jack of so many trades as he had been before he came back again. He was Commander of the Gold Escort, and, happy in his semi-martial responsibility, convoyed several tons of gold from Ballarat to the sea. Then he was appointed Gold Commissioner to the Government. It is hinted that certain innocent pranks, the result of spirits more ebullient than words can say, brought this appointment to a hasty close. The versatile poet became Commissioner of the Water-works which supply the city of Melbourne; threw himself into the cultivation of the cactus, for the encouragement of the cochineal insect; and finally took part in the first large Australian wine-making. Other and still more eccentric modes of pursuing a livelihood led him at last, in 1864, to return to England, without having secured lasting profit from any one of his thousand enterprises, the only solid emolument from them all being certain medals and cups which he had amassed by feats of swimming in the harbour of Melbourne. Mr. Horne would have been most unwilling that any biographical sketch of him should omit to state that he was a very powerful and intrepid swimmer. Even in old age, when past his seventieth year, he was only too eager to endanger his health by challenging young rivals to feats of natation. He was certainly on the borders of eighty before he would consent to leave off his champion performances, his singing, his playing on the guitar, his swimming, his bending of a poker on his fore-arm. In men of genius the intellectual vivacity usually long survives the physical, but in his case it was exactly the reverse.

This, however, is not the place in which his life can be described in full. So strange and vivacious a personage will surely not lack a biographer. In the meantime we must dedicate the short space left to us to an examination of his work, of the best which he produced during those seven years of fugitive vitality. Will R. H. Horne live among the English poets? The question is one which some of the greatest names of the last generation, and certain critics of judgment still among us, would eagerly answer in the affirmative. We are not so certain of our reply. Yet it appears to us that, when the great mass of his writing is cleared away, a residue remains which has the stamp of greatness upon it. His three early tragedies, especially The Death of Marlowe, are written in blank verse, which is sometimes stiff and bald, but often very stately and dramatic. It is stage-verse which has more vitality than that of Beddoes, or Darley, or Westland Marston, more even than that of Sheridan Knowles or Talfourd. Orion, with its nine genuine editions, points to something like real success among the literary class, and was certainly Horne's main gift to the poetry of his age. It was inspired by Hyperion, but it is not unworthy of the inspiration. It is full of sombre and gorgeous images, full of the passion of beauty, sustained through four long books at a high imaginative level. The music of some of its finest passages is wholly worthy of the great masters. Some of his prose possesses very felicitous qualities. The New Spirit of the Age abounds in vivacious and discriminating passages, and The Good-natured Bear, a story for children of all ages, published in 1848, is unique in its way. On the whole, then, if Horne has missed the consecration of the laurel, no one ever missed it by such a hair's-breadth.

THE FIGHTING IN THE SOUDAN.

THE recent operations on the Red Sea coast suggest some very interesting questions that are comparatively independent of the general problems of military administration, such as the amount of money to be spent on the army, the best system of service and recruiting, and the like. These latter will find more appropriate discussion elsewhere. It is intended here to treat only of the strictly minor but still very important matters suggested by the actual events of the second battle of Teb, and the battle very variously named which resulted in the destruction of Osman Digma's headquarters. Four of these matters especially suggest themselves—the general arrangement and equipment of the expedition, the tactics and order of battle adopted, the suitableness of the fighting tools to the purpose, and the spirit of the men and officers engaged.

With regard to the first, it must be admitted by any fair critic that the problems which constantly present themselves to English army managers are radically different from those which present themselves to most other European nations. We have heard enough, and perhaps too much, of the perfect readiness of a German Army Corps to take the field at a moment's notice. But no German Army Corps has ever been called upon to do more than transport itself with its equipment for the distance of an easy tour by road or rail. With regard to France, the absolute unsuitableness of a conscription army under democratic management for foreign service could hardly be better shown than by the enormous delay which has taken place before the French army was able to meet even so insignificant a foe as that which awaited it in Tonquin, and by the fact that the campaign there has been fought, not by the French army proper, but by marines, Turcos, foreign legionaries, and miscellaneous troops of this kind and that. At the same time the whole English army is supposed to be ready at any moment to go anywhere and do anything, while the presence of an expeditionary force in Egypt, and the accidental but most important advantage of the scene of operations being the highway, and the time of operations being the season of the regular going to and fro of English troops between England and India, must be taken into account. That a practically efficient force for the immediate purpose was got together under General Graham the event proved, but that it was not got together in the best way is certain. It is little short of a disgrace to England that, with an army of occupation established for nearly two years past in Egypt, and within easy reach of permanent English stations like Malta, Cyprus, and Aden, the transport should have been so deficient as it was and is. It is still more disgraceful (because the fault can only be set down to individual obstinacy or crotchet) that the force should have been left so destitute of artillery. The attempt in such a case to make machine-guns do the work is, and always must be, foredoomed to failure, not to mention that it is extremely unfair on the navy, which has to do at great risk and under unfavourable circumstances the work which the army ought to do and is only too anxious to do. Machine-guns in their proper places are capital things. Behind a stockade with a clear space round it, or on the deck of a ship in similar circumstances, they are invaluable, and now that they are to be had indispensable; but, admirable as they are for defence, they are very bad weapons for attack, and especially for what may be called exploring attack. They have neither the range nor the penetration, nor the peculiar pioneer faculty, as it may be termed of modern artillery. In a long-range duel before battle they are inferior even to rifles. They are perfectly useless in clearing the enemy out from scrub or broken ground or deep depressions in advance of an infantry force. In case of a sudden attack from under cover they are at a grave disadvantage, for at short range their charges neither make the familiar "lane" through an attacking force, like solid shot, nor scatter death all about like shells. They simply kill the first few men a dozen times over, and leave the followers unharmed. Lord Hartington's plea about horse artillery is absurd. The difficulty of watering and foddering the horses extends equally to cavalry, of which, fortunately and exceptionally, this particular force had a fair and a most invaluable supply. And if Lord Hartington thinks that horse artillery cannot go wherever cavalry can, let him ask some one who knows the history of Indian campaigns. There can be no doubt that a better composition of the force would have saved many lives, and made the victories much more effective. It is not worthy of an English Ministry to rely on such a telegram as that from General Graham to the effect that he "could do without more guns." A man does not use that phrase unless he knows that it is a case, practically, of Hobson's choice.

On the second point there is less to be said. It is a special fault of English habits in military matters as well as in civil that particular ideas are wont to be ridden to death, and certainly the "square" idea was, in one sense, ridden to a good many deaths at Tamanieb or Tamasi. It must be evident to the merest amateur in matters military that it is a difficult formation to keep up in advance, especially on broken ground: but the result even of the Second Brigade's temporary disaster cannot be said to be wholly unfavourable to it. The immediate cause of that disaster may, as usual, be most safely taken to have been a mixture of several causes, on each of which too much stress has been laid separately. To talk of a scare, a bolt, and so forth is simply absurd. The smoke will not do as a cause by itself. It seems both improbable and unhistorical that the head of the square simply ran away from the rest in its hurry to charge, and a failure of exact coincidence in orders to the leading and flank companies can have been but momentary. But all these three things working together no doubt threw the square out of exact formation; and the undue nearness of the enemy (who could not be driven out of their cover, as they should have been, by a preliminary cannonade, for the simple reason that the guns were not there to do it) enabled them to take advantage of the mishap. On the other hand, probably no mishap of the kind was ever better redeemed, and certainly no Continental troops in the wars of the last twenty years have stood so severe a trial better. The most mischievous tendency of modern scientific war is that it reduces everything either to a game at long bowls or a trial of tactics. For instance, when the Germans advanced into Normandy and Maine, many sanguine people expected that the abundant cover of that district would give the French a great opportunity. Yet it was again and again observed that no sooner had the flank of a line of hedges, orchards, sunk lanes, or what not, been turned by the Germans than the French without attempting resistance took to their heels. Germans have cooler heads, and are individually better gymnasts than the French. But, though a German square might not have shown the gap which let the Arabs in, it is pretty certain that it would not have rallied better than Davis's Brigade.

The third point, which is in a manner connected with this, is the suitableness of the actual equipment of the soldier for such tussles as that of Tamasi. As usual, infinite suggestions have been made tending generally to the substitution of something—revolvers, bowies, creeses, kookeries, short Roman swords, and what not—for the bayonet. The most practical and valid answer proffered has been that it will be time to condemn the bayonet when the private soldier has been properly taught to use it in single combat, which he certainly is not now. That there is no weapon so easily adaptable, and so little cumbersome when not in active use, as the bayonet is certain, and it is also certain that the need for such use as it came into at Tamanieb does not occur except at the rarest intervals. But it must probably be admitted that any weapon which, like the bayonet, can only be used with two hands, and those wide apart, is at a certain disadvantage in a rough and tumble fight at close quarters, where a great number of men are engaged together. Those who appeal to the feats of the bayonet in skilled hands at assaults of arms forget that in that case there is plenty of space. Still, spears and swords of any length being out of the question for a linesman (who is quite sufficiently burdened and occupied by his rifle), and bowies and all similar weapons having the obvious drawback of want of reach (unless used navaja fashion, which leaves the user defenceless against a fresh attack), there is probably nothing better than the bayonet. But that instruction in it should be real personal instruction, and not mere bayonet drill, is certain; and probably much might be done to improve its quality as well as that of the regulation sword.

As for the spirit and discipline of the men, the result of the two battles is the best possible criterion. Of the rumours of discontent and grumbling which have been communicated by some correspondents too much must not be made. There never was a camp yet in which there was not plenty of grumbling, and though it is usually kept from the ears of the public, that wholesome reticence, with other traditions, is necessarily discarded in a period of special correspondence. But it is extremely probable that some soreness of feeling does exist in the force, and except on the very high ground that a soldier has absolutely nothing to do but to obey orders and kill "two at a blow," it is not difficult to understand and in a way to excuse it. The obvious faults in the constitution and equipment of the force which have been pointed out above are quite certain not to be made light of on the spot, and they are exactly such faults as may not unreasonably, so long as the resentment does not affect the performance of duty, be resented because they press hardly on everybody. The most ignorant private of General Graham's little army knows perfectly well that he has had harder, more exhausting, and more dangerous work to do because men who sit comfortably in Downing Street would not take the trouble, or for some political reason refused, to give the proper orders for organizing the force. The regiments which have been so severely handled, the sailors who have had to do the duty of gunners and beasts of burden at once, are as well aware as any home critic that, if the gunners proper who are fretting at their forced inaction in Cairo had been on the spot, as they ought to have been, the fatigue, loss, and danger of Teb and Tamanieb would have been infinitely lessened. Last of all, though soldiers are supposed to have no politics, it is impossible that the morale of any troops should not be slightly affected by the utterly unintelligible and aimless nature of the operations which they are called upon to perform. When the very Ministers who order them are unable to give a reason for what has been done in the past, and a plan of what is to be done in the future, it is not wonderful that the impatience which always accompanies action that the actor cannot understand, should be shown on the spot. Nothing could have been better than the conduct of officers (omitting the slight slip at Tamanieb) and men in the actual fighting; and of that fighting itself, if it was not on a large scale, it may certainly be said that for its scale no European force has recently done anything more creditable. Nor, except for the incomprehensible blunder of the blood money offered for Osman Digma, which is probably a result of the bewilderment communicated by contagion from home, and the apparent fault of judgment in keeping the troops exposed to a fire which they could not return during the night before Tamanieb, is there anything but praise due to the chiefs of the expedition. To go beyond this would be here out of place.

THE OXFORD HISTORY PROFESSORSHIP.

THE appointment of Mr. Freeman to the Regius Professorship of History at Oxford on Saturday last was generally expected, and has given general satisfaction. An unusual delay in making the appointment gave rise to many foolish rumours, and other names were mentioned "on good authority," with no better reason than the wishes of those who concocted stories of offers which were never made. As Dr. Stubbs will, it is understood, continue to hold the Professorship during next term, until the end of the academical year, the nomination of his successor cannot be said to have been unduly delayed, and if Mr. Freeman wonders that there should have been any signs of slackness in acknowledging his claims to the chair, he need only recall some of his own public utterances to find good reason for hesitation as to his appointment.

It is no light matter to give office to a man who is wont to speak unadvisedly with his lips. At the same time no other appointment would have been equally satisfactory to the students of history. Other men indeed there are who would have fulfilled the duties of the professorship worthily; but there is no one so widely known as an historian, both here and in other countries, no riper scholar and none whose grasp of European history, as a whole, is to be compared with his. If history were taught in the scientific fashion Mr. Freeman has long advocated, so as to exhibit its unity and continuity by doing away with the arbitrary division into ancient and modern, no better professor of the science could be found. As it is, it is evident from his books that, in teaching any of the little "periods" in which the Oxford tutors delight, he will lecture with an authority to be gained only from a general knowledge of the history of the whole civilized world.

Mr. Freeman has been a prolific writer, more prolific perhaps than is generally known; for some of his earlier books failed to gain a wide circulation, and have almost passed out of remembrance; while, many as the volumes are which bear his name, they represent only a part of his literary work. Few probably of our readers have ever seen the little book of historical poems which he published long ago conjointly with Sir G. (then Mr.) Cox, or The History of Architecture, published in 1849, or the Essay on the Origin of Window Tracery, which followed shortly after—books full of promise, but belonging to almost boyish days, and instinct with a sentimental ecclesiasticism, long ago cast aside by the advocate of the disendowment of the Irish Church. Mr. Freeman seems to have given the first public evidence of what was in him by publishing a bright little volume on The History of the Saracens, founded on some lectures delivered in Edinburgh in 1855, which still finds many readers. Of all the thirty volumes or more that he has published during about the same number of years, The History of the Norman Conquest is the book on which his fame chiefly rests. That even this work is imperfect is no more than may be said of all things; but there is no reason to believe that the labours of any future historian will lessen the reputation for exact scholarship and exhaustive research founded on this great achievement. Invariably lucid in expression, Mr. Freeman's style of writing has nevertheless repelled some readers by its lack of ease and its extraordinary diffuseness. The drums and trumpets which are fitting accompaniments of a military spectacle would quickly weary us if they sounded in our ears whenever we took our walks abroad; and Mr. Freeman's heroic style, however suited to the description of a great battle, becomes tedious when employed in narrating the course of ordinary events. Probably the best part of his literary work has been done; for, with the exception of the Historical Geography, his later publications have been the repetition of a more than twice-told tale. Yet when the reader is inclined to be impatient at finding familiar truths enforced over and over again in each new volume, he should remember that their very familiarity is due to Mr. Freeman's work. That work indeed has borne a foremost place in the advance made in the study of history during the last quarter of a century, and will leave an abiding mark on the development of historical scholarship. Neither his University nor his College has been backward in acknowledging Mr. Freeman's merits. Trinity, which has already had the honour of supplying Oxford with such a Professor as Dr. Stubbs, and where Mr. Freeman holds an Honorary Fellowship, will welcome his appointment as a fresh distinction, and though it is useless to pretend that the new Professor has not some difficulties before him—difficulties not wholly unconnected with his own utterances—we believe that Oxford generally, and above all the teachers of history, will receive him with the honour due to such an eminent scholar. The work of teaching which now lies before him is no less important than the career of authorship in which he has hitherto excelled. There is no reason to fear lest he should fail in his new occupation. Slight as his connexion with Oxford has been for several years, his power of attracting younger men and his readiness to help them in their work have given him many scholars, some of whom have become his fellow-workers. No one certainly can be more earnest about his subject, and that is no small thing towards inspiring earnestness in others. With the opportunities afforded by his office, Mr. Freeman will, we believe, exercise a wide and stimulating influence on the study of history at Oxford. His appointment comes at a time when considerable changes are contemplated in the course of that study, and when consequently his influence will be peculiarly useful. Whatever his political opinions may be, it is generally understood that he is a Conservative in all things pertaining to Oxford, and it is well that the younger members of the Board of Historical Studies will have a Regius Professor no less opposed to ill-considered changes and no less worthy of respect than even Dr. Stubbs himself.

THE ITALIAN IN LIFE AND ON THE STAGE.

To say that the art of a nation or a period is the outcome of its whole social life, and that it must necessarily bear the impress of the circumstances that produced it, is merely to repeat one of the commonplaces of criticism; and yet it is a fact that is too often forgotten in judging the work of foreigners. What is placed before us seems new; its very strangeness excites dislike in some and an inordinate admiration in others. Those who love novelty suppose it to be original merely because it is not English; those who have endeavoured to educate their taste by a careful study of more familiar models object to a departure from principles of which the artist probably never heard, or which it would have been quite impossible for him to have adopted in his own country. This is the case both with painting and poetry, but far more strikingly so with acting—an art whose too ephemeral charm largely depends on the taste, the manners, and the fashion of the day. It may not therefore be uninteresting to inquire how closely a few of the peculiarities of Italian acting are connected with the national character. In doing this, we shall refer as little as possible to the distinguished guest who is at present performing at Covent Garden, and who, whatever may be our opinion as to his reproduction of single parts, deserves our respect on account of the great influence he has exerted in the reform of tragic acting in his own country. In speaking of the Italian stage, we are thinking rather of the theatres of Venice, Florence, Rome, and Naples than of Signor Salvini and his troupe.

The Italian is a social, the Englishman to a considerable extent a solitary animal. The former lives a great deal in the open air and in places of public resort. He is always ready to enter into a conversation with the respectable stranger who sits at his own or the neighbouring table. After a few such meetings he makes you his confidant in everything except his money affairs, and is ready to supply you with the details of his whole emotional and family history. His wife, it seems, is not a paragon, and, if you are not a marriageable man, he is ready to own that his eldest daughter has a bad temper. Life altogether is rather a paltry business, but one must not take things too seriously; carnival has not long been passed, and already Easter is near. These things he tells you while you are a perfect stranger, whom he would never think of inviting to his house; indeed, it is only when you are introduced to him that he becomes reticent. History has shown that the Italian is far more gifted both for intrigue and conspiracy than most of the Northern nations—a fact which is probably in a great degree due to his sobriety. He is not addicted to drink, and he rarely, between his nineteenth and his fiftieth year, becomes the fool or the tool of a woman. He is thus protected against the two influences which the police find most useful when a plot is to be discovered. He is shrewd and cautious in business matters, too, and silent whenever he fancies that his speech would give you an advantage over him. These are serious matters, and must be treated seriously, but with his emotions it is different. If he has been disappointed in a love affair, if his mistress or his wife has proved unfaithful to him, he cannot thoroughly enjoy his desolation before he has brought it before his own little public, in which he generously includes not only his personal friends, but also any stranger he may chance to meet in a café or a railway carriage whom he finds or fancies to be simpatico. So far does this instinct for expression of the feelings go that in Naples it is the popular belief that any attempt to suppress or conceal a strong unsatisfied passion, whether it be love, hatred, or fear, is injurious to the health; and so men who have ten times more courage than many of the Englishmen that laugh at them will there say, without shame, "I dare not—I am afraid." Thus, much that forms the most private and secret experience of men of Northern races is openly discussed in every Italian café, and even those who suffer most perhaps find a comfort in the consciousness that they are, for the time at least, interesting.

Nature has granted the Italian the social gifts he himself values most highly—the charm of manner, the art of adding effectiveness to everything he says or does by gesture, tone, and facial expression. "Er weiss sich zu geben," as the Germans say, an art in which they themselves are sadly wanting; the result is that you generally find your German acquaintances gain and the Italian lose on a nearer acquaintance, but for the moment the latter overwhelm you. To see even half a dozen peasants in the street is often like looking at a picture or a scene in a well-ordered theatre. They talk not only with their tongues, but with their whole bodies. They are a nation of rhetoricians; it is therefore only natural that they should be peculiarly susceptible to the charms of an art in which they excel, and that words and postures which would seem to us theatrical claptrap will there decide an election, or even, in exceptional cases, a division. They do not suspect that the brilliant phrase and the studied attitude are signs of insincerity, as Englishmen instinctively do. They see the purpose, they will even criticize the means by which it is attained, but this does not render them impervious to the charm.

Now all this must affect their acting. The subdued and most self-restrained of performers is obliged to adopt on the stage manners more accentuated and gestures more marked than he would think of employing in real life. From what level is he to calculate the necessary elevation. Obviously from that of his audience. Some years ago Signor Rossi was condemned by several Neapolitan critics for the tameness of his Hamlet, whereas his rendering of the part seemed almost farcical to an Englishman, and it was, even on the first evening, far more highly coloured than he ever thinks of making it at Florence. The cause of this is clear enough. If the man from whom you buy your fish is accustomed to assume the most indignant and pathetic attitudes when the question between you is one of a penny, you naturally expect a prince whose father has been murdered to do something more. The tragic actor must outbid the man in the street. Of course when he comes to England he ought to moderate his gesticulation, and this the Italian celebrities who visit us almost invariably endeavour to do. It is unfair to them not to remember that this requires an effort greater than that of the Englishman who desires to rise "to the height of the scene." Before us they always act in chains.

But the fact that the Italian knows nothing of our reticence, of the sanctity in which we hold our own hearts and homes, is a still more important matter. Even in the privacy of his bedchamber he is apt to imagine himself in the presence of a sympathetic audience, and to play a part. He utters noble sentiments to himself and his looking-glass, and does not pause to inquire whether they spring from his heart or his imagination. The result is that he never can speak a monologue as a Northern audience thinks it ought to be spoken. On his lips it is no piece of self-communing, no silent thought rendered audible for a dramatic purpose, as Shakspeare's soliloquies invariably are; it is an address to the audience, in which all the fine points are carefully insisted upon. It is his hearers, not himself, that the Italian Hamlet or Lear endeavours to persuade. When a second person enters, there is hardly a change in his voice or manner, except that his eyes are fixed on Ophelia or the clown, instead of on the third gallery or a lady in the stalls. There are exceptions, of course; but even in the case of the greatest actors they are rare. The instinct of the Italian performer is to turn poetry into what seems to us mere rhetoric. And the same national characteristics affect his whole conception of character. The success or failure of the hero is to him always an external matter—a thing that can be seen and displayed. Shakspeare, on the other hand, loves to dwell on the hidden internal tragedy, on the horror of the soul at its own crime or weakness, and the loss and gain that no court of law can assess. It is, however, this intimate knowledge of the silent and hidden workings of the human heart that has rendered him the favourite dramatist of Northern nations. The Southerner is attracted less by this than by the splendid theatrical opportunities he constantly affords, the very characteristic of his work to which the German actor is generally all but blind. Thus, the one is too apt to give us the soul without the body, and the other the body without the soul.

AN IRISH CATHOLIC LAYMAN ON OBEDIENCE TO THE POPE.

IN commenting last May on the Irish Circular then just issued by Leo XIII., we took occasion to observe that the Court of Rome does not often speak out so distinctly, and with so little circumlocution or technical verbiage of any kind, especially on matters having no directly ecclesiastical significance. And we added that the reception of a document, at once so authoritative and so impossible to misunderstand or evade, would supply an excellent test of that devotion to the Holy See which we are so loudly assured on all occasions is the special boast and prerogative of Catholic Ireland. The event has justified our discernment on both points, with a completeness which could hardly have been anticipated. A bulky pamphlet lies before us, Letters from an Irish Catholic Layman, reprinted from the Nation—one of the leading Parnellite organs—devoted first to emphasizing the unmistakable drift of the Papal circular of May last, and the impossibility of putting on it any but one construction—"a frightful mistake has been made. Propaganda has changed sides and gone over to our enemies"—and, secondly, to establishing the necessary inference that, as the Pope has unequivocally condemned Mr. Parnell and all his works, the document cannot be regarded as "in any true sense, a Papal utterance at all," and the paramount duty of Irish Catholics is to disobey it at all costs. We cannot profess to have waded straight through the whole 119 pages of this somewhat wearisome and extremely tautologous tirade, but the writer has collected into a brief Appendix the acidulated quintessence of his indictment, and we are therefore relieved from the obligation of more than a cursory review of the salient points of the correspondence. It is only due to him to explain that, while he comes forward as "an Irish Catholic Layman," he begins by informing us—no doubt quite correctly—that he does not speak the sentiments of laymen only; on the contrary, his letters "have been received by ecclesiastics with a remarkable warmth of approval." We entirely believe him; it may safely be assumed that two-thirds at least of the Irish priesthood follow the patriotic lead of Archbishop Croke. He premises another profession at starting which has an exquisite naïveté about it. Those who recollect the sensation produced above twenty years ago by the appearance of Essays and Reviews, may also remember the statement in a prefatory notice that the writers anticipated advantage from "a free handling, in a becoming spirit," of the sacred themes they were engaged upon. That their handling was "free" was allowed on all hands; about the "becoming spirit" there was not an equally unanimous consent. A similar preamble of the Catholic Layman's is suggestive of a similar comment. He too has undertaken to treat "respectfully—at least in intention—but with very uncommon freedom, of the policy and actions of ecclesiastics of high rank," including the highest of all. That the Catholic Layman's freedom is "very uncommon"—even were he a Protestant heretic, it would be startling enough—none of his readers are likely to dispute. As to respectful intentions—perhaps a man is the best judge of his own subjective intentions, but the result inevitably reminds one of a familiar proverb about the manufacture of paving-stones. On that point however our readers will have an opportunity of judging for themselves, and they will probably agree that he wallops his own nigger—that is "the Castle Bishops" in general, to whose exposure ten successive letters are devoted, and various exalted prelates living and dead by name, even before coming to the highest ecclesiastic of all—with a "freedom" and frankness—his victims will perhaps be tempted to call it a brutal frankness—which leave little to be desired.

Let us take a few characteristic specimens of this method of "free handling, in a becoming spirit." The venerable Archbishop Murray, Cardinal Cullen's predecessor at Dublin, was universally respected throughout Ireland by Protestants no less than by his own flock, and it was reported how the Queen, on her visit to Ireland with Prince Albert, was deeply impressed by his respectful and dignified demeanour. Our Catholic Layman remarks that "Archbishop Murray justly bears the largest portion of the blame due for the wretched muddle into which the question of primary education has fallen" in Ireland. Dr. Murray's successor at Dublin was a very different man from himself, but he fares still worse at the hands of his critic. It cannot indeed be said that either Cardinal Cullen or Pius IX. were men of large and enlightened views, but they had an honest aversion to murder and treason, and it was notorious that Dr. Cullen was appointed direct from Rome to the primacy in order that he might enforce on the Irish priesthood the duty of confining themselves to their spiritual duties—which were then, and are often still, scandalously neglected—and not meddling with political agitation. To the best of his power, and not without beneficial effect, he carried out his commission. It is therefore only natural for our Catholic Layman to observe "that, since Oliver Cromwell landed on her shores, no greater calamity befell Ireland than the advent of Cardinal Cullen." Cardinal Cullen's present successor, who was justly honoured by a complimentary telegram from the Queen, and raised by Leo XIII. to the purple, has continued the same policy, but in a more statesmanlike and judicious manner. He accordingly incurs a yet deeper condemnation. "Intimately acquainted with Ireland, Cardinal MacCabe has followed the example of Cardinal Cullen in its most anti-Irish features. Under his administration the See of Dublin has got further estranged from the Irish cause"—that is, of course, the cause of rebellion—"and the chain of Castle servitude more firmly bound on priests and people." So much for individual prelates. As to that most contemptible creature, "the Castle Bishop" generically, we have no room to follow our Catholic Layman through his detailed vivisection of him, "as a patriot," "as an educator," in "his genesis," his relations with "the English Catholic faction," "his allies, and his end." It may be right to explain that "his end" does not mean, as we rather feared at first, his end in the next world—that would be quite too awful a subject of contemplation—but his end in Ireland, which is that he must be improved out of it with all available speed, "for until he is made impossible, the relations of Ireland with the Holy See will be in peril." That can only mean that unless he is speedily got rid of, it will become necessary to declare that the Pope "neither hath, nor ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within the realm" of Ireland. We must find room however for the definition of "the Castle Bishop," which is terse and to the point. It is given in answer to a critic who had taken exception to the phrase, and is attributed to episcopal authorship:—"An English Whig is bad, an Irish Whig is worse, an Irish Catholic Whig is worst of all; but an Irish ecclesiastical Catholic Whig is —— itself." The reader is requested "to fill the blank for himself." He will have no difficulty in doing so, and a certain squeamishness—of a very English and Protestant kind, no doubt—precludes us from supplying the omitted monosyllable for him.

Before coming to the Appendix we turned with some curiosity to a final letter "on English Catholicism," in which our Roman Catholic countrymen will certainly find themselves dealt with, if not "respectfully," at least "with very uncommon freedom" indeed. In the first place we learn that the crowning sin of the English Catholic gentry is that "they are Englishmen first and Catholics after." But as it is the writer's object to insist that Irish Catholic gentry are bound to be Irishmen first and Catholics after, this charge sounds a little oddly in his mouth. He explains however that by being Englishmen first, he means that they do not canvass Irish constituencies in the Parnellite interest, where "they could have got seats in any necessary number"—a pleasing prospect, if the Irish constituency is to be enlarged. His suggestion that the late Dr. Ward, editor of the Dublin Review, ought to have placed his "eloquent tongue" at Mr. Parnell's service in Parliament, if it is seriously meant, will appear to those who knew anything of Dr. Ward to betray a somewhat defective sense of humour in the Irish Layman. He proceeds to fall foul of the Dublin Review under its present régime, and we are free to confess that, if in Dr. Ward's hands it was clever and rather violent, it has now become exceedingly dull. But still we suspect the editor understands his business better than his critic, who complains that "with numberless practical questions calling for treatment and solution, it is filled with abstractions, such as Essays on "the Days of Creation, the origin of the word 'Muss,' or the guilt or innocence of Mary of Scotland." Essays on the Scriptural meaning of the Days of Creation—which came by the way from the pen of a bishop—seem more congruous to the pages of a theological Review, and will probably be found by "the English Catholic gentry" more readable, than essays on the "practical question" how to collect a fund to put into Mr. Parnell's pocket. The Tablet, an English Roman Catholic newspaper, which is anti-Fenian, is roundly charged with "venturing on the lie direct with an audacity which rivals the Times"; the charge comes rather oddly from a writer whose own sense of veracity may be gauged by his calmly repeating the exploded fable that "Mr. Gladstone declared 'the sentence of eviction was a sentence of death for 15,000 Connaught peasants'"—which he must be perfectly aware that Mr. Gladstone has emphatically denied having ever said. But our Layman is not content with a general indictment of the English Catholic gentry. He has a fling at individual representatives of the class, both living and departed. "The late Earl of Shrewsbury" was a man widely respected for his goodness and his munificent and unostentatious charities; the Layman himself mentions that he spent 100,000*l.* on church-building in two places only. But he did not assist Irish Fenianism, and was therefore justly denounced by O'Connell as "a pious fool." Lord Bute has "given years to the translation of the Breviary"—not an unnatural or unprofitable occupation for a Roman Catholic scholar—but has neglected the cause of Irish university education—which did not especially concern him—and therefore his conduct "may well give rise to doubts as to the reality and permanency of his conversion [to "Irish ideas"?—yes] and to gravest fears for the future of a body of which he is one of the principal leaders." And if from the English Catholic gentry we turn to their clerical superiors, the prospect does not improve. There is a somewhat obscure reference to "Cardinals Newman and Manning," from which we are led to infer that the former, however great "in the order of thought," is of not much practical use, while of the latter "the English Catholic body is not worthy." It is intimated that, "if the Irish people had the advantage of the leading wasted on men who will not follow," they would soon get their rights. How far Cardinal Manning will appreciate this rather ambiguous compliment we cannot say. But if no help is to be expected from English Catholics, there is yet balm in Gilead; something may be hoped for from English Protestants, and more particularly English atheists. "Supposing, by the favour of that bright Christian, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, the beastliest form of infidelity, in the person of Mr. Bradlaugh, had got entrance into the House of Commons, Mr. Parnell would be perfectly free to take advantage of his vote." Why not? Mr. Parnell, who has hob-nobbed affectionately with equally decided, if not equally "beastly," professors of infidelity in the persons of the Paris Communists, need not certainly be squeamish about allying himself in Parliament with Mr. Bradlaugh, and probably will not be, if he ever gets the opportunity. But moreover something may be hoped for from Irish Protestants, who will be gratified to learn on such excellent authority, that most of them—"truth compels me to except Belfast from this favourable view"—represent "a far higher type, both in belief and conduct," than their English co-religionists. If they are not the rose, at least they are near the rose, and close physical contact with that most fragrant and enchanting variety of the orthodox faith, Irish Catholicism, has suffused them, as it were, with a refracted odour of sanctity. They have imbibed, we are to understand—except in Belfast—some approximate appreciation, not indeed of the sanctity of human life—that vulgar error the English Protestants, or even the English Catholic gentry might have taught them—but of the sanctity of taking it, of the science of judicious "removals."

And now let us pass on to the Appendix, which contains in a nutshell the pith of the whole matter. It opens with "the Roman Letter" of the Nation for May 10, 1883, accompanying the Papal Circular, and the Roman Letter opens in this wise:—

> There is evil and disastrous news from Rome. Never since the priceless treasure of the Faith was brought to our Irish shore has so terrible a stroke been dealt at religion in Ireland as it is our lot to chronicle to-day.
>
> The deadly intrigues of England have triumphed at the Propaganda. The sword is drawn on our faithful and devoted prelates and priests.
>
> May the God of our fathers be with Ireland in this cruel moment! Now, indeed, must we show that our fidelity to religion and our historic devotion to the Holy See can come scathless through an ordeal more trying than the blazing faggots of Elizabeth or the merciless massacres of Cromwell.
> As we have through blood and fire held our faith against England, so shall we at all human price hold our country against Rome. We will not desert our priests and prelates; they will not desert us. If force, spiritual or temporal, come to tear them and us asunder, we will recall to mind how are now those who in an evil moment were enabled to speak in the name of the Supreme Pontiff were (fortunately for Rome and for Ireland) resisted—and successfully resisted—by O'Connell, with Catholic Ireland at his back.

Then follows a graceful allusion to "the British spy, who for the last sixteen months has been traducing us and our prelates and priests in secret at Rome," and the English Minister, who employed him, as former English Ministers have employed former spies, but with this difference—the italics are not ours—"In that day it was done in vain. To-day it has succeeded!" And then we are reminded how Ireland is honourably contrasted with every other nominally Catholic country in Europe, Italy, Portugal, Austria, France, Spain—none of which deserve the name of Catholic—in that "they have marched on to infidelity with the cry of No Priests in Politics!"; which is precisely the cry raised by the Catholic Layman a few pages further on against the Pope. The Letter concludes: "If Rome will enter into an unholy alliance with England against us, then, trusting in the help of the good God, we shall stand for the national rights and liberties of Ireland against Rome and England." We have next an article from the Nation of a week later recording an historical parallel, which suggests a noble example of Irish resistance to the authority of Rome. In 1814 a letter was addressed by Quarantotti, Prefect of Propaganda, to Dr. Poynter, Vicar Apostolic of the London district—not "head of the English hierarchy," as the Nation calls him, for there was then no such hierarchy—conceding to the English Government a veto on episcopal appointments in Ireland. This missive from Rome "scandalized, astounded, and horrified bishops, priests, and people" in Ireland. An Irish priest of the day observed in the Dublin Evening Post that "some cursed, others moaned, all complained," and his own old servant-maid asked him with agonized emphasis, "Oh! sir, what shall we do? Is it, can it be true, that the Pope has turned Orangeman?" The congregations were all in mourning, but the bishops and clergy spoke out boldly:—"Every attempt," wrote the Irish priest, the master of the agonized servant-maid, "to weaken the Catholic Church in Ireland shall in the end prove fruitless; and as long as the shamrock shall adorn our island, so long shall the faith delivered to us by St. Patrick prevail, in spite of kings, Parliaments, Orangemen, and Quarantottis." The venerable Bishop of Cloyne "denounced in scathing language what he called 'Mr. Quarantotti's decree'"—it was really of course the Pope's—and other bishops followed suit. The clergy of Dublin, headed by Dr. Blake, P.P., who afterwards became a bishop, passed a resolution to the effect "that we consider the document or rescript signed Quarantotti as non-obligatory upon the Catholic Church in Ireland;" in other words they openly defied the Pope. And an episcopal Synod convened at Maynooth sent a deputation to Rome "to argue the whole question" with his Holiness. It is noteworthy however that some of the bishops, including Bishop Doyle—the well-known "J. K. L.," far the ablest and most upright and conscientious of Irish Roman Catholic prelates for many a long year—were in favour of accepting the arrangement. But the question was not left to the bishops to decide. "If the laity, headed by O'Connell, had not intervened on the side of Ireland," all would have been lost. But O'Connell "rejected with scorn all compromise." He nobly declared, "I will for ever divide with [meaning apparently, from] the men who, directly or indirectly, consent to vetoism of any description." He went further, and intimated his readiness, if necessary, to "divide with" the Pope himself. His protest, duly italicized, runs as follows:—"Let our determination never to assent reach Rome. It can easily be transmitted there; but even should it fail I am still determined to resist. I am sincerely a Catholic, but I am not a Papist. I deny the doctrine that the Pope has any temporal authority, directly or indirectly, in Ireland; we have all denied it on oath, and we would die to resist it." Very fine certainly; only a benighted English Protestant might have imagined that the nomination of bishops had something to do with spiritual authority, but O'Connell and the Irish Catholic Layman know better. O'Connell indeed "knew no foreign prince whom in temporal matters [such as episcopal nominations] the Catholics would more decidedly resist than the Pope; and this while they respected and recognized his spiritual authority," which has obviously no connexion with such details of Church government. He "would as soon receive his politics from Constantinople as from Rome," and "how dare Quarantotti [that is the Pope] dictate to the people of Ireland?" Pius VII. yielded to the storm, and withdrew his "Orange" rescript, but "the outrage offered to Ireland in the Propaganda Letter" of last May has not yet been cancelled, "and already deplorable mischief looms on the horizon." It is no time for mincing matters. "When Pope Clement"—Ganganelli, one of the best and wisest pontiffs since the Reformation—"so far harked in with the anti-Jesuit Crusade, in presence of a howl raised by all the infidels and tyrants of Europe [i.e. the Catholic sovereigns], as to decree the suppression of the heroic Society of Jesus—when Pope Pius VII. was so far 'misled' or 'misinformed' as to concede the Veto of 1814," they were told plainly that they were wrong and must retrace their steps. The same plain speaking must be used now to Leo XIII., and his chief emissary in Ireland, Cardinal MacCabe, who "has, from first to last, denounced the movement that saved the Irish people from ruin, and brought forth Mr. Gladstone's Land Act of 1881." If the Letter of Cardinal Simeoni last year is not resisted as stoutly as was the Letter of Cardinal Quarantotti in 1814, "it can only lead to one result." In other words, if Leo XIII. is not compelled to withdraw his Letter, as did Pius VII., Irishmen, as represented by Mr. Parnell and the Catholic Layman, will withdraw their allegiance from him. Quite so. Said we not rightly in a previous article, that, "as far back as they are known to history at all, they have been 'Catholics, if you please, but first Irishmen'"; and accordingly that "the fervent Catholicism of what has been not very happily termed 'one of the most priest-ridden nations in Europe,' has retired into the background, with the subsidence of the accidental and temporary causes which evoked it"? They decline to listen to the Pope as soon as he bids them respect the second table of the Decalogue.

IL GLADIATORE.

SIGNOR SALVINI has lately reappeared in Il Gladiatore, an adaptation of Soumet's tragedy, and has therein, to a far greater extent than in any other work, justified the enthusiasm of his admirers. "The play is contemptible," is Mr. George Henry Lewis's verdict. "I do not think that any actor could have succeeded with such a patchwork," he goes on to say; and we certainly do not propose to stand up in warm defence of Soumet. There are, nevertheless some powerful incidents in Il Gladiatore, and Signor Salvini, as the Thracian slave, is called upon to portray deep emotions which lie within the compass of his art. That the full depth of these emotions is sounded, that the pathos is all it might be made, we are not able to admit; but it must be cordially confessed that, especially in the fourth act, the scene in the amphitheatre where the Gladiator finds that the Christian he is commanded to kill is his own daughter, Signor Salvini is exceedingly impressive. No severe tax is laid on the actor's imagination; his long speeches are narratives, prayers, denunciations, and not soliloquies; and alike in figure and bearing he most admirably realizes the idea of the dauntless hero of the arena. Saucius ejurat pugnam gladiator, Ovid has said; but one cannot believe that any pain of wounds would quench this warrior's courage. The long description given to the Christian Origen, of how his wife was most hideously murdered before his eyes, is finely spoken by the Gladiator, except that the vehemence of his passion might be exchanged for something of intensity. As regards what is more strictly speaking the acting of the scene, it is still to be deplored that Signor Salvini practises no higher art than that of what has well been called "pictorial gesture." When he tells Origen how he was bound to a pillar by iron chains, and how, as he saw the victim of the Empress Faustina's superstition quiver beneath the knife, he struggled desperately to get free, he reproduces his writhings and frantic efforts. Here we are quite in accord with the critic already quoted, from whom in his general estimate of the play we have in some degree ventured to differ. Speaking of "pictorial gesture," Mr. Lewes remarks, "I cannot think it consistent with fine art, being as it is a remnant of the early stages of evolution, wherein gesture is descriptive, and not, as in the higher stages, symbolical; it bears the same relation to the expressive gestures of cultivated minds that picture writing bears to the alphabet." It may be safely assumed, from a study of the Italian actor's method, that if he were to give the famous speech of Jaques, "All the world's a stage," those imitations of the seven ages which are the stock-in-trade of the inferior provincial player would all be carefully reproduced. All the representation of the struggle is, however, perfect in itself as an example of this manner of illustration. The declamatory passages spoken by the Gladiator in the Temple of Juno go for little, except that it is a pleasure to listen to the rhythmical rise and fall of the actor's voice; but throughout the scene in the Amphitheatre, whither he has been summoned to fight the lions, Signor Salvini is at his best. The consciousness of strength, the fierce delight of battle, the proud assurance of victory, are nobly indicated as the Gladiator, who has been absent for fifteen years guarding the child now stolen from him, strides with head erect across the familiar place, the admiration of the Romans who crowd the seats above him. The Priest demands that first of all the Christian who has violated Juno's temple shall be sacrificed, and the Gladiator, now executioner, tests one after another the swords which are brought in for his choice. The victim, Neodamia, enters whilst his back is turned; and there is something terrible in the careless manner in which he flings down each blade which he rejects till the weight and balance of one satisfies him, and then turns to where the black-veiled figure awaits her fate. As she submissively bends her head for the blow the Gladiator sees upon her shoulder the mark which tells him that this is his own child; a few words bring conviction, and with a cry of fervent joy, throwing his sword from him, he springs forward to clasp her in his arms. All this is wonderfully good, and to the end of the act, when Faustina (who believes that the life of her son, the Emperor, is bound up with that of the Gladiator's child) ensures a respite of a day, nothing is wanting except a truer ring of earnestness in the voice of the father, as he pleads to the wayward populace and the inflexible Priest for his daughter's life. The construction of the last act is weakened by the scenes which are devoted to showing how the Gladiator exults over the agony of Faustina, herself a prisoner in Neodamia's cell, while the populace risen in revolt burn her palace and slay her son. It is the author who is at fault. Faustina's barbarity was described in the first act, but the effect of that has passed; interest now centres in Neodamia and her father; the audience is indifferent to the fate of the Empress. At length, to save her from a worse death, the Gladiator stabs his child, and plunges the weapon into his own breast. The preparations, the dialogue, and the action are so much spun out, however, that one is apt to awake from illusion, to be disenchanted, and to remember the actor at the expense of the desperate father. It will be seen that there is much to praise and but little to condemn in this performance, which, with a weaker hero, would be intolerable; but then, in estimating the value of a dramatic work, it is only fair to consider what it is worth if adequately interpreted. The general representation is more level than it has been in any previous play. Signora Cattaneo touches somewhat timidly the character of Neodamia; but, if the outline is feeble, it is correct. Signora I. Piamonti is a capable Faustina.

LIFEBOATS.

THE annual meeting of the National Lifeboat Institution, held on Saturday last, attracted rather more attention than usual, owing partly to the fact that the Prince of Wales, who on one previous occasion had taken the chair, presided, and partly, perhaps, to the pleasure which was felt in hearing of successful efforts to save life after the long accounts of the destruction of life on a large scale which has filled so many columns during the week; but still it cannot be said that the noble work of the Institution has excited any such enthusiasm as might be expected, or that the langour of the public with regard to it has been effectually dispelled. When, owing to the exertions of a private Society, which receives no aid whatever from the State, 1,839 lives were saved in two years, it might reasonably be thought that very general and very warm, not to say intense, admiration would be felt; but it can hardly be said that the energy of the Institution and the magnificent deeds of the crews have really roused any feeling of this kind. The sympathetic speech of the Prince, and the presentation of testimonials to two veteran coxswains by the Princess of Wales, did, for a moment, draw attention to the wonderful work which is done on our coasts: but the interest which was awakened soon flagged, and by this time the brief but very striking record which His Royal Highness was able to give is well-nigh forgotten. Perhaps the Institution suffers as some individuals suffer who do their work too well. The annual saving of life does not strike people because during so many years lives have been saved before. The task is so well accomplished that its great and inherent difficulty is overlooked.

This year the record of what had been done certainly deserved notice, as showing how admirably the lifeboat service is maintained. The number of lives saved in 1883 has only been exceeded in four years out of the sixty during which the Institution has existed. In 1867, 1,086 lives were saved; in 1869, 1,231; in 1877, 1,048; in 1881, 1,121, and last year, 955, of which 725 were saved by lifeboats, and 230 by other boats, the crews of which received rewards from the Institution. The mere statement of lives saved, however striking as it is, does not show all the work done by crews, as, in answer to signals of distress, boats were frequently launched on voyages which had no result in saving life, and it may be presumed that not a few of these voyages were quite unnecessary, and that in a good many cases the crew, after much toil and perhaps some danger, reached a vessel merely to find that the master had changed his mind. If this supposition is correct, a curious fact shown by the Report of the Institution for 1883 may be partly accounted for. From a tabulated statement there given, it appears that the number of launches in each month bore but a very irregular proportion to number of lives saved. Thus, to take the first three months, there were in January 33 launches and 70 lives saved, in February 39 launches and 53 lives saved, and in March 41 launches and 105 lives saved; and a similar disproportion is shown in the closing months of the year. When the furious gales of the early ones are remembered, it seems strange to find that the month during which there was most for the lifeboat crews to do was September, during which 127 lives were saved, the number of launches being 51. In December nearly as many rescues were effected; but the work apparently was not so arduous, as the number of launches was considerably less.

That in the many voyages made during the winter gales, the equinoctial gales, and those which came out of all season, great courage and endurance and a resolute determination to give aid at all hazards, if aid were possible, were shown by the sailors who work for the Institution, need hardly be said; for, whether those who allege that the British seaman is not what he was be right or wrong, there can happily be no doubt whatever that the lifeboat crews have not in the least deteriorated, and that the magnificent spirit which has hitherto animated them for so long is in no way on the decline. What real danger there is in their work, despite the admirable qualities of the boats they man, was shown in a very melancholy manner at the beginning of the past year. On January 23 the lifeboat Albert Edward—a name well known to all who are acquainted with the annals of the service—was going out to the assistance of a vessel in distress when "the third sea" capsized her, and, although she righted quickly, the second coxswain and one of the hands were drowned. The petty officer, it may be observed, had been out thirty-three times, and had aided in the saving of 116 lives. On no other occasion were men lost from any of the boats in 1883; but the accounts given in the Journal of the Institution show that crews were not unfrequently in some danger, and that often their work required great endurance. Not long after the fatal mishap just mentioned another lifeboat crew were in considerable peril, and showed the most heroic indifference to it. On Feb. 6, the brig Euphemia Fullerton, of Londonderry, got ashore near Ballywater, Co. Down, in a heavy gale. With great difficulty the lifeboat was dragged to a point on the coast near the scene of the wreck, and she was then manned and launched. So furious was the gale, however, that she was driven ashore, three of her oars being broken, and, with a tremendous surf running, there was great difficulty in saving her. The crew, however, were not in the least daunted; and, plenty of willing hands aiding, the boat was launched again, and succeeded in taking off the crew of the brig, six in number. It should be mentioned that the boat was in charge of the Rev. J. O. Reilly Blackwood, an hon. sec. of a branch of the Institution, who had previously distinguished himself in lifeboat work, and who most deservedly received a second service clasp for his noble efforts on this occasion. The gale in which he and his men made so useful a rescue must have extended or travelled very quickly to the east coast of England, as on the morning of the succeeding day it was blowing very hard off Harwich, and a vessel was driven ashore on that ugly miniature Goodwin, the Shipwash Sand. The lifeboat Springwell was manned, towed out to the sands, and spoke a large screw-steamer, the master of which had made several fruitless efforts to rescue the crew of the stranded ship. The lifeboat men, happily, were more successful. Their craft was taken well up to windward, and then dropped down under sail and anchored close to the wreck, on board which a grappling-rope was thrown; and by means of this the crew were rescued, in spite of the difficulty and danger caused by the floating wreckage, a thing dangerous anywhere, but specially dangerous in such seas as break on the Shipwash. On other of the dangerous shoals off the East coast several very courageous rescues were effected during the winter; and further north similar bravery was shown. One exceptionally bold deed by a North-country seaman demands special notice, although the danger was incurred not at sea, but on shore. On March 11th the Seaton Carew lifeboat went out at night in answer to signals of distress from the Long Scar Rocks. There were heavy snow-showers and the wreck could not be seen, and as in the darkness it was impossible to take the boat in among the rocks, the coxswain, Henry Hood, and one of the hands landed on the reef and endeavoured to discover the vessel. This at great risk they succeeded in doing. Another hand from the boat joined them, and, after many efforts, a line was thrown on board the wreck. Just after this had been done the coxswain saw a man in the surf and, rushing into it immediately, succeeded with the aid of his companions in saving him. By means of the line the crew were got on to the rock, and with great difficulty the lifeboat was regained. For his very gallant conduct on this occasion Hood received the Albert medal of the second class, and the silver medal of the Institution, and certainly this was no more than his due. His achievement and the others which have been spoken of show how the lifeboatmen worked in the storms of the early part of the year, and as a further and striking instance of the spirit which animated them we may mention that in two consecutive days in March the Thurso lifeboat saved the crews of six vessels.

With the latter part of the spring and with the summer the work became less arduous, and the number of rescues much smaller. Vessels, it is true, succeed in getting ashore at all times of the year, but happily it is not usually possible to put the lives of men in danger in fine weather. So late as May 9 a lifeboat with a crew of Customs officers and pilots took a crew safely from a vessel which went to pieces only twenty minutes after they had left her; but otherwise there seems to have been no demand for any great exertion in May, and June and July were at least as calm as usual. During these two months lifeboats were only launched eight times. With August came need for a little more work, and September was, as has been shown, the month during which the lifeboats had most to do. Although, however, great skill and courage must have been displayed, and although the number of lives saved shows how admirably the crews must have striven, there do not seem to have been such specially difficult and dangerous voyages as were made in the early part of the year. The crew of the Ballywater lifeboat already mentioned were tried, as other lifeboat crews have been, by the inconsistent, if brave, conduct of men who first made signals of distress, then refused to leave the ship, then made signals of distress again, and did their duty with excellent spirit; but, so far as can be ascertained from the record at present given, the month was remarkable for the alacrity and readiness everywhere shown rather than for any very exceptional rescues. In October the New Brighton lifeboat saved the crew of an unlucky ship which had not fairly started on her voyage when she got ashore. Owing to the extreme darkness of the night on which the wreck occurred, and to the heavy sea which was running, the danger and difficulty were considerable, and the master of the vessel, whose wife was saved with him, showed a feeling which has not always been evinced, as he wrote to a Liverpool paper to express his gratitude to the seamen who had saved twenty-one lives. Later on in the month the famous Ramsgate lifeboat rendered material assistance to a vessel which had gone ashore on the North Sand Head, and on November 7th the same boat went alongside one vessel which had got ashore, then went to three others which had been abandoned, and finally returned to the stranded vessel, which was ultimately brought by steam-tugs into Ramsgate harbour. After this no very remarkable voyages are chronicled in the Lifeboat Journal; but that the crews did their work most nobly is proved by the great number of rescues in December, and possibly further accounts of the services rendered on various parts of the coast during that month will be given.

Whether quite completed or not, however, the record for 1883 speaks for itself, and shows that the great traditions of the lifeboat service are nobly maintained by the present crews, and that the Institution which directs them has not in the smallest degree abated its provident care. The achievements to which we have endeavoured to draw attention, and others which we have not space to describe, prove that the men are as willing as ever to face danger and hardship, as anxious as ever to give aid. Small recognition do they receive, as a rule, from the general public, which, moved sometimes to almost hysterical admiration by isolated acts of valour, takes little heed of a steady and strenuous struggle to save life. Perhaps, however, a stronger feeling with respect to them may arise, and justice may be done to men who, in days when sailors are said to be deteriorating, show all the best and noblest characteristics of British seamen. At present certainly there are no signs of any great enthusiasm, and even the speech of the Prince of Wales has not commanded more than passing attention; but some day the doings of crews and the unceasing vigilance of the Institution may receive the notice they deserve. Perhaps even the conflict which is now raging may be the means of drawing attention to them. During the discussions respecting the Merchant Shipping Bill there have been on both sides the strongest expressions of a desire to diminish loss of life. And it may not impossibly occur to some who are weary of the clamour and bewildered by a multitude of conflicting assertions to contrast the talk of the many disputants with the doings of the Society which says so little and actually does save lives at the rate of well-nigh a thousand a year.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE programme of the Crystal Palace Concert last Saturday opened with Mendelssohn's overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, the performance of which is well worthy of notice. It not only showed how completely Mr. Manns has once more got his band thoroughly in hand, but also showed him as a conductor with exceptional feeling for tempo and rhythm.

This was immediately followed by the Concerto for violin and orchestra, No. 5 in A, of Mozart, performed for the first time in England. Of the manner of its performance there is but little to be said. Herr Joachim held the solo instrument, and the Crystal Palace band played the orchestral part in their very best style. It is no doubt somewhat impertinent to attempt criticism of a hitherto unheard work of Mozart's after but one hearing, but we are free to confess that the impression left upon our mind was one of disappointment. Had this Concerto not been signed by Mozart, it might have been accepted as a masterly piece of writing for the display of executive ability on the violin, written by one who was a thoughtful and inspired musician; but, considering it as a work of Mozart, in spite of its charm and grace, we feel that in both these particulars it falls short of his other works, which we know and love so well. It is no doubt highly interesting to the musical student, not only on account of certain unimportant departures from the hard and fast lines of form, but also from the singular resemblance of the themes and musical forms of expression to those which are to be found in the works of the old Italian masters. We are almost tempted to think that this work was a sort of study of the style of some contemporary Italian musician, so rarely do we find the habitual tone of musical thought of Mozart cropping up through the almost unfamiliar dialect of the rest of the work. Herr Joachim played as his second piece variations for the violin and orchestra from his own pen—a piece written more for display than for charm, though abundance of the composer's true musical power is to be found in the orchestral part. It seems almost a pity that Herr Joachim and those responsible for the arrangement of the Crystal Palace programme should merely have shown the audience that Herr Joachim has perhaps more command over his instrument than any other living violinist—a fact with which most of them were probably acquainted—and that he should not have had an opportunity of displaying his great power of exciting musical emotion. The band were again heard to great advantage in Schumann's Symphony, No. 2 in C, the first three movements of which were most admirably played. In the final movement, allegro molto vivace, perhaps from the effect of fatigue, there were moments when the band were by no means well together. The other orchestral number of the programme was the Notturno and Tarantella from the Italian suite of Raff, which was performed for the first time at these concerts. This exquisite music has not been often heard in England before, and we therefore take this opportunity of again saying that the Notturno at once would stamp its composer as a master of his art. The themes, or rather the theme, upon which it is built is of most exquisite beauty; its whole treatment full of scholarly, yet poetic ingenuity, and its orchestration, though never obtrusive, of the utmost elegance and effectiveness. The Tarantella forms a fine contrast to the earlier movement, and is written with a lively sense of the force and meaning of this form of dance, and with great ability in construction and treatment. Miss Thudichum was the vocalist, and sang the Recitative and Aria, "Ah! come rapida" from Meyerbeer's "Crociato," and Sullivan's song, "My dearest heart." Her voice is of beautiful quality, and her vocalization most admirable, and, above all, entirely without a trace of the tremolo. She speaks her words distinctly, and has an unusually good idea of the right way to declaim recitative. She seems indeed to have all that good teaching and diligent practice can well give her. As to her artistic feeling, we can only say that, though she seemed to thoroughly please her audience, we could not but feel that her musical sense had yet to come to her.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

THE point that first strikes one in the Indian Budget figures is the remarkably close balance between the revenue and expenditure. In 1882-83 the surplus was 706,633*l.*, the revised estimate for 1883-84 shows a surplus of 271,500*l.*, and the Budget estimate for 1884-85 a surplus of 319,300*l.*, out of a revenue of more than 70½ millions. But the figures are misleading, owing to the plan recently adopted by the Government of India of including in the expenditure, under the head of Insurance against Famine, sums applied to the reduction of debt. The average annual sum so applied is fixed at 750,000*l.*, less any amount actually spent in the relief of famine. The revised estimates of 1882-83 showed 1,330,200*l.*, and the Budget estimates of 1883-84

131,700*l.*, applied to the reduction of debt; how much is appropriated for this purpose in the estimates for 1884-85 we are not in a position at present to know, but it may probably be taken at about 750,000*l.* It is evident that these sums are really surplus revenues, and should be added to the surpluses given above. In 1882-83 a net charge of 785,496*l.* is included on account of the Egyptian war, which was not foreseen when the Budget estimates for that year were prepared. But here, again, the system of preparing the Indian accounts is misleading, owing to rupees being taken at the conventional value of two shillings. The expenditure and receipts on account of the Egyptian war were partly in rupees in India and partly in pounds sterling in England. The net expenditure in rupees was Rs. 1,17,92,000 entered in the accounts at 1,179,200*l.*, and the net receipt in pounds sterling was 393,704*l.* But the exchange value of the rupees was 1s. 7½*d.*, so that the actual value of Rs. 1,17,92,000 was 958,100*l.*, and the actual charge for the war on the Indian revenues was, in true sterling, 564,400*l.*, instead of 785,500*l.*, as shown in the Indian accounts, or rather revised Budget estimates. Another unforeseen cause of increased expenditure in 1882-83 was a further fall in the value of silver. The estimate of loss by exchange was framed on an exchange value of 1s. 8*d.* for the rupee; the actual exchange was 1s. 7½*d.*; the result has been an excess charge under this head of 306,400*l.*, although it is believed that the drawings on India by the Secretary of State were considerably smaller than was estimated. In spite of these unforeseen charges, the surplus for 1882-83 was 421,633*l.* more than was originally estimated, owing to under-estimates of revenue under almost every head of account.

For the year 1883-84 the revised estimates show an extraordinary increase, both of revenue and expenditure, over the Budget estimates prepared a year ago. The following are the figures:—

	Budget estimate	Revised estimate	Increase
Revenue ...	£67,274,000	£70,569,900	£3,295,900
Expenditure	66,817,000	70,298,500	3,481,500
Surplus ...	457,000	271,400

Very little explanation is given of these large increases on both sides of the account. Of the increase in revenue about 800,000*l.* is due to principal heads, other than productive public works. The chief of these heads is apparently salt, the consumption of which is said to have increased by 10 per cent. since the reduction of the duty. On the expenditure side it would appear that the increase is due to loss by exchange on remittances to the Secretary of State of 1,500,000*l.* in addition to the estimated drawings, and to the payment of 1,000,000*l.* to the English War Office on account of arrears of non-effective charges connected with Her Majesty's forces in India. These two items apparently account for 1,345,900*l.* of the increased expenditure. It is further stated that the net increased revenue from productive public works amounts to 390,900*l.* It will probably be found that the gross increase of revenue and expenditure on productive public works, of which this sum is the difference, was very large, and will explain the greater part of the increases on the whole account. A very large extent of State railway lines has recently been opened; the gross receipts and working charges of these lines must year by year swell the account on each side. It is a question whether this profit and loss account should not be entered net in the general revenue and expenditure accounts of the Government, the gross figures being given separately in another statement. Already these figures swell the account by nearly ten millions on each side, and in a few years may be doubled or trebled.

In the year 1884-85 the Budget estimates show a revenue and expenditure not much differing from those of 1883-84, namely:—

		Decrease
Revenue	£70,560,400	£9,500
Expenditure	70,241,100	57,400
Surplus	319,300

As it is probable that the receipts and charges on account of railways will continue to increase, these figures indicate a considerable reduction on both sides of the account under other heads. The estimated falling off in the revenue is attributed to opium, owing to the failure of the poppy crop last year. This requires some explanation. In 1867 the Government of India determined to form a reserve stock of Bengal opium, with the view of giving greater fixity to the quantities offered for sale each year. It was not until 1879 that a sufficient reserve had been formed to enable the Government to carry out this policy. At the beginning of that year the reserve amounted to nearly 48,500 chests. Unfortunately, misled by the large crops of the two previous years, the Government fixed for annual sale a quantity which has proved to be above the average annual production. The result has been that year by year the reserve has decreased. At the beginning of this year it had sunk to below 14,000 chests. But it was not until August last that the Government diminished the quantity to be brought to sale, of which they had bound themselves to give a year's previous notice. The small outturn from last year's crop has again forced them to reduce the quantity from the 1st of April, 1884. In spite of this reduction, we are told that the reserve is estimated to stand at the end of the year at only 2,296 chests. This does not take into account the opium now in process of manufacture from this winter's crop, which is said to be a large one. It is to be regretted that the Government did not sooner appreciate the fact that the quantity fixed for annual sale in 1879 was too large, and that they have been forced to make the recent sudden reductions, and have reverted to the position they had hoped to avoid, in which the quantity brought to sale, and therefore the revenue, is subject to the fluctuations of the season. They have now to recommence their task of forming a reserve stock, so as again to be able to give greater fixity to the revenue. There seems reason to fear that the Government have allowed the acreage under poppy cultivation to diminish, owing to a reduction of the price paid to the cultivators. Although Sir Auckland Colvin is justified under the circumstances in taking a low estimate of the revenue for 1884-85, it must be borne in mind that the price per chest ordinarily rises with the diminution of the quantity sold, and that deficiencies in the supply from Bengal tend to increase the exports of Malwa opium. This, however, does not yield to the Government so large a revenue per chest as the Bengal opium.

The reduction of expenditure is more satisfactory to contemplate. It seems to show that the Local Governments, who have recently been spending their accumulated cash balances, have been able to contract their expenditure so as to keep it within their revenue. The most agreeable feature of the financial statement is the announcement of the increasing success of the investment in railways. Under the old guarantee system the State was burdened with heavy annual charges on the revenue, owing to the high rate of interest guaranteed—generally 5 per cent.—and the great cost at which the lines were constructed. To these succeeded the railways constructed by the State, at a cheaper cost, and out of money borrowed at a lower rate of interest. It is only in the last few years that a large mileage of State lines has been open for traffic: meanwhile the Government has had to defray the interest on the debt. Now that there are 3,600 miles of railway constructed by the State open, and the principal of the guaranteed lines—the East Indian—has been purchased by the Government and worked under a new arrangement more profitable to the State, the receipts from the railways, taken as a whole, not only cover the working expenses and the interest on the money raised for their construction, either under a guarantee or by direct borrowing, but leave a considerable margin of profit to the public revenue. In 1881-82 this exceeded one million; the next year it fell below half a million, but has since steadily increased, and is estimated again to exceed one million in 1884-85. The endeavour of the Government to get lines constructed by private enterprise without a guarantee has had very little success, but under a limited guarantee a considerable impetus has been given to such enterprise. Sir Auckland Colvin's reproof to the mercantile community that they are liberal with their advice and chary with their money is somewhat misplaced. Railways are not made with the money of merchants, whose capital is fully employed in their own business, but with the subscriptions of the general public—persons retired from business, widows, clergymen, professional persons, and others seeking an investment for their savings. Until Sir Auckland Colvin can persuade this class that investments in Indian railways are safe and profitable, no amount of lectures to the mercantile community will produce the necessary funds. We venture to think that it is the instability of the exchange value of rupees, in which the profits are earned, that prevents railways in India from attracting more of that superabundant capital in England always on the look-out for profitable investment. The necessity for railway extension in India, both for commercial objects and for prevention of famine, is now fully recognized, as well as the enormous benefits to the country and to external commerce which have already been conferred by the lines that have been made. The whole question is now before a Select Committee of the House of Commons, and it is to be hoped that they will arrive at a speedy decision; for, meanwhile, all schemes for further extension are postponed.

In view of the small estimated surplus Sir Auckland Colvin has found himself unable to consider any further financial or administrative improvements. A strong case has recently been made out for the reduction of taxation on legal proceedings. It appears that the court fees more than cover the entire expenses of the courts, so that the unfortunate persons who have to enter them as parties to suits are taxed to maintain those courts which protect the whole community. The moderate Income-tax which, under the name of a Licence-tax, is levied on the comparatively wealthy classes of traders is, we think fortunately, to be also let alone. Nothing, apparently, is said about the export duty on rice, which falls chiefly on Burma, where there is another exceptional impost, the Capitation-tax. It would be well if these taxes could be got rid of. Some compensation might be found in the extension of the Indian rate of Salt duty to Burma. The chief difficulty in the way is due to certain commercial agreements with the King of Upper Burma—agreements the terms of which have been repeatedly broken by the King. It is open to the Government of India to come to a new arrangement, by which all salt going to Upper Burma would pay the full duty. This would allow of the tax being enforced in British Burma, and would bring Upper Burma under contribution as well.

On the whole, the financial statement indicates the continued and increasing prosperity of our Indian Empire. The large remissions of taxation, by the abolition of Customs duties and the reduction of the Salt duties in 1882, which were the result of the measures taken under Lord Lytton's administration, have not affected the stability of the finances; and, in the absence of exceptional calamities, such as war and famine or a further fall in the value of silver, there is good ground for anticipating in the not distant future other beneficial reforms and removals of burdens from the taxpayers.

DVORÁK'S STABAT MATER AT THE ALBERT HALL.

THE performance at the Royal Albert Hall of Herr Anton Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was an event which will prove to be one of the features of the present musical season. Mr. Barnby's setting of the Ninety-seventh Psalm under the title of "The Lord is King," although not to be compared with the great "Stabat Mater," was very welcome as an introduction to the concert, and did not suffer from its proximity to the more ambitious work of the Bohemian composer. A comparison of the two works indeed would be obviously unfair, since their respective intentions and spirit are as widely different as it is possible to conceive, but Mr. Barnby may be congratulated on having been able to associate his composition with one of such rare merit as that to which it served as an introduction on this occasion. "The Lord is King" does not seem to aim at any very high standard of excellence, but the music is very charming and effective, and it is clearly the work of a conscientious and practical musician who really loves his art, and does not suffer himself to be carried away by any desire to appear original at the expense of that art. The impression produced by the Psalm was even more favourable than that produced by some more ambitious flights in sacred music that have of late been submitted to the English public, one of its merits consisting in the fact that it is short and thoroughly intelligible—a merit which in these days of laboured abstruseness is by no means to be despised. Of the seven short numbers which make up the Psalm, the solo and chorus, "Sion heard it and rejoiced," the solo part falling to Miss Anna Williams, who sang it with great spirit, and the double quartette, "There is sprung up a light," are the most noteworthy. The latter is a really good piece of writing, and would have had a more complete success had not the orchestra done its best to mar the beauties by asserting so emphatically its claim to the attention of the audience. In fact it is with this department that our quarrel principally lies, for we think the whole work would have been more effective if the orchestra had been a little more restrained, and the singers, both solo and chorus, had been allowed a chance of vindicating themselves. It is true, perhaps, that the work is somewhat heavily scored, and that the predominance of the brass instruments is occasionally excessive; but much, we feel, might nevertheless have been achieved if the orchestral energy had been checked in its rather wild career. What happened in one of the passages allotted to the horns we are not exactly prepared to say, but the effect produced was certainly far from pleasing. Another by no means slight matter we may be allowed to refer to is the very objectionable system of repeating a number at the desire of a noisy minority of the audience.

With regard to the performance of the "Stabat Mater" we may at once say that none of these objections hold good. Not only did the orchestra perform its part with marked success under the skilful conductorship of the composer; but the chorus showed that much time and care had been expended in the rehearsals of the work. The character of the "Stabat Mater" of Anton Dvorák, the music of which we noticed in detail when published, is subdued in tone as a rule, though there are not wanting at times passages of great vigour, which show that this is only the result of wisely-husbanded power, which is eventually allowed to assert itself as it culminates in a magnificent "Amen" in eight parts. Jacopone's Hymn is divided by the composer into ten parts, each serving as a separate number, not one of which is of a tempo more spirited than "andante con moto quasi allegretto," and it is only in the last half of the tenth number that an "allegro molto" is achieved. This might at first be thought to have a somewhat monotonous and gloomy effect; but it is far from being the case, as it only seems to enhance the religious earnestness with which the work is imbued. The composer has treated his subject, we submit, in the only way in which it could be treated—namely, as a hymn in use in Roman Catholic churches; and he follows rightly, as we think, the example set by so many before him of dividing the work into numbers. It seems almost impossible nowadays for a composer of any merit to come amongst us without some reference being made to the influence or non-influence of Wagner upon his method; and Herr Dvorák has had his share of influence-gauging at the hands of most of our contemporaries. We find that as regards the two schools—the "absolute," as represented by Beethoven, Schumann, and Brahms, and the "poetic," as represented by Wagner alone—Herr Dvorák is dubbed an absolutist, so that in his case Wagner's influence is small. Why this strange definition of the two schools should have arisen, and why the Wagnerians should arrogate to themselves the title of the exclusively "poetic" school, except as another instance of their excessive modesty, is a question we will not stop to answer. Herr Dvorák, however, is of the absolute school, and he divides his work into numbers, and has also dared to evade the rules of prosody; that is, he has used the word "pendebat" as a triplet on occasion, and done many other shocking things in the eyes of his "poetic" critic. Nevertheless, even the "poetic" critic must acknowledge that this work shows a grandeur of design, and an earnestness of purpose, together with a marvellous flow of melody, consummate contrapuntal skill, and mastery of the resources of orchestration—that, in fact, it has quite reached that standard, whether "absolute" or "poetic," which entitles it to be called a work of the first rank, a production of genius. In so fine a performance, as a whole, as was given it is difficult to specify the best pieces; but the quartette, "Quis est homo," admirably sung by Miss Anna Williams, Mme. Patey, and Messrs. E. Lloyd and F. King, the chorus, "Eia mater," "Fac me vere tecum flere," very finely given by Mr. E. Lloyd, and the "Inflammatus," in which Mme. Patey excelled, were the best portions of a very finished performance. As we have already said, the orchestra and chorus were all that could be desired; and Herr Dvorák showed himself to be a conductor of the highest order.

THE MONEY MARKET.

THE business community is divided in opinion as to the wisdom of lowering the rate of discount by the Directors of the Bank of England last week. It is obviously to the interest of all who are engaged in trade to be able to obtain what accommodation they require on the lowest terms, and, therefore, it would seem natural that the commercial community should approve of the action taken by the Directors; but not a few far-seeing persons doubt whether that action is calculated in the long run to maintain a cheap money market. Owing to the substitution of a gold for a silver currency in Germany, and to the resumption of specie payments in the United States and in Italy, there has been for the past dozen years a considerable drain of gold from this country. The Bank of England is bound to cash its notes in gold on presentation, and every one, therefore, who can get possession of a sufficient number of Bank of England notes can draw gold from that institution. As our trade is world-wide, and as we are always indebted to some country or other, it thus happens that the Bank of England has come to be regarded as the one place where gold can always be obtained; and upon the Bank of England, therefore, the first and the heaviest demand for the metal falls wherever that demand may arise. Of late years the Bank has, through a combination of circumstances, been unable to replenish its stock of gold in the proportion desired; and not a few business people thought that now at last an opportunity had offered which the Bank Directors would have been wise in turning to the fullest account. The United States have retained at home for eight or nine years all the gold raised from their own mines, and they have drawn in addition immense sums from Europe. At the same time they have coined about 4¾ millions sterling in silver for some years past, and they have kept in circulation all the paper previously existing. In this way the currency of the country has been augmented in an unprecedented manner during the past four or five years, and during the past two years the demand for currency has been decreasing. The over-construction of railways has led to a collapse of speculation, and that in turn has depressed trade. Consequently there is less requirement for money in every direction, and capital has accumulated to an enormous amount at New York. The Associated Banks of that city during the past few months have held the largest amount of deposits ever before held by them, showing that there is a vast accumulation of capital which cannot be profitably employed. And this fact is still further proved by the circumstance that loans have for months past been freely made to the Stock Exchange at the rate of 1½ per cent. per annum. Thus there is more loanable capital in New York than is required, and, as a natural result, the owners of that capital welcome any opportunity to employ it remuneratively abroad. When, therefore, the Bank of England raised its rate of discount to 3½ per cent., and that rate was maintained for some time, considerable sums of gold were shipped from New York for employment here, and it affords striking evidence of the accumulation of unused capital that the rate of interest in New York, notwithstanding these large shipments, has not risen. Many critics, therefore, urge that since the supply in New York is excessive, whilst the supply in the Bank of England is deficient, the Directors of the latter institution ought to have kept up their rate until they had drawn such a sum from New York as would enable them to face the future without anxiety. Frequent fluctuations in the value of money are always injurious to trade; but frequent fluctuations must occur so long as the stock of gold held by the Bank of England is very low, for the Directors cannot allow much to be taken from that stock; and when, therefore, a drain sets in they are obliged to raise their rate of discount. But if they had augmented their stock in such a way that they could afford to lose without anxiety a few millions, all departments of business would be reassured and would feel that the money market would remain more steady for a considerable time to come. Although the amounts already shipped from New York are considerable, they are not sufficient to give this reassurance to trade. It is true that considerable amounts have been imported from the Continent likewise; but even those amounts, added to the imports from New York, still leave the stock of gold in the Bank of England below what it ought to be if frequent fluctuations in the value of money are to be avoided. It will be recollected that twelve months ago the Directors lowered their rate of discount, and that instantly a drain of gold set in which obliged them once more to raise their rate and to maintain it at 4 per cent. throughout the summer. It is possible that something of the same kind may occur again this year. Should operations in the Soudan be continued, and on a considerable scale, it would be necessary to send out gold; and various other accidents might likewise cause exports of the metal. On the other hand, as Australia has of late begun to take gold from this country instead of sending it to us, while America retains the whole yield of its own mines, and the production of the Russian mines is kept at home, or travels no farther than Germany, we can at present reckon upon no considerable supply coming to us in a regular and normal manner. Should we want to increase our stock, it must be by artificial means.

There is much force in this reasoning, and the force is increased by the fact that between the end of September and the beginning of February over 3½ millions in gold were taken away from this country, and that the Directors of the Bank of England replenished their stock to a large extent by drawing upon the home circulation. Since the end of September, in fact, 2 millions of gold, which were previously circulating in the provinces, have been attracted to the Bank by the artificial dearness of money in London. Should anything occur to increase the country circulation, this gold would flow out again, and thus the stock held by the Bank would be seriously diminished. As long as no great failure occurs that would give a serious shock to credit, or as long as trade remains dull, as it is at present, there is no great likelihood indeed of a considerable increase in the metallic circulation of the country; but it is impossible to foresee what accidents may happen, and it would be well that the stock of the metal held should be sufficient for the Bank without this contraction of the provincial circulation. At the same time, it is not to be denied that there are various other considerations of which the Directors were bound to take notice. We pointed out a fortnight ago that the Directors were able to attract gold in the manner they have done mainly because the changes in the collection of taxes made by Lord Sherbrooke, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, have given the Bank an unusual control over the money market in the months of February and March; and this year their control has been increased by the decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to maintain a larger balance than usual in the Bank. But now it is probable that the expenditure of the Government will be greatly increased; that therefore the balance will be considerably reduced, and in any case the collection of the revenue will fall off greatly at the end of this month. It is doubtful, therefore, whether, with the gold imports assuming considerable proportions, and with the increase in the Government expenditure, while the time is rapidly approaching when there will be a great falling off in the revenue payments, the Bank could have maintained its control over the market. If it could not, if the rate of discount in the outside market had fallen considerably below the Bank-rate, there would have been no advantage in keeping up the latter. No doubt it is a matter of opinion whether the Bank could have retained its control; but the decision of the Directors shows that they at least were inclined to think that they could not retain that control. Furthermore, it is natural on the part of the Directors to shrink from keeping up their rate of discount longer than is absolutely necessary while they are given an advantage over their competitors by the fact that they hold large sums of the public money as the bankers of the Government. Mere delicacy on this point ought not, of course, to prevent them from performing a public duty; but if they believed that they had done enough to replenish their stock of gold, they were right unquestionably in giving to trade all the advantages to be derived from a cheap money market. And on this point it is to be borne in mind that, although the accumulation of capital in New York is so great that it has borne the loss of about 2½ millions sterling without a movement in the rate of interest, yet it was questionable whether a very considerable perturbation might not have been produced if the exports had continued on a large scale. In the United States silver as well as gold is legal tender; but a large party object to receive silver. The New York banks, for example, which hold the ultimate reserve of the whole country, have bound themselves not to accept silver in payment, nor to tender it in payment to their customers. When this is the feeling of the chief bankers of the country, it is easy to understand that a considerable export of gold might have created a serious alarm. During the Civil War the issue of inconvertible paper currency drove all the gold in the country out of circulation, and it is now feared that depreciated silver might have the same effect. The fear at present is confined to mere thinkers; but if a considerable amount of gold had been exported the public generally might have been seized with alarm, and there might have been a serious disturbance in the New York money market. It is clearly not desirable in the interests of the trade of any part of the world to create a banking panic in this way; and if the Bank of England Directors had reason to believe that apprehensions were growing in financial circles in New York on account of the proportions assumed by the gold shipments, they were certainly right in avoiding risk by reducing their rate of discount. Lastly, there are not wanting grounds for believing that imports of gold will continue without keeping up the rate. Even now the value of money in London is higher than in New York or in many of the great capitals of the Continent, and gold has continued to be sent hither since the reduction of the rate; while there appears no reason to suppose that gold is in such demand elsewhere as would lead to a drain of gold from the Bank of England.

The main point to be borne in mind is that the dearness of money in London as compared with the other great business centres of Europe and America is artificial—that is to say, it is produced not by natural causes, but by the mere fact that the amount of gold held by the Bank of England is less than it ought to be under the operation of the Bank Charter Act. The Bank of England in our system holds the ultimate reserve of the country, and that reserve consists of unused coin and notes, the notes being exchangeable at will into gold. If there were reasons to fear that the gold held by the Bank would continue to dribble away, it would of course be the duty of the Directors to prevent the drain; but if no such reasons exist, then it is desirable that trade should have the benefit of a cheap money market. So far as all other circumstances are concerned, the prospect is that the rate of interest payable for the use of capital in the short-loan market will be low for some time to come. There is no speculation of any kind to give rise to a demand for loans, and at the same time trade is exceedingly dull. The amount of business done is perhaps as large as ever it has been; but there is no increase of that amount, and, owing to the extreme lowness of prices, a much smaller capital is required for carrying on business than would be were prices higher. There is no probability at present of a considerable rise in prices, and there is equally little likelihood of an outburst of speculation. Under these circumstances the natural causes that produce a dear money market are wanting. There may of course occur some accident that would throw out all calculations. A great failure might so paralyse credit as for awhile to send up the rate of discount sharply, or a drain of gold to some unexpected quarter may arise; but if accidents of these kinds do not happen, the probability is that the value of money will continue very low; and when almost all the trades of the country are depressed, when heavy losses have been incurred by the fall in prices, and when, in consequence of these losses and of such failures as that of Blakeway, considerable distrust has been aroused, it is desirable in the interests of trade that all the benefit derivable from cheap money should be given to it.

REVIEWS.

ESSAYS ON PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.*

WE have purposely postponed for a few months our review of this remarkable book, in order that it might appear at the juncture most suitable to it—the eve of the second-reading debate on the Franchise Bill. The responsible editor (who does not give his name, but who may perhaps be identified without much difficulty) states the point of view of the book accurately enough as "the Whig, not to say the Conservative-Liberal," point of view; and, as we shall shortly show, it is at least as much Conservative as Liberal. The interest of these three essays, two of which first appeared five-and-twenty years ago, and the third twelve, lies not so much in the complete condemnation by a distinguished Liberal of the past of the Liberals of the present, as in the forcible fashion in which the cleavage between Liberalism proper and Liberalism improper is shown. Only very simple Conservatives will experience in reading this book the rather simple joy of seeing Liberals rebuked by a prophet of their own, for the truth is that Mr. Walter Bagehot is at this time of day not a prophet of the Liberal party at all. In none of its prominent men, with the exception of Mr. Goschen, is there any tincture of his political ethos; in none of the chief Liberal organs of to-day are Liberal measures, even such measures as he might possibly have approved, urged by arguments which he would have thought even worthy of use as accessory and supplementary arguments. To take the three chief Liberal newspapers of the metropolis, it is difficult to say whether the sentimental Liberalism of the Spectator, or the popular and undefined Liberalism of the Pall Mall Gazette, or the purely party Liberalism of the Daily News, would have commended itself least to the author of these essays. In reading them the political phrase which most often recurs to the memory is Mr. Mill's famous, constantly-repeated, and constantly-misunderstood description of the Tory party. There is no reason whatever for doubting or denying that, even so recently as twenty years ago or thereabouts, the Tory party was, in the sense in which Mr. Mill used the words, the stupid party. There is no doubt whatever that in that sense the Liberal party is the stupid party now. At both times it would have been, and would be equally insolent and absurd to say, that any given member of the stupid party must be, or even in virtue of his party principles was likely to be, stupid. At both times it would have been, and would be, not unjust to anticipate, according to the dictum, the politics (actually unknown) of a person perceived to be stupid. He would probably have been a Tory then; he would probably be a Liberal now. For a stupid man's politics are determined by inheritance, by popular commonplace, by sentimental reasons, by his neighbours, by anything rather than reason and deliberate purpose, or even taste. All these causes for generations set, and even a quarter of a century ago had hardly ceased to set, in the direction of more or less moderate Conservatism; they all set in the direction of Liberalism now, and not very moderate Liberalism. Thus in shuffling the political parties have changed rapiers. The old appeals to personal or sectarian feeling, to party signs and watch-words, are heard; but on the other side. There is probably nothing odder in political history than that a party which used to have its Sydney Smiths and its Peacocks has now utterly lost all command (so utterly that it never dares to try it) of satire or wit as a political weapon, and that a party which used to claim "no force but argument" has been driven to caucussing on the one hand, and appeals to passion on the other, to gain and keep its place at the head of affairs.

* Essays on Parliamentary Reform. By Walter Bagehot. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.

Mr. Bagehot belonged rather to the hoplites than to the peltasts of politics, though his remarkable letters from Paris at the time of the coup d'état and other things show that he had not a little capacity for irregular warfare. These essays are almost entirely serious in tone, the chief exception being the story told with admirable quietness of the candidate in 1868 who remarked, "When I do not know what to say, I say 'Gladstone,' and then they are sure to cheer, and I have time to think." Mr. Bagehot could hardly have anticipated the duration of this political resource. But for the most part, as we have said, he is quite sober; indeed, he may be described as not merely sober, but anxious. His book and its author's mood exhibit what may be called the very arête of the Great Divide between the states of things intellectual and political. He has reached that position through Liberal country and by Liberal methods, and he finds that he can progress no further without losing hold of Liberalism. He does not actually lose that hold; he still speaks as a Liberal, and tries to think as a Liberal. But he is ἐπὶ ξυροῦ ἀκμῆς. He says, evidently with a sort of consciousness of blasphemy, that he is "exceedingly afraid of the ignorant multitude of the new constituencies." He endeavours to comfort himself by devising a possible strengthening of the House of Lords, and he urges that strengthening with arguments which, with very slight changes, Lord Salisbury might use to-morrow. We have seen with what deep though unvocal scorn he notes in passing the mere Gladstone-worship which ever since his day has more and more served the average Liberal instead of knowledge, instead of argument, instead of principles. He indicates clearly the danger when the constituencies are greatly increased of statesmen (as we have seen them actually do) abandoning all responsibility, asking for the popular mandate, complying with it, deferring to it, and looking to nothing else. All this is in the latest essay, that written in 1872; but the earlier ones, twelve years older and written long before the last Reform Bill, exhibit with less actual apprehension, as was natural, a not dissimilar temper of mind. The writer is convinced of the excellence of Liberal principles and Liberal programmes. But he already makes admissions and uses arguments which show how not so much his personal professions as the general forces of political argument were coming round to the Tory side. He points out that "the object of the Reform Bill of 1832 was to transfer the predominant influence in the State to the general body of fairly instructed men." A curious difference this from the Reform Bill of 1884. He formulates the great danger of Governments like that of modern England admirably in the words, "A free Government is the most stubbornly stupid of all Governments to whatever is unheard by its deciding classes." Need it be said how fine are the political ears of the agricultural labourer and the lower-class Irishman? He acknowledges incidentally, but decidedly, the degradation of intellectual power in the reformed Parliament of even twenty years ago. He points out that the sweeping enfranchisement of the lower rank means "the practical disfranchisement of the best." He writes a sentence which is in itself an adverse verdict on most Reform Bills:—"A practical statesman will be very cautious how he destroys a machinery which attains its practical object for the sake of an incidental benefit which may be obtained from a different machinery." He puts the disquieting question (disquieting, at least, to superficial politicians), "Whether the democratic theory does not rest on a kind of sentiment rather than on reason?" And he says boldly that, up to a late period of its existence, and with an exception or two, the unreformed Parliamentary system worked very well. These extracts might be indefinitely multiplied. But they are sufficient for the purpose. They show how one of the ablest, best-informed, and most thoughtful political students of recent years on the Liberal side has incidentally or directly destroyed by anticipation every argument which, for instance, Mr. Gladstone used in introducing the Franchise Bill the other day. But they show also how entirely the manner of thought of the Liberal party itself has been changed. We know, of course, that many Liberals have long ago taken the easy step of repudiating Mr. Bagehot. This is, we say, easy, and has been done in other cases. But it may be questioned whether it is wise for a political party, whenever a clever man is mentioned as having belonged to it, to try to prove that he did not.

The moral of the book is, however, not exhausted. Indeed the most important part of it remains to be noticed. These essays are significant of a great and a very unfavourable change in what may be called the mental constitution and habits of one of the great parties of the State, and they contain a whole arsenal of destructive weapons ready for use against the measures upon which the heart of that party is, or is declared to be, just now set. But the impression which the reader derives from them is not by any means wholly complimentary to the author; and the lesson which should be learnt from them first of all is a lesson neither of comfort for Tories nor of discomfort for Radicals, but of warning for men of the author's own kidney, for "those about Mr. Goschen" at the present day, and for the analogues of those about Mr. Goschen at all times. One cannot help saying to the author of these essays, and to all such persons, what the Voice said to Mr. Browning on Easter Day, "'Tis somewhat late!" It is interesting, no doubt, to trace and acknowledge the advantages of an unreformed Parliament over a reformed. But it would, perhaps, have been better to see in time to the retention of those advantages. It is frank and generous and eminently sensible to acknowledge fear of the results of a vast extension of the franchise to ignorant voters; but whose action in times past brought about such extension? It does a man great credit that he has correct notions of the functions of the House of Peers, but it is awkward that he should only wake to those notions after things have been done which make it infinitely difficult and extremely invidious for the House of Peers to exercise its functions. It is admirable to plead for small boroughs, but inasmuch as the extinction of small boroughs is the necessary and unavoidable complement of Parliamentary franchise reform, it would perhaps be more consistent to set the face against such reform. Let us not be misunderstood. We are not advocating anything so impracticable, and if practicable so dangerous, as the division of the nation into tantivy Tories pledged to defend the most patent abuses to the last gasp, and levellers sans phrase. But it seems to us that of all the classes and divisions known to political enumeration, the heaviest responsibility rests on what is called the Left Centre. And we cannot say that, historically speaking, Left Centres have acquitted themselves of that responsibility very happily. Without them the party of destruction is always and everywhere powerless, and with judicious action on their part, the party of reaction or of unthinking resistance to change is certain to be constrained to reasonable concessions. With the Extreme Right they have much more natural affinity than with the Extreme Left, and they never give themselves up to the guidance of the latter without (as we see now) misgiving before and remorse afterwards. Yet they constantly do so give themselves up, and often, as in the matter of the Irish Church, of the Irish Land Act, and (just before the latter) of the 1880 election, from no apparent motive except an altogether mistaken party spirit and the delusive force of party commonplace. On the other hand, while the Left Centre constantly joins Radicals to do what it knows to be evil, it can scarcely ever bring itself to join Conservatives to do what it knows to be good. The Tory party has been much and justly blamed for the action of its larger part in 1867. But does anybody with the slightest knowledge of politics suppose that, if the Whigs could have been counted on to refuse any but a moderate Reform Bill, Mr. Disraeli would have done what he did? This is the curse of political trimming (a vice which seems to be inherent in Left Centres), that it does not really trim, but, as this book shows, always inclines to one and the wrong side. Once only in English history, at the outbreak of the French Revolution, has a Left Centre been, in this respect, politically wise.

A BURGLARY; OR, UNCONSCIOUS INFLUENCE.*

THE author of this strange mixture of sensational drama and discursive twaddle seems to have started with the idea of drawing a thoroughly natural, and exceedingly original, girl, who should be as unlike the ordinary bread-and-butter miss as it was possible to make her, yet possessing a sufficiently distinct charm of individuality and strength of character to exercise an "unconscious influence" on a very pronounced scoundrel, who adds to his many contemptible traits the singular accomplishment of being a gentleman-burglar.

After wading through three volumes of reflections, more or less irrelevant to the personages of this story—which, no doubt, are designed to pass for "analysis of character"—we close the book with a decided conviction that the writer has succeeded only in reducing his characters and his readers alike to a condition of bewilderment. His figures are too shadowy to create any sustained interest in their doings, and, indeed, with one or two exceptions, they are mere marionettes, tantalizingly manipulated by the gentleman behind the scenes, no doubt to his own complete satisfaction, but without doing much to enlighten the audience.

Imogen Rhys, the ultra-natural heroine, is the only daughter of a Welsh squire. The author does not vouchsafe any definite description of the young lady, except that she is "nearly seventeen." She is the inseparable companion of her brother Ralph, who is "nearly eighteen." She imitates him in everything, even in his way of talking. These two pass their time most congenially, in "sugaring" for moths, fishing for eels, and "pig-hunting," and mutually agree in a supreme contempt for society and all its ways, especially the particular frivolities of "Cwm-Eithin." The only point on which they disagree is the somewhat knotty problem of the proper destiny of women. Imogen's only passion is entomology; she would rather capture a "Lathonia" than land a baronet with 10,000*l.* a year. But Ralph insists that women's mission is to marry, which dictum Imogen hotly disputes as an insult to her sex:—"To marry without being in love was a thing which she felt vaguely convinced must be wicked; and falling in love she regarded in the light of a piece of folly—a thing not exactly wrong, but a sort of contemptible weakness, of which she was convinced she would herself never be guilty." Together with these somewhat unorthodox views on matrimony and love-making, she is devoured with an overpowering desire to do something to help the world along, and this is the elegant way in which she expresses her yearning for usefulness:—

> It's awfully jolly, and no mistake, to live as we do now [referring to moth and pig hunting], but yet one can understand it may be as well not to be able to keep on doing it always; when one feels what a lot of stunning go there is in one, it seems as if there's bound to be something to sop it all in somewhere or other, and if every chap's got some sort of work cut out for him to do, I calculate we must have it too.

* A Burglary; or, Unconscious Influence. By E. A. Dillwyn. 3 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers.

She is further inspired by a couple of lines by "a chap, called Arnold"—the oracle of "Sweetness and Light," a chap!

> Tasks in hours of insight willed
> May be, through hours of gloom fulfilled.

Her good resolutions result in nothing more than a little mild district-visiting. With this slight sketch of the heroine's character we pass on to the leading incident of this extraordinary story.

There is to be a grand ball in the neighbourhood, and among the guests that are staying in the house is Ethel Carton, a niece of Mr. Rhys, "an heiress of very great wealth, possessed of more splendid jewels than any other spinster in the kingdom," and having an income "popularly estimated at somewhere between 80,000*l.* and 120,000*l.* a year." It was only natural that on such an occasion as the Owm-Eithin ball, so fortunate a young lady should desire to display all her most costly gems. What more likely, too, than that the fame of these expensive trifles should have tempted a respectable gentleman, holding a responsible position in a house of business, to turn burglar, and endeavour to possess himself of the treasure? Miss Carton arrays herself in "diamonds and sapphires," "enough to make every one turn green with envy," and goes off to the ball. Now it happens that on this particular evening Imogen and her brother had taken advantage of every one being out to plan a midnight fishing expedition. They stealthily creep out of the house by the smoking-room window in the dead of night, conveniently leaving the window unfastened behind them, and the gentleman burglar, lurking outside, is saved the trouble of using his "jemmy." Being well acquainted with the interior of the house, having recently visited there, he bides his time till the party return from the ball. When the house is quiet, and every one has retired to bed, he makes his way to the bedroom of the heiress, and, with dark lantern in hand, and a black mask hiding his features, he at once proceeds to business. But Ethel was only dozing, and with the noise of his moving about the room she is soon "broad awake," and is naturally terrified to see a man in her room coolly pocketing her best diamonds. However, she determines to "simulate sleep, at all events till she has time to think over the situation," and in the meantime the author proceeds to analyse her sensations, and recount the many speculations that he thinks would naturally present themselves at such a stirring moment to a mind much addicted to "masterly inaction." We are forcibly reminded of the old lady who, in somewhat similar circumstances, offered up a little prayer for the soul of the burglarious intruder, and succeeded in converting him on the spot; but, unfortunately, this is not one of the many plans that suggest themselves to Ethel.

We are told, after three or four pages of wool-gathering, that "masterly inaction carried the day with her." She resolved to sleep, like the weasel, with one eye open, and "when his back is turned to take a good look at him." But the amateur Bill Sykes, with a foresight worthy of a professional, has somehow suspected that she may be shamming, and has artfully placed the looking-glass in such a position that "a glance into the mirror immediately showed him the gleam of her open eyes." The cool amateur takes no notice until he has completed the ransacking of her drawers and pocketed her choice set of "diamonds and sapphires", then he returns to the bed and addresses her in an accent which > conveyed to her mind a vague impression of some kind of incongruity, as if the speaker's voice was an assumed one, and the vulgarity of his accent and manner did not sit upon him quite naturally: "Oh! it ain't no use yer pretendin' to be asleep any longer. I knows better, for I seed yer in the glass ven you wos a pryin' at me. Stop quiet and yer safe enough; but if yer speaks so much as vun single word, I'll dash yer brains out with this 'ere life-preserver."

Then by the light of the lantern she saw that one of the fingers from his right hand which held the "life-destroyer" was missing. Before leaving he calmly gags and pinions her in a thoroughly professional style, "making a running noose in a piece of rope, passing it round her neck, and securing it behind her, so that it would choke her if she pulled at it." In this extremely uncomfortable position, unable to move or shout for help, she again indulges in a lengthy reverie, until "kindly sleep" overtakes her and relieves the reader from her interminable reflections and vague speculations on things in general. The next morning there is a hue and cry after the thief. The only clue to his identity is the missing digit on the right hand. The whole household has to submit to an inspection of fingers. This indignity is much resented by the servants, and one of the maids suggests that there is a man in the village, one Richard Richards, a poacher and a dark sort of customer, who, as she remembers, has lost a finger.

This very suspicious circumstance having been confirmed, and the poacher being unable to give a satisfactory account of his movements on the night in question, he is arrested, tried for the burglary, and only escapes conviction by the skin of his teeth, on the unsupported assertion—by the way—of his counsel, that at the very hour when the robbery was committed he was engaged in practising his calling in a remote part of the country. Richards returns to his wife and family, but every one refuses to believe in his innocence except Imogen, who takes the greatest interest in his welfare. Perhaps one of the best touches in the novel is the picture of Imogen visiting the poacher's cottage when he is stricken with fever, brought on by his unjust persecution. In the meantime our author has taken the reader into his confidence and, with some apologies for making the hero a "gentleman burglar," has imparted the secret, more than half suspected already, that the real purloiner of Ethel Carton's jewels is none other than Mr. Sylvester, a friend of the Rhys family, and well known in the neighbourhood. While every one is pursuing the false scent and persecuting the innocent Richards, the real criminal is going about doing everything in his power to foster the popular belief in Richards's guilt. We find him actually arguing against his victim with Imogen just after she has left her protégé's cottage on one of her errands of charity; "sneering at her playing at Providence in the matter of soup or pudding," and so amused himself at the "oddness of the situation" that he is "conscious of a wild impulse to reveal the truth to her", and immolate himself that she may be pleased. But of course he thinks better of it, and almost "despises himself for the weakness of the very thought of such a thing." The author goes on to describe his hero as a man "wrapt up in a coat of mail of selfishness, secretly setting at nought and despising all recognized standards of morality"—a gentleman who expresses the opinion that "the whole world was clearly intended for him to prey upon," but "yet if by any concatenation of circumstances he had found himself compelled to exempt some one individual from the general category of victims and identify that person with himself as the object whereon to bestow the spoils of which he had deprived others, then he could almost imagine himself selecting Imogen to be the favoured exception." This then is the contemptible scamp upon whom Imogen has exerted her "unconscious influence." They see much of each other at balls and picnics. He is amused with her "childish simplicity" and "tomboyish love of enterprise"; and she finds his sarcastic tone and supercilious manner more entertaining than the soft nothings of the good-natured but brainless baronet, Sir Charles Dover, who is over head-and-ears in love with her, but is unfortunately so supremely ignorant of entomology that he endeavours to ingratiate himself into her good graces by carefully sending her two specimens of "Thyatira batis," one of the commonest English moths. He eventually surprises her with a proposal of marriage, to which she innocently replies, "Oh, I am awfully sorry, but I really can't do that. I never dreamt that was what you meant. I shouldn't do at all well as a wife, I know, and shouldn't like it either; I don't mean ever to marry." Although rejected, the soft-hearted Sir Charles does not by any means despair, but determines to bide his time and read up entomology. An opportunity soon after occurs which enables him to appear to the greatest advantage in the eyes of his lady-love and at the same time affords him a splendid chance of scoring off his rival, Sylvester, who is now always "in her pocket," as the author expresses it. A mad dog appears at a picnic. Every one is thrown into the utmost consternation. Sylvester takes Imogen under his protection, and, crouching behind a heap of stones, draws a penknife and, kneeling beside her, whispers earnestly, "You're as safe as if you were in your own drawing-room. Even if the dog should see us and attack us, I swear that he shall not touch you: that my body shall barricade you from him as effectually as any walls could do." Notwithstanding this high-flown bragging, he takes very good care to keep his body well out of danger; and when a girls' school is seen to take to "its" heels and scamper off just in the direction that the infuriated animal is taking, Imogen's impulse is to start up and wave them back, but Sylvester forcibly prevents her. Just at the critical moment Sir Charles "sprang astride on the dog's shoulders" and dexterously twisting a shawl over the brute's head, saves the girls' school and, better still, "excites the admiration of Imogen for his bravery." From that moment she begins to admire and respect the virtuous young baronet, and the wicked but fascinating Sylvester is in danger of being ousted, but that his providential good luck in catching a "Tortrix" for her at once restores him to favour.

The scene now changes to London, whither all the characters are most conveniently transferred. Sylvester, the confidential, right-hand man of the Welsh firm, is found constantly riding in Rotten Row with Imogen, and people are actually beginning to couple their names, &c. Ethel, who is puzzled to account for her cousin's intimacy, has curiously enough never yet been introduced to Sylvester. Surely the rashest of novelists would never have the audacity to marry his unsophisticated heroine to a rogue, thief, liar, and burglar, and allow her to throw over that nice, amiable, long-suffering Sir Charles? Our author cleverly contrives to bring Ethel Carton and Sylvester together at a ball, after some private theatricals at the house of some wealthy friends. Sylvester has, of course, played a part in which he very incautiously assumed the same vulgar voice and manner of speech that he used on the memorable occasion of the burglary. She recognizes him. When he is afterwards presented to her by Mr. Rhys, her face betrays to Sylvester that she knows him. "It pleases you to speak as though this were our first meeting, Miss Carton," he says, coolly, "and all the better if it were so indeed. Yet I can hardly believe that the one occasion when we met before has escaped your memory so readily." Here's a pretty complication. What will she do with him? Before she can make up her mind in this most embarrassing situation there is a cry of "Fire! fire!" and in a very few moments it becomes a case of sauve qui peut. The description of this fire is decidedly thrilling. Of course the wicked Sylvester covers himself with glory. Having rescued Imogen and all the other characters of any importance, including his rival, Sir Charles, by means of a private staircase known only to himself and the master of the house, he is induced by the entreaties of the generous-minded Imogen to go back and attempt to save others. We see him being done to death in the conservatory, from which all escape had been cut off by the smoke and flames—a happy martyr to the one noble action of his life, and content in the consciousness that "she is praying for him—that he has obeyed her wishes." The writer having got over his difficulty by this rather violent device—more suggestive of a Surrey melodrama than a romance of real life—it only remains to complete the triumph of virtue over vice by marrying the heroine to the patient and persistent baronet. The words in which Imogen is made to accept Sir Charles on his renewing his proposal are a fair specimen of the pervading style of this eccentric novel. "Ah, well!" she said, "I suppose it would be hardly fair to treat you worse than I did your moths. And, after all, you are better than them in one way; for while there are lots of Thyatira batos in the world, you know there is only one You."

LIFE OF SIR HENRY DURAND.*

THE writer of this memoir has anticipated one or two of his critics by the remark that "in some respects the story of a man's life can hardly fail to suffer from being told by his son." Too much knowledge joined to natural affection creates a suspicion of partiality. And this suspicion might be confirmed on a hasty perusal by the discovery that Sir H. Durand was at various periods of his life in conflict with superior authority; that he brooded over supercessions and slights, imaginary or real; that, to use a familiar expression, he was often in hot water; and that he never thought himself to have obtained the due recognition of his merit or the high office which naturally fell to others who had no greater abilities and perhaps less honesty of purpose and character. These patent facts, long known to Anglo-Indians, impart a controversial character to much of the narrative. Yet we can conscientiously say that Durand's was an honourable career of which some record was desirable, and that his son has discharged a difficult task with accuracy and conscientiousness, and in attempting to vindicate his father's memory has not been censorious or unjust to others. The leading events of Durand's life are connected with some of the most striking episodes in Indian history between 1830 and 1870. From his childhood he was left almost alone in the world; and, though he might have had a nomination to the Civil Service, he for some unexplained reason was sent to Addiscombe. There he soon distanced most of his competitors and arrived in India as a cadet of engineers in the year 1830. His companion on his voyage was the late Dr. Duff, the foremost missionary of his age, whose friendliness he retained to the last. At the outset he was employed, like most of his profession, in surveying stations for troops, building barracks, and looking after canals. This sort of work was exchanged in 1838 for the excitement of the first Afghan war; and how, as a subaltern in Sir John Keane's army, he blew open the gate of Ghazni and enabled the troops to carry the fortress by a coup de main, is a fact which neither engineer nor civilian is likely to forget. His first great step in advance was, however, his selection by Lord Ellenborough for the post of private secretary. Soon after that nobleman's recall Durand was made Commissioner of the Tenasserim Provinces by Lord Hardinge. Recalled from that post by the Government of Bengal, he went home a disappointed man, but returned to India in time to be present at the battles of Chillianwala and Guzerat. At the annexation of the Punjab he refused a subordinate position in the new administration, and then became Political Agent at the native State of Bhopal. At the time of the Crimean War he endeavoured in vain to obtain active employment under Lord Raglan, and at the commencement of 1857 we find him back in India filling the very important post of Resident at Indore. After the Mutiny he again came to England and was appointed one of the Council to the Secretary of State. Then Lord Canning, who had been struck with his diplomatic and military experience, recalled him to India as Foreign Secretary; and a seat in Council followed eventually as a natural consequence. After five years' good service during the administrations of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, he was selected by the latter statesman for the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Punjab, which he filled for six months, when his life was ended by an accident owing to a blundering Mahout and an impetuous elephant.

The detailed narrative of which this is a summary, cannot afford scope for a biographer to expatiate on the conduct of vast operations, civil or military, such as we associate with the names of Munro and Lawrence. Durand, except in the Mutiny, never had independent charge of a post where he could largely influence the course of events. His career in the Punjab was cut short. In Council, whether at Westminster or Calcutta, he could write forcible minutes and prove a fearless opponent, but he could hardly originate a policy. The dream of his life was to command an army in the field, and, in contrast to his friend Robert, Lord Napier, he never even commanded a division in battle. But there is often as much to be learnt from the record of trials and disappointments as from a long catalogue of unbroken successes and blazing stars. And there is such sterling honesty and courageous independence in the man's character, and so much of prophetic warning in many of his minutes, that we can endorse his son's opinion that the biography ought to find readers in England, where he was "little known," and in India, where he was both "well known and honoured." A few words must be said for the biographer himself. Though comparatively young in the service, Mr. Durand has shown himself worthy of his name. He has acquired a very competent knowledge of Indian politics and history, of the relations of feudatory States to the Paramount Power, and in Oriental terminology he is quite at home. We find no perplexing misjoinders of titles and no muddles about places and dates. Nothing can be better in its way than the sketch of the Agency of Central India, its scope and duties, at the outbreak of the Mutiny. The salary of a Member of Council, we may remark, used to be 8,000*l.* a year, and not 7,000*l.* as at page 332, unless, indeed, in the present mania for irritating reductions, the salaries of the Members of Council have been docked, like those of the Judges of the High Court. Then, every now and then, Mr. Durand, in anxiety to do his father justice, cannot help being a partisan. Many experienced administrators see nothing "unfortunate" in the renewed charter given to the Company by Lord Halifax in 1853, and some even wish that the spirit of Leadenhall Street now and then animated the Secretary of State at Westminster. And on what data does Mr. Durand base his opinion that the press of India in the time of Lord Ellenborough merely represented the ruling class or the Civil Service? If he had lived in those times, he would assuredly have soon found that Civilians then, as afterwards, were the objects of unceasing criticism, and that Lord Ellenborough, with great ability and many fine qualities, had managed to array every class against him except the officers of the army. At page 150 we hear of "a Major Bogle," who was then serving in the army, and to whom was given the post of Commissioner of Tenasserim." The late Major Bogle, who like the Aunt Deborah of Charles Surface, set a high value on himself, had already gained great experience as Commissioner in Arracan, had been recalled from Akyab to his regiment at the beginning of the second Sikh war, and by experience of the Burmese language and character was in every way fitted to rule at Moulmain. However, these are minor points; and, as the son alludes to the father's errors of intemperate language without comment, we can generally admit that he leaves the reader to judge for himself.

For the Anglo-Indian who is curious about forgotten controversies, a very good account of the Tenasserim Provinces and Durand's not unsuccessful administration, and of the disputes which led to his removal, will be found in No. XV. of the Calcutta Review for 1847. We have no inclination to revive an old story; but it is clear that Durand did not want staunch friends and supporters when his conduct and character were fiercely assailed. But we cannot as quietly pass over the episode at Indore. Sir John Kaye achieved literary distinction and wrote divers good books, but he could on occasion be as one-sided as any pamphleteer. In Vol. I. of the "History of the Mutiny" he was signally unjust to Lord Dalhousie; and in Vol. III. he was as unfair to Durand. After praising this Resident's abilities and character, he brings against him two serious charges—first, that he left the Residency at Indore when he ought to have held out and awaited the arrival of Captain Hungerford and his battery from Mhow; secondly, that he deliberately sacrificed Holkar's character for loyalty to his own justification. We have read Kaye again and we have read Mr. Durand; and have no hesitation in saying that he not only completely clears his father's memory from the historian's imputations, but shows that the Resident did everything that a wise politician and a brave soldier could do in "facing fearful odds" and in sticking to his post till it became untenable. Durand's private letters, written in all the excitement of a crisis, show a pluck and a fearlessness of consequences happily paralleled by many others at that terrible crisis. He defended for some hours an unfortified building with fourteen native gunners, two English sergeants, and a few dispirited men of the Bheel Corps, against Holkar's numerous troops—artillery, infantry, and cavalry, reinforced by the armed rabble of the bazaar, till the Bheels and the Bhopal horsemen would fight no longer; and, with the arrival of a small column from Bombay, he was able to put down the insurrection in Dhar and Amjhera, to disperse the forces of a Delhi Shahzada, to reoccupy Mundisore and Sahore, to clear Malwa up to the frontiers of Rajputana, and to prepare the way for the more signal successes of commanders with more ample means. As regards Holkar, Kaye believes this Mahratta prince to have been "thoroughly true to the British Government." Those who, to a careful perusal of Durand's letters and minutes, add some little insight into Mahratta character, craft, and policy, will have little difficulty in concluding that Holkar trimmed and hesitated; sent notes and messages when he ought to have recalled his guns, and simply waited the turn of events. Mr. Durand devotes an appendix to the controversy. It was superfluous to notice an abusive work by the late Mr. Dickinson about Dhar. No one with any pretensions to authority ever thought that gentleman's pamphlets worthy of the smallest notice as a contribution to history.

Truth compels us to say that on other less important occasions Durand invited collision, or took offence where none could have been intended. It is characteristic of Mr. Durand's fairness and candour that he quotes in extenso two letters from men of eminence reproving this habit; one is from Sir Charles Napier, the Commander-in-Chief; and the other is from the late Mr. Henry Drummond, M.P., who, though eccentric in language and manner, always commanded the attention of the House. Sir Charles in his downright, plain-spoken way tells Durand that he has done very wrong in returning an ungracious answer to Lord Dalhousie, who had just offered him the Residency of Bhopal. Mr. Drummond's language is still more emphatic, and should be borne in mind by others far inferior to Durand, who are haunted by the idea that their want of success in life is due to the conspiracy of a clique, and not to their own egregious folly. Thus writes the owner of Albury:—

I must say, from all I have read and heard, that you are making yourself enemies and destroying your own prospects. . . . I have known intimately many naval officers, and I can truly say that I never knew one who did not vow that he was the most ill-used man on the face of the earth. It is quite preposterous to imagine that any set of men conspire to oppress another. If success is not obtained, it should be taken like a broken leg, or sickness, or any other unavoidable misfortune. Every one has some injudicious friend or another to fan the flame of discontent and persuade us the world is not aware of our merits, but they really only help forward our ruin.

It is pleasant to turn from expressions of dissatisfaction, from delayed hopes, or unacknowledged merit, or fiery discussions in Council, to the store of political wisdom to be found in Durand's public minutes and private correspondence. The second volume of this biography is entirely taken up with reprints from the Calcutta Review, or Minutes in Council, where he could make himself heard and influence, if not mould, the course of events. We do not suppose that they will be read, even in India, like Vol. I. But they are good for reference, and cannot be disposed of as the "obsolete theories" of a disappointed man. Many are handled with remarkable weight of experience, forecast of consequences, and breadth of view. Durand was strongly opposed to the abolition of the local European army in India. There might, he said, be a Royal, but there ought to be a local army, even when the Government was transferred to the Crown. Durand was originally against the occupation of Quetta, and, though differing from Lord Lawrence on sundry internal questions, as we have learnt from Mr. Bosworth Smith, agreed entirely with that statesman as regards Central Asia and Afghanistan. Indeed, unlike as these two men were in character, there are points of contact in their straightforwardness, honesty, and simple religious faith. Durand felt confident that God did not give us "this great Empire in order that we should be thus ignominiously kicked out of it or massacred by wholesale." This was written in July 1857, and about that very time Lord Lawrence was speaking almost the same words to his friend Donald McLeod. The remarks on the want of organization in the Crimean expedition, sheltering the troops, and succouring the wounded, were no afterthoughts; and there is much to be said in favour of his plan of a campaign against the Russians in the Caucasus. But, if there be men who still think that an Indian officer has no business to have any opinion on Continental warfare, they must still hear Durand on his own Indian ground. He showed clearly that, whether the Viceroy and Council migrated to Simla in the hot season or not, Calcutta, from its communication with the sea and with the rich Gangetic plain, must always be the permanent headquarters of the Government. The proper attitude of the Government to the press, English and native, has always been a subject of discussion. Durand showed satisfactorily that the establishment of a sort of Moniteur would not improve matters. Lord Lytton's subsequent plan of a mild censorship over the native papers—often spiteful, seditious, and disloyal—was a good solution of the difficulty; but, in deference to cant and commonplace, the post was abolished by Lord Ripon just when it was beginning to tell. Like many other experienced administrators, Durand preferred indirect to direct taxation, and never had heard any complaints from those most interested as to the burden of the salt-tax on the community of Ryots and artisans. All these are big subjects; but whether Durand was right or wrong about an opium reserve, the impolicy of a licence-tax, the expenditure on barracks and public works, or even the great scheme of financial decentralization advocated by Lord Lawrence, and carried out by Lord Mayo and his successor, he always writes with a clearness and fulness which ensured respect if it did not carry conviction. And we may easily conceive, from the general tone and colour of his minutes, the merciless logic with which he would have exposed the fallacies of the Ilbert Bill, or dissected the miserable carcase of that for self-government, or, in plain words, effacement.

To turn from his complaints to his minutes is a pleasure; but the glimpses of his private life and habits are still more satisfactory. There was no sternness in the house. There never was a more attached husband or a kinder father. His letters to his wife and daughters are full of tenderness and good sense. In his religion there was neither cant nor narrowness. In society his conversation was instructive, animated, full of experience and anecdotes. He was a proficient in Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, without being either a pundit or a pedant; he spoke German and other Continental languages, and was a good classical scholar. Indeed, we might fancy him, in the bitterness of some disappointment, saying to one of his sons:—

> Disce, puer, virtutem ex me, verumque laborem,
> Fortunam ex aliis.

After all, a man was not altogether unsuccessful who was Private Secretary to one Governor-General and Foreign Secretary to another, who bore himself bravely and well in the Mutiny, who sat in the Council at Home and in India, who became a C.B. and a K.C.S.I., and who died in the exercise of his duty as Lieutenant-Governor of a splendid province. Modern statesmen cannot despise his warning about the "administration of one of the finest but most dangerous Empires on the face of the earth." And district officers, humble subalterns, Political Agents on frontiers, and all who uphold the framework of that administration, when fretting against supersession, or worn out by climate, isolation, and unceasing work, may take courage and try to do their duty like Henry Durand.

BERLIOZ AS HE WAS.*

THERE is, it appears, more than one Berlioz. The great artist played many parts in his time, among them that of his own apologist. Thus we have the Berlioz of the Mémoires, who is by no means the same as the Berlioz of the Lettres Intimes; we have the Berlioz of the Ronde du Sabbat and the Orgie des Brigands, who has little or nothing in common with the Berlioz of Béatrice et Bénédict and the artist of the Troyens; we have the Berlioz of the Grotesques de la Musique—of "Un Concerto de Clarinette," that is to say, of the "Lamentations de Jérémie," and other masterpieces of wit and irony and fun—and the Berlioz of A Travers Chants—of the analysis of Beethoven's Symphonies, that is to say, and of the studies of Gluck. From this time forward, side by side with these we must place the Berlioz of M. Edmond Hippeau. To him it has seemed good that the musician of the Requiem and the Prise de Troie, having at last attained to that place at the head of the French school which is his by right of conquest and of genius, should be known for the man he really was. To this end he has devoted many years to the study of Berlioz and his works, both musical and literary, sparing no pains to arrive at the truth, omitting nothing which might help to make his achievement enduring and complete. The result is a masterly essay in critical biography. The present volume—a large octavo of near five hundred pages of close print—is but the half of the work. In Berlioz Intime M. Hippeau has studied and set forth the man; in Berlioz Artiste, the complement of Berlioz Intime, he purposes to study and depict the musician. When this is done (and we hope that it may be done quickly), Berlioz, like Mozart and Bach and Beethoven—to say nothing of Auber and Adam and Hérold, will have his book à lui: will no longer need to rely for credit and renown on the effect of his own writings, but will have entered the domain of critical and historical literature as the subject of a real book, the work of one anxious to render him full justice, and able to do it.

M. Hippeau's theory of biography is by no means that of M. Taine. With that distinguished dogmatist, indeed, he does not hesitate to break a lance (and a brave one) ere he starts on his own way. He complains of M. Taine and his followers, that they lose much and gain nothing by considering and defining art and literature as the result of an aggregation of causes; that, in pursuing the discovery and development of generalities to the complete exclusion of particulars, they are guilty of the suppression, or at all events of the misuse, of the only material which is really veracious and representative; that, in preferring the epoch to the individual, they oblige themselves to produce only false science and bad art; and all the rest of it. To him the man is more interesting than the time, the individual than the aggregation, what is personal than what is only collective; and while he resolves to leave no stone unturned to get at the truth about his hero, while he purposes to press into his service every detail of every element—historical, ethnological, physiological, psychological—on which he can lay hands, while he sets out, in fact, with a determination to reconstruct his subject "à l'aide des infiniment petits," he is yet relentlessly persuaded that his theme is not Eighteen-Thirty, but Hector Berlioz, and that he has very much less to do with Berlioz as a detail in Romanticism and the mal du siècle than with the mal du siècle and Romanticism as a background for the figure of Berlioz. "Un livre de généralités," says M. Renan, "est nécessairement dépassé au bout de dix années. Une monographie étant un fait dans la science, une pierre posée dans l'édifice, est en un sens éternelle dans ses résultats." This M. Hippeau quotes with entire approval; and to the category applauded by M. Renan he relegates his own work. "Je ne désire pas," he adds, "comme M. Taine, apprendre la vérité à l'humanité présente et future; il aura suffi à mon amour propre d'auteur d'avoir pu être utile une seule fois à quelqu'un." If that is all he asks, he is pretty certain of his reward. He has done his work so well, and thrown so much new light upon his subject, that not to know him is not to know Berlioz. He is the master's first biographer, and he is likely to remain his best.

He divides his essay into three parts—"L'Homme," "Le Roman," and "Le Supplice." In the first he starts with an analysis of the mal du siècle, the malady of René, of which he regards—and he is right—his hero as an absolute representative. He supports his theory by a set of quotations which are really irresistible; he notes—what has never been noted before—that in all the writings of the composer of Harold and the Fantastique there is no reference of any sort to the writings of the author of the Confessions d'un Enfant du Siècle; he remarks that, if it was from Scott and Byron and Goethe and Shakspeare and Moore that Berlioz derived his artistic inspirations, it is always Hugo and Lamartine "qui traduisent ses propres pensées"; he is careful to observe that the musical influence in which the composer sought and found relief from the "malaise inexprimable" with which he was possessed was the influence, not of Rossini, who had the world at his feet in those days, and who was the chosen musician of Romanticism as well as of society, but of "le grand sur-esprit," Beethoven. As will be seen, the thesis is complete, the picture perfect; the René-ism of Berlioz is so palpable and plain that it would seem not very extravagant to talk of the Berliozism of René. Pursuing his way, M. Hippeau goes on to study the men and women of Dauphiné—Stendhal, Barnave, Condillac, Augier, Poisard, Mably, d'Alembert—and to prove his Berlioz a representative Dauphinois, "brave et jamais dupe," as Stendhal writes of Lesdiguières, or, as Berlioz puts it on his own account, uniting in himself a full measure of those two master virtues, "la prudence et la fièvre." There follows a description of Côte Saint-André, its morals, and ideals and history, with a pleasant note on the house where Berlioz was born. Then comes an account of the Berlioz family, which for M. Hippeau is certainly one in blood with the ancient house—"éteinte au milieu du seizième siècle dans la ligne directe"—which sent forth a crusader in 1346, and gave Malta a knight in 1409. M. Hippeau has much that is interesting and new to tell us of Louis Berlioz, the composer's father, one of the best and ablest of men; of his wife, Marie-Antoinette-Joséphine Marmion; of his two daughters, Nancy and Adèle; and of his second son, Prosper, whose name, so far as we know, no student of Berliozian literature has ever seen before. In this chapter, moreover, M. Hippeau makes an excellent point. In commenting on the relations between Hector and his mother, he tells anew the famous scene in the Mémoires—the scene of the malediction; of Berlioz preferring art with his mother's curse to science with his mother's blessing. After impugning—and rather successfully—the veracity and good faith of the Mémoires in this particular, he proceeds to show, or rather to suggest, with good arguments ad hoc, that, if Berlioz disliked his mother, and was absolutely indifferent to his brother—who was seventeen years his junior, who had a considerable musical talent, and who was able to study unopposed, and even with applause, the art in whose service he himself had met with nothing but mortification and contumely—it was because he was touched with jealousy, to the point of being cruelly unjust to the woman who had borne him and vindictively resentful to the child who, he thought, had supplanted him in her affections. As it seems to us, the hypothesis is sound, and may stand. What comes next is a study of "L'Homme Physique"; the temperament and appearance of Berlioz, his extravagant sensibility, his abnormal nerves, his passion for movement and excitement, his tendency to tears, his extraordinary capacity of misery and happiness. In the next chapter, "Le Caractère," we have an analysis of Berlioz under a dozen different aspects—man of business, man of the world, man of pleasure, wit and humourist and practical joker, fighter, manager, critic, comrade and companion, stoic and sufferer; and this is, in turn, succeeded by chapters on Berlioz as a man of culture (he was only strong, says M. Hippeau, in Virgil and Shakspeare and in the literature of travel), and on the Berlioz of Côte Saint-André—the boy who plagued his schoolfellows to death, and played the drum magnificently, and fell in love with the Stella Montis and was religiously inclined, and wept bitterly over Dido's woes, and had to be bribed with a new flute to attack his osteology, and was so furiously jealous of his uncle, Félix Marmion, that forty or fifty years after he could recall the jingle of that gallant soldier's spurs, and experience something of the passion of rage and bitterness with which he had listened to them long ago. And in this way, with a descant on Berlioz the student—the lectures of Amussat and Gay-Lussac, the life with Charbonnel the pharmacist, the teachings of Lesueur, the chorus at the Nouveautés, the composition and destruction of the Francs-Juges and the Passage de la Mer Rouge—M. Hippeau brings his first section to an end.

It is a type of the whole book. Not easily could one overpraise the diligence with which M. Hippeau has worked; not easily could one over-estimate the pains he has taken to elucidate the facts of the case, and to bring the truth about Berlioz within everybody's reach. It was necessary that this should be done; and M. Hippeau has done it. Berlioz, like Napoleon, was the author of his own legend. He suffered horribly; he was grossly misrepresented and monstrously abused; he determined that the world, if it would know him at all, should know no more of him than he chose; and to this end he wrote, or rather edited, his Mémoires. All his life long he retouched, and revised, and corrected; like the great artist he was, he saw where posterity would admire and where posterity would contemn; and he did his utmost to make posterity his slave. M. Hippeau opines—and we agree with him—that so much astuteness was unnecessary, and that Berlioz has nothing to lose by appearing as he really was. To this end he has gone to work on the Mémoires, the Correspondance Inédite, the letters to Humbert Ferrand; he has compared and annotated and revised; he has collected impressions, and collated texts, and verified facts, and corrected dates. In his second section, "Le Roman," Berlioz fares but poorly. It now seems certain that he behaved exceedingly ill to Henrietta Smithson, and that Henrietta Smithson behaved exceedingly well to him; that before marriage he was only the dupe of Mlle. Moke; and that after marriage he was merely the slave of Mlle. Récio; that he owed to his union with Miss Smithson the happiest years of his life and the noblest of his artistic inspirations; that it might have been better for both if Lélio had never won his Ophelia, but that, if the wreck in which their marriage resulted is anybody's blame, it is certainly not Ophelia's. Berlioz as a lover, in fact, is but a poor creature: he was conscious of it himself, for he wilfully perverted the truth about it; but it is only fair that the world should know the rights of the case, and that the memory of the excellent actress who in her way and degree was an influence in the development of the romantic revolution should be purified of reproach, and made to shine forth as it ought. There are three women in the life of Berlioz (for the Stella Montis of the first years and the last can hardly be said to count); and of these three the best and worthiest is Henrietta Smithson. In M. Hippeau's third and last section, "Le Supplice," it is other guesswork. Here Berlioz is really the hero and martyr he declared himself. From first to last he is the same commanding figure—fearless, unalterably honest, magnificently unfortunate; the Quixote of music. We catch a tragic glimpse of him in Russia:—"Son grand profil d'aigle blessé s'abaissait plus douloureusement que jamais sur sa poitrine." We come upon him again at Grenoble, at the festival held in his honour; but for all the golden circlet which they set upon his white hair, "il n'est plus là que comme un fantôme"; and the storm which rages without—"les rafales qui soulevaient les tentures et agitaient les flammes des lustres autour de lui, . . . l'apparition des hautes cimes et des glaciers illuminés par la foudre"—is but the type of an existence which is nearing its close. Then comes the end. He went out to vote for the election of Charles Blanc at the Institute (Charles Blanc had been kind to him some fifteen or twenty years before), and a week afterwards he died. "Enfin on va jouer ma musique," he said; and he was right. Dead as a man, he began to live as an artist; and now there is no such name as his in French music—there are not many such in the music of the world. Like his life, his ending was most tragical; but he cannot be said to have lived in vain.

JEBB'S ŒDIPUS TYRANNUS.*

THE long-expected edition of Sophocles by Professor Jebb has now happily begun with the issue from the Pitt Press of the Œdipus Tyrannus. The Œdipus Coloneus is to follow as soon as possible, and next the Antigone: and it is announced that each volume will be, as the present is, "in all essentials an independent book." Professor Jebb, in his preface, gives substantial and interesting reasons for the delay which has taken place; the projector of such a literary enterprise might well follow the great example of "beginning late." Such as it now comes forth, the edition is indispensable to the serious student of Greek tragedy, and should do much to multiply the readers of the poet. At a first view the most distinctive feature in it is the prose translation, which is printed on the page opposite to the text, while the brief critical notes (in Latin) and the explanatory notes (in English) occupy the lower parts of both pages. We hold, with the editor, that such a translation is a most valuable part of the commentary. It is, in fact, the best means of securing to the reader what in a work aiming at completeness he is entitled to expect—the judgment of the editor upon every question which the text presents. To praise this particular translation is superfluous. No one but the translator could, we believe, have executed it; and for this part of the work, at least, his name will be a sufficient guarantee. Nor shall we do it the injustice of citation by extracts. Specimens might, indeed, exhibit its grace and fidelity; but the harmony of the whole, that most Sophoclean of literary qualities, is not to be so seen, and, like the original, the translation must be read in its entirety to be properly appreciated.

Indeed, to present an account of the volume at large is beyond our scope. To give a mere catalogue of noticeable points would exclude discussion, and discussion is due to the editor himself. We will only say that we find everywhere the care, felicity, and original power for which we looked, and most heartily recommend the book to all who may value our recommendation. Even here, however, we cannot omit to notice the comparison instituted between the dramatic treatment of the Œdipus legend by Sophocles, Seneca, Corneille, Dryden, and Voltaire (Introduction, p. xxxv.), and the section on metre (p. lxv.), in which are expounded and applied the too little known principles of Dr. J. H. H. Schmidt. In the appendix is reproduced in brief Mr. H. Norman's account of the performance of the play at Harvard; it is interesting to record the conviction of Professor Jebb that "such revivals, apart from their literary and artistic interest, have also an educational value of the very highest order." It is sometimes asked whether we may expect a "definitive" edition of an ancient classic, or whether a particular edition is likely to be "definitive." To our minds, and we gather that Professor Jebb would agree with us, such a question is not to the purpose. The two great ancient literatures of Europe are of such transcendent importance to European life, our thoughts and writings are so based and built upon those of the Greeks and Romans, that every age, for such time as it is worth while to forecast, must desire to read Sophocles, like Shakspeare, from its own point of view and with its own lights. When the last word has been said upon the Œdipus Tyrannus, then Greek will be dead indeed—dead as most assuredly it is not yet. An edition which marks a definite advance, which is whole in itself, and brings a mass of solid and well-wrought material such as future constructors will desire to adapt, is definitive in the only applicable sense of the term, and such is the edition of Professor Jebb. No man is better fitted to express in relation to Sophocles the mind of the present generation.

An examination of the Œdipus Tyrannus raises so many interesting questions that, in a brief notice, if we would get beyond the driest assent or approbation, we are compelled to make a narrow and somewhat arbitrary choice of subjects. We will take, therefore, some of the passages to which the editor has given the distinction of separate appendices, and some of those in which he has questioned or emended the text. We would premise, however, that, whether we agree or disagree, these discussions of detail neither represent nor affect our estimate of the work as a whole—of its unity, completeness, and admirable literary quality.

In the second verse of the play, τίνας ποθ' ἕδρας τάσδε μοι θοάζετε;

arises a well-known difficulty. Does θοάζειν here mean, as usual, to hasten? or is it synonymous with θαίσσειν, to sit? Professor Jebb translates by "Why are ye set before me thus?" deciding, rightly, we think, that the notion of fixed attitude in ἕδρα, sitting, makes the first alternative impossible, and that Sophocles here (and Æschylus also in one extant example) treated ancient language with a poetical and not a scientific liberty, assuming a θοάζειν, to sit, which in strict etymology had probably no existence. In 44. 45 we have a still more notorious crux:—

ὡς τοῖσιν ἐμπείροισι καὶ τὰς ξυμφορὰς
ζώσας ὁρῶ μάλιστα τῶν βουλευμάτων·

"For I see that, when men have been proved in deeds past, the issues of their counsels, too, most often have effect," writes the translator, between whom and Professor Kennedy, who says that, as ξυμφέρειν βουλεύματα means to compare counsels, so ξυμφορὰς βουλευμάτων means comparison of counsels, we shall certainly not assume to arbitrate. Professor Jebb states his own case with effect, and that of his opponents with fairness. He considers that in the long interval between ξυμφορὰς and βουλευμάτων the auditors could not but suppose that ξυμφορὰς had its ordinary meaning, issues, and not the improvised meaning (if it were granted possible) of comparisons. The conclusion of the sentence would thus come with a disagreeable surprise. His illustration of this is much too amusing to be omitted. "Many of the visitors were afterwards present at a collation, and did ample justice to the difference of hands in the MSS. If we heard that read aloud we should be apt to suppose, down to the word 'to,' that 'collation' meant luncheon; and a certain degree of discomfort would attend the mental process of apprehending that it meant a comparison of documents." It will be seen that Professor Jebb's premisses are (1) that ξυμφοραὶ comparisons must at all events have been a very hazardous phrase, since it is now nowhere extant, unless here; (2) that ξυμφοραὶ naturally means issues or results. Whether the other side would accept these premisses we shall not say. When two such authorities cannot agree, the average reader of Sophocles had better be content to doubt. In the entrance-chorus (v. 198) the MSS. offer us the mysterious sentence—

τοῦτ' ἐπ' ἦμαρ ἔρχεται.

The editor accepts the correction τελεῖν and translates "for if night leave aught undone, day follows to accomplish this." Here we shall have more hope of a satisfactory decision upon reading and rendering when some one can satisfy us as to the bearing of the whole sentence on the context. The passage runs in outline thus:—"And grant that the fierce god of death may turn his back in speedy flight from our land borne to the great deep of Amphitrite, or to the Thracian wave. O thou who wieldest the lightning, slay him beneath thy thunderbolt." The sentence in question stands between Thracian wave and O thou &c. The usual explanation (adopted by Professor Jebb) is, "If night omit anything (in the work of destruction), day comes after it to accomplish this." Surely this remark is not only a most inopportune break in the prayer, but is itself expressed with singular obscurity. We suspect the corruption to be deeper than is generally supposed. The next appendix introduces us to one of the oftenest debated passages in the classics, the words (219) in which Œdipus, preparing to inquire for the murderer of Laius, introduces his proclamation by alleging his own necessary ignorance of the circumstances:—

ἄγω ξένος μὲν τοῦ λόγου τοῦδ' ἐξερῶ, ξένος δὲ τοῦ πραχθέντος· οὐ γὰρ ἂν μακρὰν ἴχνευον αὐτός, μὴ οὐκ ἔχων τι σύμβολον· νῦν δ', ὕστερος γὰρ ἀστὸς εἰς ἀστοὺς τελῶ, ὑμῖν προφωνῶ πᾶσι Καδμείοις τάδε, translated by, "These words will I speak publicly, as one who has been a stranger to this report, a stranger to the deed; for I could not have tracked it far by myself if I had not had some clue. But as it is," &c. With most of the editor's negative criticisms we agree, and we think his translation the only possible one as the text stands; but we cannot accept it, for two main reasons. A speaker who uses the conditional phrase "if I had not had some clue" distinctly implies that he has a clue; but νῦν δέ, "as it is," here no less clearly means, and is explained by Professor Jebb to mean, "as I have no clue"; and this apparent contradiction cannot, to our thinking, be got over. Further—and to this objection Professor Jebb should, from his arguments upon ξυμφορὰς βουλευμάτων, accord some weight—the sense is complete at the word αὐτός, for in a sentence of this mood and form the laws of Greek impel, not to say compel, the hearer to supply from the preceding words the condition εἰ μὴ ξένος ἦ τοῦ πραχθέντος; the substitution of a different condition is, therefore, in the nature of a surprise. It is true that in such cases the condition is not always left unsupplied, and the editor quotes an instance from Demosthenes (De Cor. § 228) in which it is expressed. But what is the condition expressed? The very same which the hearer would otherwise have understood, not, as here, a different condition. The meaning we require is that given by Mr. Blaydes, "for, if I had not been thus ignorant, I should not even by myself (αὐτὸς) have searched far without having some clue," i.e. I should have found a clue with no long search. (Professor Jebb thinks—we do not quite see why—that this would imply that the speaker had actually been searching.) The sole, though fatal, objection is the presence of μή. The plain remedy, then, is to eject it; and our only difficulty—not a very small one—is to imagine how it ever came in. Perhaps it was the learned blunder of an ancient editor, who took οὐκ ἔχων for a condition; or perhaps we should see in αὐτοσμὴ the remains of αὐτὸς ὀσμὴν, where ὀσμὴν would be the gloss or conjecture of some one who thought that ἴχνευον required an object, and remembered from the Ajax (v. 7) that to track scent is a Sophoclean metaphor.

Professor Jebb's original conjectures in this play are twelve in number (besides two conjectural supplements); seven are admitted into the text. Among them the palm is due to the beautiful restoration of 1218, δύρομαι γὰρ ὥσπερ ἰάλεμον χέων ἐκ στομάτων, "I wail as one who pours a dirge from his lips" (MSS. ὡς περίαλλα ἰαχέων or ἀχέων). It is for the sake of such discoveries as this that the science of MSS. evidence is worth study. Next to this in interest, and not far from it in convincing certainty, is that in 1090, τὰν ἐπιοῦσαν ἔσῃ πανσέληνον for οὐκ ἴσῃ τὰν αὔριον πανσέληνον. This appears very bold, and perhaps that is why Professor Jebb does not put it in the text. With scientific explanation it is not really bold at all, and we should like to see it promoted in a second edition. Upon the corresponding passage of the antistrophe the editor does not so completely convince us. The Chorus are conjecturing that the unknown parents of Œdipus must be sought among the divine beings who haunted Mount Cithæron:—

τίς σε, τέκνον, τίς σ' ἔτικτε τῶν μακραιώνων ἅρα Πᾶνος ὀρεσσιβάτα πα-
τρὸς πελασθείσ', ἢ σέ γ' ἐτίς τις θυγάτηρ
Λοξίου; τῷ γαρ πλάκες ἀγρόνομοι πᾶσαι φίλαι.

Now it is impossible, as commentators have seen, that "a daughter of Apollo" should be supposed the mother of a child by Apollo himself. Hence various remodellings of ἢ . . . Λοξίου. Our best MS. omits τις, an omission to which we should not ourselves attach much weight, holding it, for certain reasons, easily explicable. Professor Jebb, starting from ἢ σέ γε θυγάτηρ Λοξίου, conjectures ἢ σέ γ' ἔφυσε πατὴρ Λοξίας; and, accepting τᾶν for τῶν, translates thus:—"Who was it, my son, who of the race whose years are many that bore thee in wedlock with Pan? . . . Or was Loxias the sire that begat thee?" This brilliant suggestion not only far surpasses its predecessors, but might well be thought conclusive. We demur, however, on several grounds. First, as the editor acknowledges, the preceding alternative points to some mention of the mother. Secondly, is it quite probable that in the simple sentence—ἢ σέ γ' ἔφυσε πατὴρ—even when written in continuous uncials, the final syllable of ἔφυσε should be taken for "a repetition of the pronoun σε," and that the mistake would escape a second time upon revision? Thirdly, is the feminine ai μακραίωνες altogether acceptable? We venture to think not. Substitute in the translation any clearly feminine phrase (e.g. "mothers" for "race") and consider the effect. We would essay, with submission, a new defence of the MSS. In alternative clauses, Greek is extremely tolerant of elliptical constructions, the parallel sentences mutually supplementing each other. Now the peculiar position of ἅρα points to a slight pause after ἔτικτε, the alternative parts of the sentence commencing with τῶν μακραιώνων. May not the full construction, then, be—τῶν μακραιώνων ἅρα τις θυγάτηρ Πᾶνος πατρὸς πελασθεῖσα, ἢ τῶν μακραιώνων τις θυγάτηρ Λοξίου πατρὸς πελασθεῖσα? "Who was it that bore thee—some daughter of the ancient ones, was it not, wedded to Pan, or perhaps to Loxias?" (πατρὸς is to be taken predicatively.) We may observe that "daughter of the gods" is no mere synonym for "goddess." The mortal Œdipus could not be sprung on both sides from divine beings of the highest rank. One of his parents must have had at most only the semi-divine rank of the nymphs. Of Professor Jebb's minor corrections, Οἰδίπουν in 1091, κάτα in 1280, ταὐτοῦ in 1405, seem to us as successful as they are acute, nor do we think that it will be easy to improve upon μονάδ' for νομάδ' in 1350. In 1031 we do not think he has solved the problem, though he is undoubtedly right in rejecting every solution which takes no account of the variant ἐν καιροῖς. Œdipus asks the herdsman who found him, when exposed as an infant, what was the pain from which, as implied by the previous remark, he was then suffering. Professor Jebb would give the question thus—τί δ' ἄλγος ἴσχοντ' ἐγκυρῶν με λαμβάνεις; where ἐγκυρῶν is a conjecture for ἐν καιροῦσ or ἐν κακοῖσ. It is, however, somewhat superfluous and not very liable to the supposed corruption. Now one of the best MSS. gives ἐν καιροῦσ λαμβάνεις. This plainly ungarbled transcript affords a strong presumption that in some uncial progenitor of our copies the syllable which preceded λαμβάνεις was not με at all, but μα. Nothing is more common than the loss of a letter or letters in such combinations as ΜΑΛΑΜ, which may be compared for confusion to the m, n, and u of our modern cursive. This at once indicates that what really occupied the middle of the verse was a substantive in -μα, of course describing the infant, that ἴσχον is the neuter participle agreeing with it, τ the necessary article combined with it, that it probably began with an a (hence the error ἴσχοντα which some MSS. actually give), and that the rest of it was such as to give rise to the variants. Possibly more than one word might satisfy the conditions thus presented. We ourselves incline to find the common origin of ἐν καιροῖς and ἐν κακοῖς in ἐν καλοῖς. Some expositors justified this by the explanation ἐν καιροῖς, wrongly but not at all unreasonably, since ἐν καλῷ for ἐν καιρῷ is common; others preferred the bad conjecture ἐν κακοῖς. These lines would take us straight to the reading—

τί δ' ἄλγος ἴσχον τἀγκάλισμα λαμβάνεις;

"And what pain had the nursling when thine arms received it?" —not, perhaps, such a very bad reading either. So Euripides calls an infant a ὑπαγκάλισμα.

One remark of a less pleasant character we have to make in closing this notice. Professor Jebb has informed the public of the authorship of an article in the Saturday Review. The intention was, no doubt, complimentary. But at a time when vulgar curiosity is doing its best to abolish the long-established and invaluable principle of anonymity which has always been observed by the better part of the English press, we cannot give the countenance of silence to an infringement of a custom to which we attach a particular value.

WE find it by no means an easy task in judging this book to look at it from the point of view of the ordinary reader. To us a selection—a small selection—from the letters of Horace Walpole seems almost an act of impertinence. He and his World can never be known by a selection. The reader who would know both the one and the other must begin with the first letter written by the clever, lively lad of eighteen, and go on through the two or three thousand of them till he parts company with the old man worn out with disease, but never dull, as in his eightieth year he passes away. In the last letter that he wrote he blames his correspondent for showing his "idle notes, which," he says, "I cannot conceive can amuse anybody." Yet at once he falls into his old lively strain. "At home," he writes, "I see only a few charitable elders, except about four score nephews and nieces of various ages, who are each brought to me about once a year, to stare at me as the Methuselah of the family." Following his guidance we become acquainted with three generations of men. We see the elders of the first dropping away; the men of the second in their youth, their vigour, and their age; and those of the third beginning to fill up the places left vacant on the stage. Yet, while the people about whom he writes spread from the days of the Stuarts to the days of Victoria, in his letters there is never any break. So full are they, so numerous, and so unbroken in their succession, that we pass through the long years without once being struck with the vast difference in the world which he described in his youth and is describing in his old age. We get slowly to know intimately a large company. We see them slowly growing older and older. Some of them die, others drop out of his and our acquaintance. Their place is taken by new comers, whom in like manner we get slowly to know. To no one, perhaps, do we become strongly attached. We make acquaintances, pleasant enough acquaintances, but scarcely any friends. No one do we miss as we miss Goldsmith and Garrick in the pages of Boswell, unless perchance it be the blind old Mme. du Deffand. But the variety is endless and unwearying. Johnson asked:—"Was there ever yet anything written by mere man that was wished longer by its readers, excepting Don Quixote, Robinson Crusoe, and the Pilgrim's Progress?" We would answer, "Yes; the nine big volumes of Horace Walpole's Letters. There should have been a tenth." For days of illness, for nights of wakefulness, where can pleasanter reading be found? Let him who, some hours before it is dawn, finds he can no longer sleep, keep always by his bedside one of these volumes. They pleasantly occupy the mind, but do not fatigue it, still less do they excite it. When at last nature calls for further repose, the book is at once dropped—for there is never any distant point to which we are tempted to read on—and sleep is not kept off by the remembrance of what has just been read. The only drawback is that the volumes are so heavy. There should be not nine, but almost nine times nine of them. Each should be so light that it could be held by an old man's failing hand. But they should be read long before old age begins to threaten, so that, when the real need comes for them, they may be looked upon as friends of long standing. If he who knows not whist is preparing a sad old age for himself, one scarcely less sad awaits him who has not learnt to enjoy Horace Walpole.

This is the work whose perfection is its fulness, of which Mr. Seeley gives us Select Passages. We felt, as we have already said, that it was indeed hard for us to form such a judgment of his book as might be of use to the ordinary reader. We, therefore, made an experiment, if we may be allowed to say so without disrespect, in corpore vili. We gave it to a young lady who had never read a single letter of Walpole's. We were, we must confess, disappointed with the result. She read these Select Passages with interest. Had she lived a hundred years ago she would have pronounced it "a very pretty book." As it was, she merely called it "nice." There is, after all, we fear, too much of what we may call "Jack-Horneying" in the world; too great a love in the case of books as well as of pies for pulling out the plums, and leaving on one side that in which they are set. Yet for all we are told, Jack Horner, though he began with the plums, did in the end eat the paste. We may hope, therefore, that some of those who in an unwholesome manner begin with these select letters, may go on to finish the whole nine volumes. If such a selection was to be made, we do not know that there could have been a much better one than that which is here given us. We do not, however, altogether like the "tags" by which one select passage is joined to another. We get a little irritated in reading such lines as the following:—"Arrived in London, he is again in his element"; or "A little later on we have more gossip about the humours of the day and of Lady Queensberry"; or "The attack [of illness] proved obstinate, and we have again complaints of the English climate, mixed with lamentations over the change in English manners." We doubt, however, whether Mr. Seeley has that close acquaintance with the times which is needed in the editor of such a work. At all events, we see not a few places where an illustrative note might well have been given. Thus when Walpole writes, "Mr. Beauclerk has built a library in Great Russell Street that reaches half-way to Highgate," the reader should be reminded, or rather informed—for a reader of Select Passages is likely to hear of it for the first time—how Wilkes said he wondered to find in the library of a gentleman of Mr. Beauclerk's character in the gay world such a numerous collection of sermons, and how Johnson turned Wilkes's wonder upon himself. He should be told, too, that so vast was the library that its sale was spread over fifty days by auction. The mention by Walpole of "Lady Di's windows" should have brought in the passage in which Miss Burney tells us how Sir Joshua directed her to look at Lady Di Beauclerk's house, and how Burke rejoiced "to see her at last so well housed" after all she had suffered from her husband's "singular ill-treatment of her." The admiration that the London Pantheon raised in Walpole when he was now an elderly man might well have been compared to the feelings of delight that its glories excited in Miss Burney's youthful heroine, Evelina. An apt parallel passage might also have been found in Boswell. When he and Johnson visited it, "I said," writes Boswell, "there was not half-a-guinea's worth of pleasure in seeing this place." "But, sir," answered Johnson, "there is half-a-guinea's worth of inferiority to other people in not having seen it." Here and there a note seems either superfluous or deficient. For instance, on the same page are mentioned Persian Jones and Mr. Wraxall. If the reader is told by the editor that Mr. Wraxall was "afterwards Sir Nathaniel William Wraxall, Bart., known by his 'Memoirs of His Own Life,'" why is not his ignorance also enlightened as to Persian Jones? Macaulay's Fourth-form schoolboy knows of course all about Sir William Jones; but, then, he is equally well informed as to Sir N. W. Wraxall.

When Mr. Seeley maintains, in very un-Walpolian English that "the extant results of Walpole's diligence display a full picture of the period, distorted in many places by the prejudices of the artist, but truthful on the whole," there we cannot agree with him. Very far indeed is the picture from being a full one. He who should know the period only from Walpole's Letters would know but a small part of it indeed. What could a man of his temperament, as fastidious as it was acute, know of the great rough, moving world that was around him, or rather, as he would have thought, beneath him? What he did see he saw very clearly; but, after all, he saw but one small part of the whole of English life. He knew next to nothing of the great writers of his age. He was so ignorant of Johnson that he said his life might be written in four lines. He had, it would seem, never heard of his strength or his courage. He called him "an unfortunate monster, trusting to his helpless deformity for indemnity for any impertinence that his arrogance suggests." Little did he know of the man who, first buying a great oaken cudgel, wrote to tell Macpherson that he would never be deterred from detecting what he thought a cheat by the menaces of a ruffian. Walpole was so much above everything that was "low" that he was most thoroughly tired, as he says he knew he should be, with an evening in which Garrick and Goldsmith joined in what must have been an admirable piece of humorous buffoonery. Insensible as he was to the merits of Johnson and Goldsmith, scarcely less insensible was he to those of Sterne, Fielding, and Richardson. His admiration for such a poor writer as Mason was excessive. Still less did he know of the great wave of religious feeling that was spreading over the land in the wake of the Wesleys and Whitfield. Of the vast economic changes that were silently going on, scarcely a trace is to be found in his letters. Admirable though the picture is that he gives, it is but one long-continued view of one part—a brilliant part, no doubt—of English eighteenth-century life.

With Mr. Seeley's judgment of the literature of that age we are as far from agreeing as we are with Walpole's. Indeed, Walpole's opinions seem in one case to have been accepted by him without any misgiving. Mr. Seeley writes:—

> Some excuses may be made for his disparaging criticisms. The literati of his day were certainly eclipsed by the contemporary orators. What writer was left in prose or verse, on the death of Swift, who could compare with Mansfield or the first William Pitt? Which of the poets or historians of the next generation won the applause which was called forth by the speeches of Fox or Sheridan or the younger Pitt? If Fox and Sheridan could obtain their greatest triumphs in the midst of gambling and dissipation, and apparently without pains or application, there was some apology for slighting the labours of Robertson and the carefully polished verses of Goldsmith.

Mr. Seeley, by the way, is a good deal out in his chronology when he makes Goldsmith's verses compete, as it were, with the oratory of Sheridan. We might, indeed, object to his making them compete with that of Fox. Sheridan was but thirteen years old when The Traveller was published, and The Deserted Village came out before he had reached his nineteenth birthday. He was, moreover, still in his teens when Boswell, pressing Johnson for his opinion on the merit of Robertson's History of Scotland, received as answer, "Sir, I love Robertson, and I won't talk of his book." But Mr. Seeley, as we have said, is here following Walpole. "Except," Walpole wrote, "for such a predominant genius as Shakspeare and Milton, I hold authors cheap enough; what merit is there in pains, and study, and application, compared with the extempore abilities of such men as Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, or Mr. Pitt?" But has Mr. Seeley for one moment himself considered who were those whom he calls, no doubt contemptuously, the literati of Walpole's day? Has he forgotten the great cloud of writers who make last century so famous? Have Mansfield, Chatham, Fox, Sheridan, and Pitt eclipsed Fielding, Smollett, Sterne, Johnson, Goldsmith, Hume, and Gibbon? Could any one or anything eclipse Tom Jones, and Tristram Shandy, and The Vicar of Wakefield, and Humphrey Clinker, and The Lives of the Poets, and The Moral Essays, and The Decline and Fall? The speeches of Chatham that were most admired were years afterwards found to have been written by Johnson in a garret. We had thought that the ignorant contempt that had been poured on the great writers of last century had died of exposure; but it still shows some signs of life. When we come across it we almost long for Reynolds's convenient deafness, of whom we read in "the carefully polished verses of Goldsmith":—

> When they talked of their Raphaels, Correggios, and stuff,
> He shifted his trumpet, and only took snuff.

To part, however, with the editor of the Select Passages with a friendly word, we must not forget to thank him for the interesting illustrations, which add not a little to whatever attractiveness his volume might otherwise have had.

HISTORICAL PORTRAITS OF THE TUDOR PERIOD.—VOL. IV.*

WE heartily congratulate Mr. Burke and his readers—and, having been faithful among the latter, we may venture to add that we congratulate ourselves—upon the conclusion of his labours. In what he calls an Introduction to the present volume, after making his acknowledgments to those who have helped or liked his book, he administers a parting rebuke to "a literary journal," the identity of which we cannot pretend to mistake. He resents our astonishment on a previous occasion that he should "reappear undaunted and unabashed"; and tells us, in return, that he is fearless because he is the advocate of Historical Truth, "a sentiment which I believe to be esteemed and honoured by every high-minded and chivalrous Englishman."

That there is something chivalrous in Mr. S. Hubert Burke himself we do not deny; moreover, he always writes like a gentleman, even when he writes bad grammar. But, though fully armed with a tremendous controversial apparatus and astride on principles which are proof against argument, he is as unfortunate as were the Danish king and his knights at Hemmingstedt when, horse and man, they stuck in the marsh. The truth is that, with zeal enough and to spare, he has not learnt to combine a fair proportion of discretion; and that, like the king aforesaid, he accordingly meets with more cold water than he may have looked for. In answer to his challenge, it once more becomes our duty to show, as briefly as may be, how he has once more proved himself unfit for the function which he has so confidently assumed. We do not feel it necessary to ward off any suspicion of prejudice on our part against Mr. Burke as a devoted adherent of the Church of Rome. In our review of the third volume of these Historical Portraits (April 7th, 1883) we attempted to show how little the cause of historical truth really gains from the combative onesidedness of partisanship, however imposing may be its accumulations of evidence, even of evidence in itself trustworthy and significant. If Mr. Burke considers that his entire method of writing or reviewing history cannot with justice be called onesided, we have clearly been unable to persuade him to the contrary. On the present occasion, therefore, we must confine ourselves to the humbler task of proving that his carelessness and extravagance have not decreased as the number of his volumes has increased; and that, though he may be undaunted and unabashed, his laches are such as would be inexcusable in the merest recruit desirous of finding a place among writers on English history.

In speaking of Mr. Burke's carelessness, we do not refer to the carelessness of Mr. Burke's printer; nor are the mistakes introduced by the latter into the history of the former quite as dreadful as those by which Miss Fanny Fudge's printer impaired her prosody. The "Aulutaria" of Plautus may pair off with Cardinal "Bessarian"; while a possible old spelling of the name "Chaucer" is balanced by the perfectly new spellings "Gregori Letti" for Gregorio Leti, and Count "de Ritz" for Count de Retz. Unless these Historical Portraits should reach a second edition, Mr. Burke's readers will remain in doubt, so far as he is concerned, whether the second part of the name La Motte or La Mothe Fénelon, should be written Fenelon, or Fénélon, or Feneleon. According to Littré all these three ways are incorrect. From the laws of spelling we pass by a not very abrupt transition to the rules of composition, a due observance of which is surely quite compatible with the service of Historical Truth. The inverted commas which make a sort of camera stellata of Mr. Burke's text cannot relieve him of the responsibility of eccentric constructions which have an all too characteristic family likeness to one another. Thus we read in a description of Queen Elizabeth's personal appearance, which seems to be taken in part from some unspecified source, that "No one, when she pleased, could be more amiable, when young." Elsewhere we are told that Sir Christopher Hatton often had to settle the disputes between the ladies of the Queen's Court:—

> When his arbitration was not accepted, the case went before the Queen, who quickly decided by a box on the cheek, or a pinch in the fat neck, or to be confined in their apartments for so many days, or relegated to the charge of some courtier in a lonely country mansion.

These oddities do not stand alone, but the depth of obscurity is reached (perhaps not altogether inappropriately) in the last sentence but one of the following picture of the torture-chamber in the Tower. As before, we cannot state what authority is implied by the inverted commas; nor do we know whether the italics are Mr. Burke's, though he greatly affects this engine of emphasis:—

> The Tower rack stood in the long vaulted dungeon below the armoury. The cells were underground, with no light but the flicker of a far-off lamp. "The rats were racing about in dozens;" and have been described as "daring in the extreme, and not like any other rats they had ever seen." To add to the horrors of the place, no cat was permitted to enter the infernal regions.

Are we to understand that the Tower rats were unlike any other rats they had ever themselves seen? In this case, one might have expected them, like Fear in Collins's Ode, to have back recoiled at the sound they had themselves made.

Slovenliness of this kind would not be worth touching upon, were it not an unfailing index of inaccuracy in matters of greater importance. And there are few varieties of inaccuracy of which Mr. Burke does not contrive to make himself guilty—indeed he may be said to court danger with a chivalrousness which sometimes leads him, like the good Knight of La Mancha, into strange vicissitudes. Why, for instance, should he have treated us to a short chapter (to be sure it is a very short one) on the English Drama? He clearly lacks even so much knowledge of the subject as might have at all events apprised him of its difficulties. For him the biography of Shakspeare is a collection of traditions which may be accepted as facts, and the criticism of Shakspeare's Sonnets a terra firma offering the safest of footsteps. He narrates as a certainty that Paul Whittington, the last monk who enjoyed a pension from the Crown, "in his old age received visits from Shakspeare, Spenser, Ben Jonson, and Walter Raleigh." He informs us, as a matter removed beyond possibility of dispute, that in one of his Sonnets Shakspeare testifies to the genius of Spenser. We presume the reference is to the eightieth sonnet, which has, with quite as much probability, been supposed to refer to Drayton, and to Daniel. He, with more hesitation, repeats the absurd supposition of "some," that Spenser's Irish wife had been "a peasant-girl, Arcadian-like, attending her father's flock at a stream, who quite enchanted the love-stricken Poet." He does not shrink from original criticism of his own, declaring that the Rape of Lucrece, "had Shakspeare written nothing more, would have entitled him to rank on a level with the author of the Faërie Queen; and, far above all other contemporary poets," including, we suppose, the author of Hero and Leander, whom Mr. Burke condescendingly calls "unquestionably a man of genius, however deficient in taste and judgment." On the other hand, his acquaintance with the elements of English dramatic history is singularly imperfect; he evidently thinks Gammer Gurton's Needle the oldest English comedy; and confusingly refers to The Spanish Tragedy under the title of Jeronimo. We should be interested, by the way, to know Mr. Burke's authority for asserting that Sir Christopher Hatton was author of the fourth act of Tancred and Gismunda, and that when the play was printed in 1592 (Wilmot's version was really printed in 1591, but some copies have the later date) "the name of the Royal favourite was thus affixed—'Composuit Chr. Hatton.'" But our author's vagaries are by no means confined to one particular domain of literature or of knowledge. He startles us in a note by the statement that Holinshed's real name was Harrison—doubtless a development of the fact that Harrison furnished Holinshed with a "Description of England." He says of Roger Ascham that he "could like Tityrus play upon the lute," though he does not reveal how a lute could be constructed out of oaten reeds. He asserts that Archbishop Tenison supported a plot for the restoration of James II.; but "the plot fell through," as we fear must also fall the attempt to implicate so cautious a prelate in so hazardous an enterprise. In the mere matter of names Mr. Burke shows a weakness of memory for which we should have nothing but sympathy were it not that the slightest amount of care in the revision of his proof-sheets would have easily cured its effects. "Kate of Hardwick" is a new reading for "Bess," adopted in but a single passage. The Assington mentioned as tried for treason on p. 207 is so evidently the Asingdon mentioned as a member of the Association for the Protection of the Jesuit Fathers on p. 109, that we fear the treason prisoner named

* Historical Portraits of the Tudor Dynasty and the Reformation Period. By S. Hubert Burke. Vol. IV. John Hodges.

"Chidoke" on the later page can be no other than the Chidiock Tichbourne who occurs on the earlier. Worse than this, Bishop Ken is on p. 70 twice over transmuted into Bishop Kerr.

In the arrangement of his materials Mr. Burke shows a disregard of the most obvious dictates of convenience. The volume is, indeed, like its predecessors divided into chapters, and a list of the sections in all the four volumes is vouchsafed at the close in an alphabetical Table of Contents, which, like everything else in the book, is sui generis. Who, for instance, would guess at the chance of finding "Fall of the Duke of Buckingham" among a series of titles of chapters beginning with the definite article ("The Young Widow," "The Irish Cousin," "The Border Chief," &c. &c.)? The chapters themselves succeed one another on no perceptible principle whatever; and within them there is neither order nor cohesion. The chapter on the sufferings of Lady Lennox might have connected itself naturally enough with that on the marriage (to Darnley) of the Queen of Scots; but between the two are inserted a rambling discourse on the Use of Torture, and a section quite out of chronological sequence, since the Anjou episode is its main theme, called "Memorials of Royal Love Scenes." The chapter on "The English Drama" follows upon a narrative of the Northern Rebellion, and precedes an account of the later experiences of Bothwell. Mr. Burke's manner is not so much discursive as (to use an eloquent word of his own) "decollated"; indeed, his chapters often have neither head nor tail, and towards the end of the volume in particular this collection of Historical Portraits resembles that room in many exhibitions of pictures where the odds and ends are crowded together and where no patience proves equal to finding out the hidden gems.

Such faults as these, however, might be excused, and Mr. Burke's book might have its use, did he at least supply intelligible guidance to the authorities on which he has based, or rather out of which he has, like an unskilful worker in mosaic, stuck together his narrative. We have already spoken of his inverted commas, which leave the reader in constant ignorance as to whether the author is speaking in his own name or in that of some writer known or unknown. Occasionally the obscurity is increased by a doubt whether the ipsissima verba cited by Mr. Burke have come to him at first or at second hand. Thus we read, without being led to form any new conclusion as to the date of the Merchant of Venice:—

> Christopher Hatton formed no exception as to "pecuniary difficulties," for Walsingham was also in debt, and it all accords with the popular idea of the chivalrous Sir Philip Sydney to find him "hopelessly in debt." In 1581 Philip Sydney wrote to Hatton, beseeching him "to solicit the Queen for some aid to keep off a Dutch Shylock who worried him to death."

Even when Mr. Burke goes so far as to give a statement on the authority of "a contemporary" or "a contemporary of critical judgment," he cannot be said to do much towards making darkness light.

We do not deny that Mr. Burke's footnotes are full of references to works and passages, or insinuate that he is unacquainted with a considerable portion of the literature of his subject. In fact, he has devoted a chapter of some length to an examination of "conflicting authorities," opening it with a dictum of Dr. Maitland, which may certainly defy contradiction, that "the question of authorities is a very grave one indeed." The list given by Mr. Burke is very far from complete; but it is upon the whole quite equal to that which M. Dargaud has appended to his vivacious Histoire d'Elisabeth d'Angleterre. What is worthy not only of notice, but of acknowledgment, is that Mr. Burke should have shown no desire to confine himself to Roman Catholic authorities; indeed we notice with surprise the absence of any reference to that storehouse of information concerning the Elizabethan persecutions, Mr. Foley's Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus. The gist of Mr. Burke's charges against Foxe will receive the assent of every candid student, even though he may be unable to support them with the aid of "Sir James Mackintosh's 'History of the Reformation'" [sic]. Mr. Burke expresses only a very partial confidence in the allegations of the Roman Catholic historian Sander, but he is, we think, mistaken in holding that Baxter and Neal, who agree in condemning Sander, "carry not the slightest weight with any unprejudiced reader of the present time." It is new to us, by the way, that there should have been a party "called the 'High Church Party'" in the Tudor age. After the probably correct, but in its absolute isolation cheerless, statement that "Dr. Goodwin died in 1638," we bark back again to Nicolas Harpsfield, and then forward again to Holinshed and Stowe. Thomas Heywood, whose little book on Elizabeth's early years seems to have obtained for its prolific author a compliment from Miss Strickland, is rather loftily dismissed as one whose "impartiality will not stand the test of searchful criticism." The brave Jeremy Collier's Ecclesiastical History is generously praised; and there follow, of course without any attempt at order, comments on other historians, old and new. We may disagree with more than one of these comments; nor, in truth, was it to be expected that Mr. Burke should deny himself the pleasure of an onslaught upon Burnet—the best-abused of all historians, or appreciate the "souffle libéral" in Rapin which won for him the good will of MM. Villemain and Dargaud. But the survey, as a whole, unmistakably shows that the author of this book has a real desire for fairness, even if he is not what he declares the excellent Maunder to be, "an equable admirer of heroes." Nor, in truth, are signs of this desire wanting elsewhere in the book. The injustice is recognized of attaching "all the censure of unreasoning oppression to the English Protestant party" in Ireland; "for, long before Protestantism appeared in this realm, the Celtic Catholics were ground down and misgoverned by the English Catholics." Among "the incidents leading to the Spanish Armada" the barbarities inflicted in Spain upon English sailors and travellers are not ignored by the side of the lawless excesses of these sailors themselves. Mr. Burke neither retails, nor apparently believes in, scandal of a certain kind against Queen Elizabeth; and even for Walsingham he finds a word in recognition of his comparatively independent spirit and comparatively clean hands. It is all the more to be regretted that the tone of the book in general should be one of angry invective, as in the case of Elizabeth's ministers, or of passionate partisanship, as in that of Mary Queen of Scots. From the name of the latter Mr. Burke cannot part except in a lyrical gush quoted from Aytoun; and to "the grave foresight" which, for good or ill, made England what it was under Elizabeth, he has no other tribute to pay than this, that "upon the long roll of English Ministers there are to be found none so bad and unprincipled as the advisers of Queen Elizabeth, Burleigh worst of all."

FOLK-MEDICINE.*

THE existence of the Folk-lore Society is more easily justified by the publication of this volume than by many papers belonging to the series of its annual transactions. We have here a systematic attempt to deal with a vast mass of facts and traditions, for which an explanation must be sought somewhere, unless we choose to say that an immense multitude of notions which have exercised no small influence on the history of the human race are altogether inexplicable and unaccountable; and we believe that Mr. Black has analysed and classified these facts with commendable judgment and with better success than many who have dealt with some portions of his subject before him.

We may, however, fairly express our regret that his praiseworthy earnestness in seeking for truth has not made him somewhat more exact in the execution of his task. In the preface some stress is laid on the amount of care expended by himself and his friends in reading and correcting proof-sheets and revises; but unfortunately we have not far to go in order to come across instances in which a moderately careful search would have been rewarded by the removal of some awkward blots and blunders. A few sentences, as they stand in the text, are scarcely intelligible. We are at a loss to know what is meant by the statement that "curses and denunciations are not the only means by which nations of thought have found their magicians work their evil will" (p. 16), or that for primitive man the sight of death "must soon have suggested that the rude weapon of the chase which had missed its aim had some volition of its own" (p. 3). It is but poor praise for a writer if we say that we can just see what is meant by the sentence which tells us that "the person cursed (by wizard or witch) soon hears of the cruel charm; and it is not surprising that, ruminating upon all the forms of disease to which it may be possible that he will be doomed, should readily induce, if not an actual sickness in a healthy man, at least a craving for the removal of the impending curse." Still more puzzling at first sight is the declaration that when the curse is removed, "the thankful spared can go about his work with lightened heart" (p. 31). It is hard to convince ourselves that three men have read the sentence which asks, "To what do we owe the Renaissance of Italy and Southern Europe; to what in our own day do we owe the Gothic revival; to what do we owe the hundred arts which make our life of to-day more beautiful to those who have leisure and wealth, and more varied—if not more happy—to the unfortunate poor, than has been any previous age in the world's history?" (p. 218).

Mistakes or blunders in writing or printing are not so rare as they should be. The notions of burglars about amulets are said to be "a curious physchological study" (p. 219). There would seem to be but little excuse for printing "radii visini" (p. 21), or "per cruce tua," where the text cited had undoubtedly the mark of abbreviation (p. 141), or for turning Pausanias into Pausonius (p. 150), or the German schaut and geschaut into schant and geschant (p. 151), the Latin solvitur into salvitur (p. 169), or the French "dialecticien" into "dialectricien" (p. 4). Nor can we say that the references are always so given as to inspire us with implicit confidence in the accuracy of some which we have not verified. For the statement (p. 74) that Xenocrates, according to Galen, said good things of cannibalism, we are referred to Grimm's Deutsche Mythologie, i. 37, and to the same work, in vol. i. p. 46 of the English translation by Mr. Stallybrass. But neither in the one nor in the other is there any mention of either Galen or Xenocrates.

The subject with which Mr. Black has undertaken to deal is not altogether an inviting one. Unhappily this remark applies to a good many regions in the wide domain of folk-lore; and only when we begin to group large clusters of traditions can we trace the links which connect them, and see that all are evidence of some rude effort to arrive at a coherent philosophy. The most important point beyond all question is the ascertainment of primitive feeling as to phenomena with which we are so familiar that we often bestow on them no thought at all; and here Mr. Black has done good service by steadily refusing to be led astray by the speculations of some modern thinkers whose dogmatic utterances are certainly not wanting in assurance. Mr. Black cannot bring himself to believe that the coming on of darkness after sundown was viewed by the first generations of mankind with the equanimity with which it is now regarded by children in a modern nursery. He insists that the indifference of the latter is the result of security and comfort, and that the mind cannot work in its natural way in regard to phenomena of the outward world which are seldom seen. Children nowadays rarely watch a sunset; they hardly ever see a sunrise. They are scarcely more familiar with the sight of death, although their notions about it are moulded and stereotyped by what they hear or read. For primitive men there was neither hearing nor reading about facts which were undiscerned in the infancy of the world. What we have to determine for ourselves is the direction in which we must seek for the evidence most likely to throw light on the earliest stages of human thought. If we say that our safest course is to start from the conditions of savage life at the present day, we start with an assumption quite as large as any that can be made by those who would rather trust to the records or indications of a literature handed down orally through generations wholly ignorant of writing in any shape. The pictures here given have at the least come down to us unchanged; but it would be no easy task to find savages in our day who have not been exposed to a multitude of influences unknown to the earlier ages of the world; nor is it possible to measure in each case the degree of degeneration which may have brought them to their present state, any more than it is possible to deny the fact that degeneration is a most important element in the condition of tribes which are thought to have retained their primitive simplicity.

But whatever may have been the thoughts first awakened in the minds of men by the sight of death, it is clear on all sides that one of the first notions formed on the subject was that of a relation between the living and the dead. Whether this relation was one of love or of fear is a question perhaps less easily answered. To Mr. Black it seems "more natural to regard dead ancestors as beneficent minor deities than as devils, . . . and to look for prosperity and help from those who are now beyond the troubles of earth." Assuredly it is this feeling which finds an emphatic expression in many hymns of the Rig Veda; and there seems to be but slender excuse for treating this higher and more cheering thought as of later growth than the theory which leads the Chinese to withhold help from a drowning man. This theory is "that the spirits of persons who have died a violent death may return to earth if they can find a substitute. Thus, if A has just lost his son B, and is mourning his loss, should he see C struggling in the water, he naturally will not help him; he would rather see him quickly drowned, for so B will return to life all the sooner. As for C, it is his fate, and he has only to wait until another person, D, E, or F, comes to the same end." The idea which lies at the root of this notion is that of the possibility of altering the state or condition of one man by changing that of another. The change may work in either direction. It may issue in great benefit to the living or in great calamity; and the notion will assume a more systematic form when the inference is drawn that the principle is not limited to the relation of man with man. If life may be recovered at the cost of another, so may health, or wealth, or any other thing. If a man may be freed of his sickness by passing it on to another man, why should man be the only living being to whom it may be thus passed on? Why should not this principle be a law pervading the whole universe? Why should not the malady be got rid of by laying it on vegetable, or even on inanimate, substances?

Without going far into details, we can readily imagine that a vast fabric might spring up, forming itself in a certain sense into a system of folk-medicine—a method of curing which, in spite of its seeming incoherence and absurdity, would rest on a certain philosophical foundation, and seek to account for or to produce phenomena on a hypothesis which at least is worthy of refutation. The system so formed is not inviting either in its general character or in its local features. It has little outward consistency, and the means adopted in two or more places for attaining the same end may be absolutely self-contradictory. What the sufferer is bidden to do in one district may be just what he is told not to do in others; but these absurdities are scarcely greater than those of the earlier Greek astronomers, whom yet we justly regard as not undeserving of respect. We may be tempted to smile at the notion of Xenophanes that the stars were fiery clouds lit at night, like coals, and put out again in the morning; but the notion was an attempt to account for certain phenomena, and, as such, it marked a stage in the growth of the human mind. The difference between the early Greek astronomy and the folk-medicine which is still a living power among Englishmen at the present day lies in the readiness which both physician and patient display to disregard all seeming exceptions or contradictions to their philosophy. The apparent occurrence of what is considered the right sequence is held to prove the theory, in spite of a hundred cases in which the result may point to a contrary conclusion.

If, then, the materials of Mr. Black's chapters are often of an uninviting, or even repulsive, character, this is not his fault. He has had to deal with facts and fancies, from which he may not unnaturally pass with a feeling of relief and satisfaction to the inferences to be drawn from them. His analysis exhibits in full detail the working of a vast system of popular medicine resting on ideas of transference, and traces this idea in transferences supposed to be effected by means of men in the first instance, by beasts in the next, and then by fruits, flowers, roots, trees, and sawn timber. This task leaves him unable to admit Mr. Herbert Spencer's theory, that for primitive men "the first explanation of disease, of death, and the suggestion of higher powers and religion, are due to dreams and epileptic fits." His definite conclusion is that "the mythologist, to use Mr. Spencer's term, far more accurately grasps the ideas and feelings of the semi-civilized than does the Spencerean thinker." His opposition to Mr. Spencer is based chiefly on the ground that "Mr. Spencer assumes that we can judge of the past by the present in the very particulars which others might think the most liable to alteration." It is something to know that Mr. Spencer himself is not without misgivings as to the complete trustworthiness of his method, and that he believes not only in the possibility, but even in the high probability, "that retrogression has been as frequent as progression."

THREE NOVELS.*

SWEET MACE is a story the scene of which is laid in Sussex, and the date of which is placed in the reign of James I. It opens with a description of Sussex scenery and of Gil Carr, the hero of the story. We read on the second page that he "revelled, as young men of eight-and-twenty can who love to place one object in the chiefest spot of all they see." We imagine this to mean that he took delight in the beauties of nature; for he is throughout the story represented to be of sober and temperate habits. On the next page we are told that green is "Nature's own colour," but why it should be so more than any other colour we are not informed: nevertheless, a few lines further on we read that "lest there should be too much green, Nature has been lavish with other colours." And the writer proceeds to give them us now without mercy. "Golden tassels," "burnished bullion yellow," "creamy grey," "delicate violet mauve," "silvery arrows," "silver stars"; and among all these colours "the most æsthetic critic could not find one that offends." Amid this scene of beauty "on one particular undated morning in spring . . . all birddom (sic) breaks forth into song." The song is then described metaphorically as an oratorio. "There are no programmes," and "as to tickets they are minus too." Nature is the "conductress," and "in a few moments will raise her bâton." The concert is now about to begin; "there is the deep low humming buzz and murmur as of thousands speaking in a vasty hall." "Tell me it is the bees," exclaims the writer; on which we may remark for our own part that no reasonable number of even the largest humble-bees could produce the effect of thousands of persons speaking at the same time in—say, for instance, the Agricultural Hall at Islington. The bees being discarded, the birds are now brought in one after the other. But as they have nothing to do with the story, we may pass on. Gil Carr is a sort of mixture of trader, smuggler and freebooter, whom love and business combine to bring from time to time to the coast of Sussex. Sweet Mace, with whom he is in love, is the daughter of a gun-founder who lives on the same coast, and whom he supplies with sulphur and saltpetre for the manufacture of gunpowder. She has another admirer in the person of Sir Mark Leslie, a young courtier from London, who has a commission from the King to watch what is going on in Sussex and see if any disloyal practices are being carried on under the guise of legitimate trade. He is a volatile young man, in love with Mace at one time, and at another with a certain Mistress Anne, daughter of a newly-made baronet in the same district. Mace is in love with Gil Carr, but her father will not hear of the match, and Sir Mark, by working on the vanity and interest of the founder, gains his consent that he should himself marry the girl. To this Gil Carr naturally objects; and on the eve of the marriage he, together with the crew of his ship, come to the founder's house to carry her off. Sir Mark, however, is there too with a band of followers from London, and a desperate fight ensues, in the middle of which an old woman, considered to be a witch, blows up all the powder in the founder's cellars. Mace, it is supposed, has perished in the conflagration. The founder goes mad on the spot, but recovers his reason after a time. Mace's maid, who is really the one who has been killed, is mistaken for Mace herself, and buried with due honours. Mace herself is saved by the old woman and hidden away; but she too has gone mad. The old woman is condemned to be burnt at the stake as a witch, and the flames are already lighted when she is rescued by a party of Gil Carr's men just returned from a long voyage. Most of the characters in the book come to their senses in due time, and as many of them as are marriageable marry. Among these are Gil Carr and Sweet Mace. We are sorry that we cannot recommend the book to our readers. It is very unprofitable.

The Jewel in the Lotos is the third novel by Miss Tincker which has been noticed in these columns. The first, Signor Monaldini's Niece, gave evidence of a good deal of ability, and, in spite of its absurd ending, compared favourably with most recent tales which have taken Italian life as their subject. The next, On the Tiber, was by no means so successful; and the falling off was apparently due to the fact that it was, as far as could be judged, not so much a story as a recital of the writer's real or fancied grievances. In the present novel the scene, too, is laid in Italy, but in the country, instead of in Rome. The chief interest of this book consists in the experience of the two girls, one Italian and the other English, who pass their villeggiatura in an old country house a few miles from Rome. The one, Aurora, is the beautiful daughter of a poetess and improvisatrice, who has once been famous, but who is compelled by reduced circumstances to be dependent on the noble family of the Cagliostri, Dukes of Sassovivo, who are lords of the domain on which the country-house stands, and whose own castle lies close by. The other girl, Aurelia, has come with her guardian, an old man named Glenlyon, to spend some months in Italy; and, as she is in want of a companion of her own age and a teacher of Italian, it is settled that Aurora shall form part of the household. The three are accordingly installed in the country house, between which and the neighbouring castle the interest of the story alternates. In the castle, besides the old Duke and his wife, lives their son, Don Leopoldo, a very dissolute youth, who has succeeded in persuading a beautiful American heiress to take a title in exchange for her dollars. The marriage is soon to come off; and Miss Melville, the young lady in question, is staying with the family. Don Leopoldo, being what a good number of young Italians are, is not, consequently, so content with his conquest as not to seek for others as well; and speedily, to the disgust both of his mother and of his fiancée, lets his liking for Aurelia become evident. He even succeeds in persuading himself for a moment that he is in love with her. She, for her part, deludes herself in the same way; and both allow themselves to go so far as to give Miss Melville reasonable ground for breaking off the engagement. The opportune arrival from England of a former lover of Aurelia's, to whom she was half engaged already, puts a stop to the flirtation with the young Italian, and she ends by marrying her own countryman. Aurora becomes as famous a poetess as her mother was before her, and, eschewing matrimony, lives an ideal life of her own. Glenlyon dies; the ducal family becomes extinct, and its property passes into the hands of distant heirs.

There is almost no plot, properly speaking, to the tale, and the characters, for the most part, are vaguely drawn. The book reads like a string of sketches. The air of Italian life is given not unsuccessfully; and here and there throughout the tale there are scenes and descriptions above the general level of mediocrity which characterizes it. Perhaps the most interesting figure in the book, though but little is seen of him, is that of Father Segneri, a learned and devout priest, suspected of Liberal tendencies, and as a consequence exposed to intrigues, which finally cause him to be silenced and left alone and friendless. It is but a sample of what others must have undergone who have been too zealous or not prudent enough to conceal their Liberal sentiments and not influential enough to maintain their position notwithstanding them. The domestic life of the poorer Italians is also well given. But the connexion between the title and the subject of the book is a riddle which we give up.

Bride Picotée, the smallest of these three tales, is in many respects the best. It is fresh and wholesome. The scene is laid at Louville, in Burgundy, and the events of the story have to do with the quiet domestic life of several households in or near the little town. The most prominent figure in the story is an old woman, "La Brisarde," who is the sole survivor of a family which has possessed the secret of making the lace which gives the title to the story. Adjoining her room on the upper floor of the tenement in which she lives dwell two sisters, the one Françoise, who works as a milliner and dressmaker, and the other Lise, a lame child of fourteen, who is dependent on the elder, but has the talent and ambition to make herself a help instead of a burden to others. Françoise has an offer of marriage, which might have been approved of by the parents of her lover were it not for the fact, not only that Françoise herself has no dowry, but that the expense of supporting the younger sister is an incumbrance which an intending bridegroom and his family must take into account. The morose old lace-maker and lace-mender has the strongest dislike to all outsiders, and especially, like all recluses, to those who live nearest to her and presumably give most grounds for suspicion. But the little crippled girl gradually worms her way into the old woman's heart, particularly after she has been suspected and cleared of a charge of theft. The child, in working with the old woman, has been intelligent enough to find out the secret of the lace-stitch, the possession of which is so valuable; and, after being further instructed in the art, is able to produce a piece of lace which wins the prize at a provincial exhibition at Dijon, and secures for her something more than a competence. She is no longer regarded as a burden on any one anxious to marry her elder sister, and the objections to the match made by the relatives of Françoise's lover are greatly lessened by the younger girl's success. The story, as it is said, "ends happily." Everybody gets what he or she wants. Even the old woman, who has been long separated from her son, and has lived a life of seclusion, finds him at last, and goes away to live with him in comparative wealth. The tale reads as if the writer were familiar with the better side of French provincial life, and had taken as a guide some of the wholesomer kind of French novels. There seem to be echoes of La petite Fadette and other such stories in it.

In the first two stories which we have noticed there is among others the common fault that there is really no plan to them. There is no reason why either should not end at almost any point after the first half of the tale has been reached. The third story, which is hardly ambitious enough to have a plot at all, and confines itself to simple sketches of home life, can be read all through with pleasure and interest.

LIFE OF SIR WILLIAM LOGAN.*

SIR WILLIAM LOGAN well deserved a biography; nine in ten of those whose friends think it necessary to give to the world a record of their lives have rendered far less service, have attained far less eminence in their several vocations. We can nevertheless believe that the biographer has had no easy task when we find how little the critic has to say of one whose career was remarkable alike for public utility and private virtue. Few lives are more useful, few deaths make so sensible a vacancy, as those of eminent permanent public servants; and yet the lives of such men are rarely written, and would rarely prove readable. Their work, valuable as it is, is interesting only to themselves and their colleagues, or to those whom it immediately affects; their services have been recognized, their loss is often heavily felt by their chiefs, to whom they are commonly subordinate only by chance—the chance of birth, fortune, or circumstances. But, even if those chiefs cared to recall the assistance they have received, the work that has been done for them, and even if the etiquette of the service would permit the story of such men to be fully and truly told, it would be eminently uninteresting to the general public. The same is very commonly the case with another class of lives almost equally useful and equally full of immediate and active interest—the lives of men of science whose work has been of a routine character, especially if they have not reached the highest rank of their profession, have achieved no very great discoveries, engaged in no professional controversies of permanent or general import. Sir William Logan was at once an invaluable public servant and a laborious and successful man of science. The earlier years of his manhood were passed as a man of business in London, and later as the conductor of a Company's copper works in Wales. But, born in Canada, of a well-to-do Canadian family, possessed of valuable property in the Colonies and of a considerable business in England, he was able at a comparatively early age to leave his business and take charge of the Geological Survey of the Provinces, then known as Upper and Lower Canada, now as Quebec and Ontario, forming part of the Dominion. His business vocations impelled his first steps in scientific study, determined the direction of his first inquiries, perhaps caused him to become a geologist. They contributed in no small degree to give to his first geological investigations that practical aspect which rendered them more acceptable, if not more useful, to the practical and somewhat Philistine aims of colonial politicians. He had learned before he quitted business more than scientific geologists commonly care to learn of the signs indicating the presence or absence of metalliferous veins—perhaps the one use of geology which the majority of Canadians appreciated, the one result they expected from the Survey.

Born at Montreal in 1798, William Logan was educated first at a local school, and afterwards at Edinburgh. Up to 1838 he was practically engaged, as we have said, in business, but had leisure for the scientific observations which determined his after career. His reputation as a geologist was made by his investigation of the underlying clays of the great coal seams, and by a geological map of the part of Wales in which he resided, so excellent, so unsurpassable in thoroughness, accuracy, and practical utility that it was actually adopted by the Ordnance Survey. He observed that underlying every coal seam within his reach was a bed of clay always filled with the fossil plants called stigmaria, afterwards proved to be the roots of those sigillaria and other large, but lowly organized, trees of which the coal consists. At that time —1830-40—it was commonly supposed by geologists that the coal-beds had often, if not universally, been formed by the fossilization of vast masses of driftwood collected in the estuaries of ancient rivers. Had this been the case, however, the underlying strata would have been different in different places, and few or no traces of the timber which formed the coal seam itself would have been found in the beds below. Logan's discovery that a certain kind of clay, as he affirmed, always occurred immediately beneath the coal seam, and that this was filled with fossil wood of an invariable character, would of itself have served to indicate that the coal had been formed by the fossilization of forests in situ. When the stigmaria of the clays were identified as the roots of the sigillaria forming the coal, the proof was complete. A visit to Canada and the United States confirmed Mr. Logan's view. Wherever he found a coal seam he found also the same underlying clay with the same fossil stigmaria. The acquaintances made in the course of this tour, together with his reputation at home and his birth in the colony, marked him out for the direction of the Geological Survey which somewhat hesitatingly the Parliament of Canada at last undertook, and for which it voted a miserably inadequate sum for five years. Of the importance and difficulty of the work the politicians who ordered it seem to have been utterly unaware. They grudged Mr. Logan the necessary assistance, overlooked the enormous difficulty which the absence of any trustworthy or complete geographical map of the surface imposed —a difficulty aggravated by the extremely defective character of the surveys which had sufficed for such practical purposes as the settlement of townships and the definition of boundaries. And had not the director been a man of private means and of unlimited devotion to his work, the Survey must have broken down at the outset.

Undismayed by the labours, and in no way disheartened by the want of proper support, the probabilities of desertion, and the imperfect appreciation which he clearly foresaw, Mr. Logan undertook the task with a zeal which overcame all obstacles, with a tact and discretion which prevailed at last over the ignorance and parsimony of his employers. His troubles were greatly aggravated, his success often delayed, by the conduct even of those Ministers who had originally been persuaded to incur the trifling expense which alone the Colonial Legislature would vouchsafe for so vast an undertaking, and by political changes which transferred power to men still more ignorant and indifferent. Such aid as was absolutely indispensable he contrived to secure, no matter at what pecuniary sacrifice; work that ought by rights to have devolved upon subordinates he undertook himself, and performed until his health broke down at last under an accumulation of duties and hardships which only the strongest physical vigour, the most strenuous and enthusiastic spirit, would have endured so long. The country he had to survey was always wild, often uninhabited, and almost impassable. He had to survey not merely the strata, but the surface, to determine for himself the distances, the levels, the directions which for other geological surveys had been already ascertained; he made his way in canoes along the shores where the strata might be seen one after another upon the face of gigantic overhanging cliffs, and explored rivers whose banks here and there gave similar indications of the general geological character of the country. His labours on the Survey were interrupted several times by other duties, as when he was sent as a member of the Canadian Commission to the Exhibitions of 1851 and 1862, and to the great Parisian Exhibition which intervened. Both at home and in France he was duly honoured, receiving from the Emperor the Cross of an Officer of the Legion of Honour, from the Queen the compliment of knighthood, and from the Royal Society the highest distinctions reserved for his particular branch of scientific investigation. The recognition of his services in Europe seems to have rendered his colonial fellow-countrymen more sensible of their true value; and during the later years of his life the importance of his work, his own personal and professional merits, seem to have met with due acknowledgment. But from first to last he laboured, almost gratuitously, as few men would care to labour for the highest remuneration; toiled in the comparatively uninteresting routine of his duties not less enthusiastically than other men of science have toiled in the pursuit of discoveries profoundly interesting in themselves and sure to reward them with world-wide and lasting fame. To such geologists as Lyell and Owen, Logan was what the Astronomer-Royal and his assistants are to the great pioneers of astronomical research. It was only incidentally, in the course of duties which had nearly all the tedium, and none of the ease, of routine, that he could accomplish anything of wider and more general interest; and after his acceptance of his Canadian charge the only important scientific incident with which his name is connected is the discovery of the Eozoon—a discovery which threw back by an incalculable period the supposed date of the earliest appearance of life upon the earth.

His letters and journals contain here and there passages of graphic description and lively narrative, or of scientific interest, which render the volume, on the whole, readable enough. His account, for example, of the packing of the ice on the St. Lawrence, the manner in which the narrow bed and rapid course of the stream at particular points create those vast accumulations of ice which often appear to form a gigantic dam, and raise greatly the height of the stream behind; the manner in which the water finally finds its way through or underneath; the signs which indicate the point at which the accumulation has ceased—a matter of no little importance to all inhabitants of the lands bordering the great river—is singularly clear and striking. His account of an important landslip is equally graphic and lucid, and his sketches of life and travel by land and water in the trackless forests he traversed on duty are spirited and amusing. The biographer has done his work well, has made the most of his materials, and has, on the whole, been careful not to make too much of them. The memoir is therefore perhaps as good a monument to the reputation of a valuable public servant, an enthusiastic votary of science, as circumstances permitted. It leaves upon the reader's mind a high impression of Sir William Logan's character, personal and professional, and in so far may be considered successful. But the conditions of the task hardly allowed the production of a book which, in these days of literary abundance and scanty leisure, can attain an extensive circulation.

STUDIES IN GERMAN LITERATURE.*

As the title of this book is vague, and would justify an expectation of great things, we will at once state that this volume of "Studies" is a collection of nine magazine articles on subjects which, though various, may fairly be described by the wide term literary, though one or two scarcely belong to either High or Low German literature. Three of these articles appeared, we are told, in the Cornhill Magazine. No notice is given of any former appearance of the other six, and we are therefore led to suppose that they have not been printed before. Not the less, however, are they magazine articles of the ordinary type, dealing with some interesting subjects pleasantly enough, but at the same time in a superficial and careless fashion. The book opens with an account of the life and writings of Fritz Reuter, the Platt Deutsch poet, and tells the tale of the long imprisonment he suffered as the penalty of his connexion with the visionary revolutionists of 1833. Infamous and cruel as the vengeance of the Bund was, Mr. MacCallum makes a ludicrous overstatement in declaring that "the proceedings were almost more infamous and scarcely less cruel than those of our own Bloody Assize." He must either have never read or greatly forgotten his Macaulay. When Reuter's imprisonment began, he was about twenty-three years old and full of life and spirits. He came out of prison at thirty, broken in heart and constitution. After sundry vain attempts to make up for the waste of his youth, he at last found out where his strength lay, and beginning with his Läuschen, or Gossipings, wrote in rhyme of the lives, the sufferings, and the simple thoughts of the people round him, using his native language, a dialect of the speech common alike to England, Holland, Belgium, and northern Germany. The dialect of Reuter naturally leads Mr. MacCallum to compare him with Burns, "the first in merit among dialectical poets"; but what he means by saying that Burns was also the "first in order of time" we cannot conceive. To speak only of Scotch poets who wrote in their own dialect after the Union, it is odd that Mr. MacCallum, whom we take to be a Scotchman, should know nothing of Allan Ramsay, and indeed that any one should profess an acquaintance with Burns, and know nothing of Robert Fergusson. Another paper is devoted to Klopstock, a far less interesting person than Reuter. A narrow-minded pietist, egotistical and positive, the founder and president of a Ladies' Poetical Club, Klopstock, in all respects save one, was a type of the sentimental middle-class German of his age. But, though the patience of his readers came to an end long before the tears and dialogues of the personages, human and divine, of Klopstock's interminable epic, his poem marks the beginning of the restoration of German literature. Mr. MacCallum gives a good account both of the man and of his work; but he has borrowed so largely from Gervinus—a loan which he honestly acknowledges—that all who can read German had better get their information at first hand from the Deutsche Dichtung of that author.

Mr. MacCallum's superficial way of treating his subjects is more apparent in those papers which deal with distinctly literary topics than in his biographical notices. He seems to have approached his subjects without any general information, and to have worked at each by itself without noting its relationship to kindred matters. Consequently he is in a chronic state of astonishment at lighting on things which he ought to have expected to find. He is surprised, for example, to find that our forefathers were given to riddles, and that such men as Aldhelm, "Bishop of Sherbourne and Abbot of Malmsbury"—for so he spells these names—learnt and practised the art of riddle-making. Such surprise is perhaps natural enough in any one who is wholly unacquainted with the early culture of all peoples, of our own race and of those akin to us, as well as of Zulus and Basutos. So, too, his surprise that a strict Lutheran like Hans Sachs should tell a story of how the devil was outwitted shows an equal ignorance of the spirit of the early part of the sixteenth century about which he is writing. In a long and rather dull paper on the stories which different European nations have attached to the name of Solomon, he makes no mention of the novel of Boccaccio, where the wise king advises a perplexed husband to administer marital discipline in a fashion which, however consonant with Italian manners in the fourteenth century, is not such as one would have thought would have been recommended by the legendary Solomon, who is generally represented as under petticoat government. More serious omissions are made in the account of the development of the Charlemagne myth, where no reference is made to the stories of the monk of St. Gall, who wrote shortly after the Emperor's death, or to the embodiment of the History of the pseudo-Turpin in the great Chroniques de S. Denis. Mr. MacCallum, indeed, makes no attempt to follow out this interesting subject, save so far as it is illustrated by the legends concerned with the single incident of the death of Roland. He deals in much the same way with the Arthurian romances, for he simplifies his work by pronouncing the oddly expressed opinion that, "Whatever their remote origin may have been, it" (the variety of their characteristics) "justifies us in treating them as the inventions of chivalrous writers, and in neglecting the north-west passage of Welsh antiquities for the safer overland route of Latin and French authorities" (p. 156). That is, to speak without a parable, that because the earliest forms of these legends seem to belong to a period far older than that of the French romance-writers, we are therefore justified in believing that they invented them, and that because their origin belongs to a civilization of which Mr. MacCallum knows nothing, he is justified in saying that its investigation had better be neglected. On the other hand the two articles on the Minnesong and on Hans Sachs, cobbler and master-singer, are written with greater care, and are certainly the most interesting parts of the volume. Mr. MacCallum constantly falls into a very slovenly style of writing, and he would do well to note, among other matters, that "making considerable loans" does not mean borrowing largely; that "to take a telling" is an expression to be avoided, and, above all, that the constant use of "the former" and "the latter" is ugly and confusing.

* Studies in Low German and High German Literature. By M. W. MacCallum. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1884.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. STEENACKERS, whose very interesting account of the part played by the Post Office in the war of 1870 we noticed last year, has brought out, in conjunction with his former secretary in that department, the first volume of a history of the irregular Government in the provinces from September to February (1). It is likely to be useful, but at this stage we do not propose to criticize it at length. The author has adopted the unambitious and somewhat inartistic plan of embodying in his narrative as many speeches, letters, newspaper articles, proclamations, and so forth as possible. The result is not strictly literary, but is perhaps better in substance than in form.

Enjoyment of M. Bardoux's book on Mme. de Beaumont (2) will probably depend on the reader's liking or dislike for the peculiar French society of the interval between the Revolution and the Restoration. Of this and of the special Chateaubriand clique in it Mme. de Beaumont was a distinguished member, and she also holds a certain place in literature as one of the "Muses" of Joubert. Furthermore, she was one of the most sorely-tried victims of the Terror who themselves escaped, for almost her whole family perished on the scaffold or at the hands of the Septembriseurs. M. Bardoux, however, has not the delicate tact with which in different ways Sainte-Beuve and Cousin knew how to make readers of the present fall in love with ladies of the past, even if (like Mme. de Beaumont) they had little beauty, and (like her) a somewhat unnecessary dose of sentimentality. His work is meritorious, but it is not exactly interesting, and in such a case a book is almost bound to be interesting to prove its right to exist.

We note only (for the present) the appearance of the sixth and last volume of M. Perrens's elaborate History of Florence (3) in pre-Medicean times.

In undertaking a general history of the emigration (4) M. Forneron has undertaken a task more difficult than it seems. He comments in his introduction with justice on the extreme rarity of authentic memoirs suitable for his purpose; though, by the way, not a few have recently appeared or are now appearing. He also remarks on the extreme difficulty of treating such a subject without irritating the partisan feelings which are nowhere stronger than in France. And he might perhaps have added that there is another difficulty in the subject, unless it is treated as one of mere curiosity. No reasonable person doubts that the emigration ruined the cause of social order and regularly graded government in France; few can help contrasting the conduct of the émigrés with that of the English royalists in 1643 and the Scotch Jacobites in 1745, it must task the most ingenious advocate to assign respectable causes, first, for the inability of so vast, wealthy, and powerful a body as the French noblesse to form some kind of organization in their own defence; secondly, for the almost simultaneous sauve-qui-peut which took the place of all attempt even at such an organization. Then, too, the actual conduct of the émigrés when they had emigrated is not an inspiriting theme. Of want of individual bravery no one accuses them, with rare exceptions; but their frivolity, their endless and hopeless dissensions, their petty jealousies, and their other faults were as unheroic as they were fatal. M. Forneron tells the whole dreary tale with great impartiality (indeed he very seldom commits himself to a definite expression of personal opinion at all, except in such clear cases as the atrocious bad faith of the Republicans at Quiberon), with immense patience and erudition, and with not a little piquancy in detail. He has, however (as he has also in former books), borrowed rather too freely the effective but dangerous method of Macaulay,—the method of weaving a large number of separate facts (chapter and verse being duly and scrupulously given in footnotes) into a general narrative. How likely this method is to mislead readers, the wrong constructions which have been put, to name no others, on Macaulay's famous chapter on the state of England at Charles II.'s death sufficiently show.

Many are the woes which wait on the hasty reviewer, and to do him justice he seems to take them very placidly. Not long ago we saw it calmly stated that the subject of the late Mr. Green's Conquest of England was "the same as that of Thierry and Mr. Freeman," and more recently we have seen M. Masson's discovery spoken of as "the journal of the great Colbert" (5). "Alas, how easily things [and men] go wrong!" If the hasty person who said this had but looked at the cover of the book, where the dates 1709-1711 are given in good round type, he could hardly have made his blunder unless he was a very ignorant person indeed. For "the great Colbert" certainly was not alive then. M. Masson's man is, of course, Colbert's nephew Torcy, the most prominent negotiator on the French side in the proceedings which at last succeeded in putting an end to the War of the Spanish Succession. The diary here given is very minute, and, as it has more to do with diplomacy than with active proceedings or miscellaneous details, it cannot honestly be recommended as very amusing to the general reader. But its importance to the historian is considerable.

M. Jules Nollée, who seems to be a Belgian diplomatist, has prefixed to his book (6) a preface in which he seems to take himself a little, a very little, too seriously. But that is a venial fault in poets. His book, which is a mixture of prose and verse, exhibits excellent sentiments and a praiseworthy devotion to literature.

A new and revised edition of the well-known French Dictionary of Spiers (7), revised and completed on the late author's plan by Mr. H. Witcomb, may be recommended. The book is a well-known one, and in its present state it seems to be considerably improved.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MR. NEMIROVITCH DANTCHENKO'S book on Skobeleff (1) has all the value of the evidence of a witness who writes of what he has seen, and tells the truth as it appeared to his eyes. He does not profess to write a biography, but simply to give his personal reminiscences of the General. For whatever did not fall under his own observation, the author refers his reader to other authorities. His field is, however, sufficiently wide. He was attached to Skobeleff's staff as a newspaper Correspondent throughout the war with Turkey, and saw him frequently during the last period of his life. Mr. Nemirovitch Dantchenko's method of writing cannot be commended without reserve. There is a good deal of gush in his book, and an almost insufferable amount of repetition. The scene in the hotel where Skobeleff's body lay before burial is described over and over again. At every successive fight—and the number of them is naturally great—we get exactly the same picture of the General in almost the same words. It is a worse feature of Mr. Nemirovitch Dantchenko's style that he cannot praise his hero without pointing the eulogy by sneers at somebody. If we are to take his word for it, the Russian army must be afflicted with the presence of an immense number of cowardly officers, and envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness must be terribly rampant in Russia. With all its faults of arrangement and taste, however, the book does give a picture of Skobeleff which agrees well enough with what was already known of him. It contains a hundred stories which show the fiery quality of his valour, his ready sympathy with his men, his ardent patriotism, and his passionate love of enterprise. Skobeleff was obviously the ideal of a popular hero—handsome, daring, and prodigal of money. It mattered little to his popularity that he was generous at the expense of others, with his father's money, or with sums which he borrowed from friends and never repaid. The soldiers, whom he fed and lived among like a friend, forgave him for his recklessness in wasting their lives. Skobeleff obviously belonged to a class of officer with whom we are not likely to become familiar—the General at ten thousand men a week. Mr. Nemirovitch Dantchenko tells how at Plevna he ordered a redoubt to be stormed at a terrible loss of life, and left a garrison in it to certain destruction, although he well knew that he would not be supported and that nothing was to be gained by the sacrifice. With all that Skobeleff was no mere beau sabreur. He had studied war as an art, and could be a strategist on occasion. The author passes lightly over the last years of his life, but he says enough to show that Western Europe was right in thinking that Skobeleff would have proved a dangerous firebrand.

Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life (2) is the not inappropriate name of a very readable biography of General Colin Mackenzie. The General was known as one of the bravest and ablest officers of the East India Company's army. He was the younger son of a branch of the ancient house of Mackenzie of Redcastle, and a descendant through women both of Robert the Bruce and of the Cochranes of Dundonald. With such a pedigree a young Scotchman naturally took to the honourable profession of arms, and it was quite in the ordinary course that he should enter the East India Company's service. Here he went through plenty of fighting, from the Coorg campaign down to the Mutiny. By far the most interesting portion of these two volumes is that which tells the story of Colin Mackenzie's adventures in the first Afghan War. He was at Kabul when Burnes and Macnaghten were murdered, and was one of the two Englishmen taken alive when the unlucky envoy was treacherously slain by Akbar Khan. His own account of the scene is given. His imprisonment on this occasion was short, for Akbar Khan allowed him to return to the cantonments. After this first escape he went through the horrors of the retreat in the Kabul Pass, and was again taken prisoner. At a later period he was allowed to come down to Jellalabad, but returned to captivity as he had promised, and remained with Akbar's other prisoners till they were all set free by the army of General Pollock. The story is, to a large extent, told in his own words, and it more than confirms all that had ever been said of the feeble bungling and miserable squabbles which brought the Kabul disaster upon us. The remaining part of the book is not of equal interest, and is rather overlaid with trivial detail, but it is, on the whole, a worthy biography of a high-minded soldier.

It is only fair to allow Mr. Merz to state the aims of his book on Leibniz (3), written for Blackwood's Classical Series, in his own words:—"In the following discussion of the character of Leibniz and the spirit of his philosophy," he says in his preface, "I have endeavoured to confine myself as much as possible to those points in the life and the doctrine which cannot be easily gathered by a perusal of Guhrauer's biography (Berlin, 1846), of the principal works of the philosopher himself, or of the well-known historical treatises of Ueberweg, Kuno Fischer, Erdmann, and Zeller." It is, therefore, to the less known part of Leibniz's work that he devotes himself mainly, but he also intends his monograph to serve as an introduction to the study of the philosopher.

The Memorials of John Flint South (4), published by the Rev. C. L. Feltoe, consist for the most part of the surgeon's autobiography. It is written in a rather dry style, but contains some interesting sketches of the leading medical men of the beginning of the century, including Astley Cooper and Abernethy. One chapter is devoted to "the resurrection man," vulgarly called the body-snatcher, and gives a very repulsive picture of the doings of four ruffians who supplied St. Thomas's Hospital with subjects about 1818. Mr. South tells, in a matter-of-fact way, how these persons got drunk and cheated one another, and how they fought and were insolent to their employers, and of the method of their robberies in cemeteries, and how the surgeons had to get them out of trouble or support their families when they found their way to gaol, as they occasionally did.

Garboard Streyke (5) is the pseudonym of an author who cannot sleep for the laurels of Mr. Clark Russell. He believes, not without good reason, that very little is known of our seafaring population, and has written the papers of which his book is made up to describe such parts of it as have fallen under his own notice. There is a good deal of sentiment and some mere "talky-talky" in his little volume; but the writer has obviously a considerable familiarity with the smacksmen and the crews of the coasting vessels. He tells what he has to say in the form of description or yarn in a tolerable Telegraphese style.

The author of King Capital was not well advised when he collected a variety of his newspaper articles into a volume, and called them "Views from Sea and Land" (6). They are for the most part nothing of the sort, but reviews of books or historical articles suggested by some subject of the day—very good small beer for immediate consumption, but not strong enough brew to keep. Others of the papers are hasty descriptions of foreign towns seen on a tour for perhaps only a few hours. There are a few done in Ireland in the days of the Land League's glory which possess a more permanent interest.

The publication of Mrs. Bray's biography has been followed by the appearance of a new and revised edition of her novels (7). It is nicely printed and of a handy size.

We have also received a copy of the second thousand of Anderson's Fasti Apostolici (8), and of a new edition, revised and illustrated by Mr. Du Maurier, of Mr. Cholmondeley-Pennell's Pegasus Re-saddled (9).

Mr. Robert Farren has executed with considerable success a series of etchings to illustrate the performance of The Birds at Cambridge last autumn (10). They will, no doubt, be welcomed as a memento by all who were fortunate enough to be present, while those who were not may thus get a very tolerable notion of the nature of the performance.

We have received from Messrs. Prang & Co., of Boston, U.S.A., through their London agent, Mr. Ackermann, a parcel of Easter cards of very pretty and in some cases of very sumptuous design. Whether the addition of Easter cards to Christmas cards is a burden or a blessing may be left undecided here. The particular examples have certainly not a little merit. One card, a design on white silk thrown up on grey cardboard and bordered with floss-silk fringe (as are most of these cards), is particularly noteworthy. Of the others a "book-wise" folded card in white and orange with grey fringe, another with a design of birds in front and flowers on the reverse, and a third with pansies on the back and a landscape in crayon fashion on the obverse, deserve special mention. But all of them, if a little useless, are pretty.

Messrs. Marcus Ward, who have long ago won a first place among English publishers of such ware, have also sent us a collection which deserves equal praise in its way.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 Regent Street, London, W.
City Branch—14 Cornhill, E.C. Founded 1806.
REPORT of the DIRECTORS, presented at the 78th ANNUAL MEETING at the Office, on Wednesday, January 30, 1884.

The Directors have to report that the transactions of the Provident Life Office during the year is 3 have been highly satisfactory.

Proposals for new Assurances amounting to £679,980 were received. Policies for £575,529 were issued and taken up, producing new annual Premiums amounting to £19,770, as against £19,211 for the previous year. These Assurances and new annual Premiums respectively represent the actual net amounts. No re-assurances were effected during the year.

The Proposals, declined and not completed, amounted to £103,560.

The Claims for the year were £102,353, being £29,116 more than the corresponding sum for 1882.

The annual Income is now £110,571, being an increase of £9,304.

During the year the sum of £10,023 was paid for the surrender of Policies. The values paid upon Bonus Policies ranged from 33 per cent.—the minimum surrender value—to as much as 161 per cent. of the Premiums received.

The total Funds of the Office on December 31 last were £3,333,244, being an increase of £21,197, a result very satisfactory considering the special extra payments required to be made on account of the recent division of Profits. The average interest realised was £4 5s. 6d. per cent., as against £4 4s. during 1882.

The large measure of public support received by the Provident Life Office—as shown in the still increasing amount of new business—is gratifying evidence that persons desirous of effecting Assurances are wise by alive to the advantages given by an Office which has all the experience to be gained from a successful existence of seventy-eight years, and which is ready to adapt its practice to the requirements of the present day.

2 vols. crown 8vo. with Portraits, 21s.

ALARIC WATTS: a Narrative of his Life.

By his Son, Alaric Alfred Watts.

"A book which puts the reader in good humour both with its hero and its author may, without hesitation, be called a good book, and Mr. Watts's life of his father does this. Alaric Watts was in constant communication with most of the interesting personages of his time in art and letters, and correspondence with them fills up the spaces very pleasantly. Some of the former with Coleridge, Southey, and Wordsworth are full of interest."—Pall Mall Gazette.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 15s.

THE HISTORY of GREECE. From the German of Professor Max Duncker, by S. F. Alleyne. Uniform in size with "The History of Antiquity."

Professor Duncker's "History of Greece" gives an account of Hellas and its civilization from the earliest times down to the overthrow of the Persians at Salamis and Platæa.

Vol. I. THE GREEKS IN THE EARLIEST AGE.
" II. THEIR CONQUESTS AND MIGRATIONS.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION,

AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BARBARA HEATHCOTE'S TRIAL."

NOT LIKE OTHER GIRLS. By Miss R. N. Carey, Author of "Wooed and Married," "Nellie's Memories," &c.

"The story drags nowhere, but reads brightly and pleasantly, and has no discrepancies of any sort."—Whitehall Review.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WESTERN WILDFLOWER."

IN LONDON TOWN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"This is a good, sound, interesting and healthy novel, and one that it is impossible to read without feeling the better for it."—Academy.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE GARDEN OF EDEN."

THE KNAVE of HEARTS. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"To deal successfully with absolutely inconsistent natures is among the novelist's chief triumphs; and in the present case the honour of a triumph has been fairly won. The story of the various Knave of Hearts is thoroughly new, the plot is interesting, and the dissection of a group of singularly complex characters is carried out in a spirit of the strongest sympathy with all that is pure and true."—Graphic.

THIRLBY HALL. By W. E. Norris, Author of "Matrimony," "No New Thing," "Mademoiselle de Mersac," &c.

"There are incidents in the book to keep interest awakened from first to last. Stay-at-home people may condemn Lady Constance Miller as exaggerated sketch. Those who know the world and its ways will remember more than one specimen of this cosmopolitan type of a 'grande dame,' passably eccentric, and dabbling in everything, from the restoration of a dethroned potentate to the conquest of the most insignificant attaché. 'Thirlby Hall' is brilliant, humorous, and pathetic."—Morning Post.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FOUR CROTCHETS TO A BAR."

THE DAILYS of SODDEN FEN. By the Author of "Four Crotchets to a Bar" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

GRANITE CRAGS. By C. F. Gordon Cumming, Author of "Fire Fountains," "A Lady's Cruise in a French Man-of-War," "At Home in Fiji," &c. 8vo. illustrated with 8 Engravings, 16s.

"Miss Cumming possesses a rare facility for investing sketches of travels with interest, and it is enough to say of her latest contribution to descriptive literature that it is worthy of her reputation."—Globe.

"This pleasant book.....We put down the book hoping that this abrupt end may augur the speedy appearance of another volume as amusing and instructive as 'Granite Crags.' The photo-engravings are not the least attractive part of the book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

NORFOLK BROADS and RIVERS; or, the Waterways, Lagoons, and Decoys of East Anglia. By C. Christopher Davies, Author of "The Swan and her Crew." Post 8vo. illustrated with 12 Full-page Plates. 14s.

"His book is full of pleasant reading, even for those to whom nature has denied all love for fishing and amateur yachting..... It will be welcomed everywhere by all who can relish healthy writing upon healthy topics. We recommend it unreservedly, but had almost forgotten to say that it is adorned with twelve admirable illustrations."—Spectator.

"It is doubtless the handsomest as well as the most interesting of all descriptions of the Broads, and will preserve the memory of a paradise for naturalists and sportsmen."
Land and Water.

"He has produced a book which will please all lovers of singular scenery, all boating men, all naturalists, all who look on nature with a poetic eye."—Academy.

PUBLIC LIFE IN ENGLAND.

By PHILIPPE DARYL.

Translated by HENRY FRITH, and Revised by the Author.

"One of the ablest of the books by Frenchmen about England.....Superior in real merit to 'John Bull et son Ile.'"—Athenæum, February 2, 1884.

"This clever book.....M. Philippe Daryl has lived ten years in our country and understands its language perfectly. He has moreover the gift, rare among his countrymen—of seeing men and things amongst us, for the most part, from a correct point of view.....Altogether, this book is well worth reading."—Morning Post, February 7, 1884.

THE FREE-TRADE SPEECHES of the RIGHT HON. CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, M.P. With a Political Memoir. Edited by A MEMBER OF THE COBDEN CLUB.

"They are really models of lucid statement of fact and orderly arrangement of argument."—Saturday Review.

"From Mr. Villiers's speeches alone a vivid picture of those times might be drawn."
Economist.

"We do not know a better storehouse of the purely statistical arguments against Protection than these volumes."—Spectator.

"It is well that the services of Mr. Charles Villiers should be brought home to a generation which has grown up since he first pressed the question of free trade upon a reluctant legislature, and persevered till it became the settled policy of the country.. ....The publication of his speeches will refresh the memories of his countrymen, and furnish them with an opportunity for reiterating their gratitude to him."—Athenæum

"I believe there is nothing like those speeches in the discussion of the question.....If you want an honest statement of facts, if you want an exhibition of principles, if you want to see the arguments by which that great question was defended, if you want to read of noble sentiments and to observe a faultless logic, you may have all that by reading the speeches of the member for Wolverhampton on the great question of free trade."
The Right Hon. JOHN BRIGHT, M.P., at Birmingham.

Large crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

OCCASIONAL PAPERS and ADDRESSES.

By Lord O'HAGAN, K.P.

"It is impossible to read these addresses without discovering that their author is sagacious in his views, and liberal in his sympathies and sentiments. Apart from their intrinsic merits, the papers were worth republishing on higher grounds, for Lord O'Hagan is well entitled to be heard on certain social and economic questions closely affecting the welfare of Ireland."

THE OPPOSITION AND THE FRANCHISE BILL.

THE speeches which have been as yet delivered on the Franchise Bill have not on either side come up to the level of those delivered on former occasions of a similar kind. But this is hardly surprising, the debating power of the present House of Commons being very decidedly inferior to that of the House of Commons of sixteen or seventeen, not to say of fifty, years ago. On the side of the Opposition, however, Lord JOHN MANNERS and Mr. RAIKES were not unequal to the opportunity. On the side of the Government, Lord HARTINGTON accomplished his usual task of posing as a common-sense apologist, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN displayed his also familiar powers of inflammatory suggestion and personal abuse. It was somewhat obliging of the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE to proclaim openly that one object of the enfranchisement of agricultural labourers is connected with the fact that they have been "robbed of their land." No agricultural labourer in this country has been robbed of a rood by legislation; but Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, by openly connecting the Franchise Bill with the not wholly consistent theories of Mr. HYNDMAN and Mr. GEORGE, has done a public service. After this the net may be said to have been spread openly in the sight of the moderate Liberal party, and it is their fault if they walk into it. When Mr. CHAMBERLAIN says that the form of the Opposition amendment is "unreal," it is probably safe to substitute for that adjective "inconvenient"; and the country will appreciate his candid confession that he hopes the Bill will serve as an engine to promote agitation against the House of Lords. His stout declaration of adherence to the Irish proposals, expressed and understood, in the measure contrasts somewhat strikingly with Lord HARTINGTON's attempt to minimize Mr. GLADSTONE's statements as to Irish representation. Unfortunately experience goes to show that when Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Lord HARTINGTON express different opinions, it is not generally Lord HARTINGTON's opinion which finally becomes that of the Cabinet. It is unnecessary to discuss Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's assertion that he has never known a candidate of the party opposed to him unwilling to truckle to the Irish vote. No one can speak to the state of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's knowledge save Mr. CHAMBERLAIN himself. But, in fact, not more than two or three such tracklings, since the question of Home Rule became a burning one, can be charged against Conservatives, although these two or three are no doubt too many. Accuracy of statement is not MR. CHAMBERLAIN's most remarkable characteristic; neither, it may be added, is relevance of argument. The greater part of his speech was solely occupied by polemical utterances of the kind which are familiar on Radical platforms, and which therefore may be supposed to be inspiriting to Radical audiences.

Not the least part of the interest attaching to these speeches, however, centred on the speech of Mr. BRIGHT, the only representative in Mr. GLADSTONE's absence of the prowess in similar conflicts of old days. His entire speech may be divided into two parts, and both are instructive not only as to what is to be said for the Bill, but as to what ought to be said against it. For though nominally the Government has its defence, and bound to show cause for the measure practically, as every one knows, the case is different. The Bill itself is of the nature of an assault on the Constitution, and the lines of its attack, or rather of the attack of its champions, cannot be studied too narrowly for the better resisting of it. Mr. BRIGHT's force, then, was marshalled in two columns. He first twitted the Conservatives with having set the example of throwing the franchise open in 1867, and then he tried to dispel the over-representation-of-Ireland argument. The first attack, as Mr. BRIGHT must himself have very well known, carried no weight with it. In the first place, one at least of the two Conservative leaders, and more than one of his principal lieutenants, is absolutely untouched by the sarcasm. In the second, no political party, and the Radical-Liberal party least of all, can afford to set up the principle that politicians are bound by what other politicians of the same general complexion did, or even by what they themselves did seventeen years ago. In the third, narrow as is his range of vision, and contemptuous as he is of all those who see more widely, Mr. BRIGHT knows perfectly well that his own estimate of the beneficial effect of the last Reform Act is not shared by his opponents, and that even those of them who consented to that Act are fully entitled to plead the correction of experience. And indeed, to do Mr. BRIGHT justice, such force as there was in his speech did not lie, and was evidently not meant to lie, in this sarcastic reference to 1867. He knew, as every one knows, that the real fight is not over what is in the Bill, but over what is not in it. And he bent all his energies (as far as he bent them at all) in this direction. That he made a good fight about Ireland, even his own side does not seem to think; but such fight as he did make he made on that subject.

The extreme difficulty which Mr. BRIGHT thus had in replying to Lord JOHN MANNERS's speech, and the tameness which pervaded the utterances of a speaker who is certainly not usually chargeable with that vice or virtue, showed clearly enough that the Opposition have hit the right nail on the head in choosing their amendment. Had they moved, as Mr. BRIGHT wishes that they had moved, the reading of the Bill this day six months, they would have no doubt made a very handsome present of the game to their opponents. The present majority only desires an opportunity of affirming some wide general proposition in conformity with what are called Liberal principles, and the refusal to entertain a Reform Bill simpliciter and qua Reform Bill, would furnish them with an admirable opportunity for doing this and for avoiding difficulties. They would be able to employ the not very lethal weapon of sarcasm about 1867 with more force or with less weakness than at present; they could ring the changes on the great flesh-and-blood argument; they could reiterate the well-worn contrast of the man on this side of the street and the man on the other side of the street; they could, in short, luxuriate in all the commonplace and the cant which parties love because they divide them least. But with Lord JOHN MANNERS's amendment this course is, if not impossible—for almost all things are possible to a member of Parliament—at any rate so glaringly inadequate as to be dangerous of use. The amendment is a practical amendment, a statesmanlike amendment, an amendment exactly corresponding to the reflections which in the ordinary affairs of daily life sensible men make and ponder over before they take steps of momentous import. What are you going to do with these two millions when you have got them? is a question which cannot be honestly declared evasive or shifty except by a controversialist either too hot-headed to be willing to think or too wooden-headed to be able to perform that not too common operation. Mr. BRIGHT does not answer the question at all. He can only say that the inhabitants of the Cave of 1866 were very disreputable people, that the Conservatives of to-day are inconsistent with the Conservatives of 1867, that the member for Cork is not a fool, and that the Act of Union may be altered in one political sense but must not be altered in another. It is no unfairness to say that the question, "What are you "going to do with those two millions?" may be asked after Mr. BRIGHT'S speech with even more pertinence than it could have been asked before it, because there is at least one distinguished politician who clearly cannot answer it. Mr. BRIGHT is not in the Ministry. But the intentions of the Ministry can hardly be said to have been more clearly or satisfactorily stated in Mr. GLADSTONE'S reassertion of the doctrine of Centrifugal Representation and in Lord HARTINGTON'S argument that, if the doctrine of Centrifugal Representation be not admitted, arrangements founded on the doctrine of Centrifugal Representation will doubtless not be maintained. The anxiety of the country is to know whether they will be maintained, and not to hear from Lord HARTINGTON a logical statement of the general connexion between antecedent and consequent. In short, though the sentence may sound and may be called cynical, the effectiveness of an Opposition may be best judged from the extent to which it seems to perplex the Government. It is tolerably evident hitherto that the Government is considerably perplexed, and to that perplexity there can be but two ends. Either some authoritative disclaimer of the intention to maintain the over-representation of Ireland must be given (in which case the effect on the party of the person who, according to Mr. BRIGHT, is not a fool is pretty clear), or both the present arbiters of the measure and those future arbiters who have to be taken into account will have to consider whether the greatest change short of an absolute revolution which has ever been introduced into the political system of any country is to be permitted in face of a positive assurance that that change is to inure to the benefit and preference of bad citizens and of a total absence of assurance how it is to be otherwise arranged and directed.

The Opposition therefore has, beyond all question, chosen a good fighting line, whether for the present purpose of converting, if possible, a great minority into a majority, or for the future one of handing over the question to other champions in such a state that those champions may be able to give a good account of it. It only remains that the battle shall be fought both on the second reading and in Committee, if necessary, with watchfulness and with determination. It has been repeatedly shown that the occasion is one for no niceness of choice about means and for no remissness in using them. With the exception of the Septennial Act, it would be difficult to mention any constitutional measure in English history which was so entirely a party move as this present Bill. It has been called for by no national demand; precluded by none of those exploring measures of proposed legislation, the defeat of which opens the way for future victories; necessitated by no altered circumstances in the life of the people. It is, as it has been called, a Continuance in Office Bill pure and simple. Short as it is, its object might be obtained still more shortly by a Bill of a single clause providing for the continuous filling of the great offices of State and the representation of the constituencies by some such machinery as that of the SIMEON Trustees. Against such a Bill all things are lawful that the law does not forbid, and all things are expedient that the practice of gentlemen does not discourage. Delay, counterworks, outflanking tactics, are all good and all legitimate, and the chief thing necessary is that there should be no want of vigilance and no indulgence in apathy. This last fault is specially fatal, in both senses, to a party which defends the Constitution, as distinguished from one which attacks it. It was by no means creditable to the Conservative party last week that the vindication of the Spiritual Peers from the sectarian malice of Little Bethel and the Hall of Science should have been left to the Government and a contingent of Liberal members. Without these Messrs. WILLIS, WADDY, and Co. would have won a triumph, barren enough, no doubt, but gratifying to their feelings as an insult to the dominant Church. Not dissimilar apathy last year led to the most discreditable division of this not very creditable Parliament, and gave up the population of English garrison towns to the unrestricted ravages of loathsome disease. These things are not as they should be, and however dull a defensive war may be, it need not be, and ought not to be, fought dully.

THE PRESIDENCY OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE great Republic which is, as usual, happy in having no history, has for some time scarcely furnished foreign newspapers with materials for half a dozen paragraphs. The trivial incident of the LASKER Resolution, and of Prince BISMARCK'S refusal to transmit the document to the German Parliament, has attracted more attention in England than the preparations for a contest which was formerly regarded as highly important. Within little more than five months the Presidential electors will be chosen; and possibly the party which has not elected a President for nearly a quarter of a century may at last succeed in returning its candidate. The more important issue between Protection and Free-trade may then, perhaps, attract attention; but it will not be prosecuted with vigour as long as the advocacy of sound doctrines involves the risk of losing the votes of powerful States. English manufacturers and traders have a divided interest in the commercial policy of the Union. In the first instance a reduction of Customs duties would open a new market; but, on the other hand, Free-trade would render American competition far more formidable. English shipowners would especially regret the removal of the restrictions which have alone prevented the American merchant navy from recovering its former prosperity. The Democratic party which now controls the House of Representatives, and which may perhaps succeed in electing a President, is, notwithstanding some internal dissensions, still, on the whole, opposed to Protection. The Speaker, who was chosen as a Free-trader, nominated a Committee of Ways and Means which inclined to his own opinions. The Committee has now reported in favour of further reductions in the tariff to at least the extent which was announced at the beginning of last year's Session. The Protectionists, who then contrived to make the actual reduction almost nominal, are apparently losing ground both in the country and in Congress; but nothing definite will be done before the Presidential election.

The choice of nominees at the two great party Conventions is unusually difficult to anticipate. For the most part possible candidates think it prudent or decorous to affect disinclination or indifference; but there is no reason to doubt that any politician who may be nominated will overcome his scruples in pursuance of his duty to his party. The actual President, Mr. ARTHUR, makes no secret of his readiness to submit to re-election. He has discharged the duties of his office with credit; and he has especially deserved and acquired public favour by the liberality and good taste of his hospitalities at the White House. Before his election as Vice-President he was principally known as a political manager at New York; but he has risen without effort to a higher level. There is still a prejudice against re-election, except as a reward for extraordinary public services in such cases as those of LINCOLN and GRANT. Mr. ARTHUR'S strength lies chiefly in his own State of New York, which will probably show a Democratic majority. The most conspicuous of his Republican competitors in New York is the late Secretary of State, Mr. BLAINE. It is doubtful whether Mr. BLAINE'S turbulent proceedings as Secretary of State under General GARFIELD have been rewarded by personal popularity. His chances of success would perhaps be greater if it were generally understood that no other probable candidate would be so distasteful to foreign Governments. Mr. BLAINE'S efforts to assert, under colour of the MONROE doctrine, a kind of protectorate over the Pacific States of South America augurs ill for his moderation and prudence. His differences in domestic politics with Mr. CONKLING, Mr. ARTHUR, and the so-called Stalwarts, transcend the comprehension of ignorant foreigners. Mr. EDMUNDS is another possible Republican nominee; and perhaps Mr. SHERMAN may once more find supporters. The active members of the party have no hesitation in announcing their intention of preferring the candidate who is most likely to win. It may be doubted whether Mr. ARTHUR or Mr. BLAINE satisfies the indispensable condition. In many former Conventions the successful aspirant has been unknown to the last moment. General GARFIELD attended the Republican Convention four years ago as one of the most active supporters of General GRANT. It was not till the objections to a third term of office were found to be insuperable that the Convention fell back on an active and respectable manager of elections.

Among the possible Democratic candidates one of the best known is Mr. CLEVELAND, now Governor of New York. General BUTLER is, in consequence of his defeat in Massachusetts, eliminated from the list of possible nominees. There is in many parts of the Union, and especially in the Southern States, a strong feeling in favour of the candidates who, after obtaining a majority, were fraudulently deprived of the Presidency and Vice-Presidency in 1876. The election of Mr. TILDEN and Mr. HENDRICKS would afford some reparation for a scandalous injustice; and Mr. TILDEN still enjoys a high reputation for political sagacity. During the contest of eight years ago the Republican papers daily accused Mr. TILDEN of some supposed fraud; but perhaps political morality has since improved. The objection which is now more commonly urged against Mr. TILDEN is that he is far advanced in years; but some of his partisans are, it is said, in the habit of considering the candidate's age as a positive recommendation. An infirm President, likely to die before the end of his term, gives importance to the sinecure office of Vice-President. It might therefore be worth the while of some ambitious politician to take the place of Mr. HENDRICKS. The claims of General HANCOCK, who was Democratic candidate in 1880, have apparently been forgotten. Another possible nominee is Mr. PAYNE, who, like his competitors, conforms to the fashion by professing unwillingness to engage in the contest. Until the two Conventions have met in the spring or in the early summer, more activity will be displayed in promoting the interests of competitors for nomination than in the final trial of strength. At present the chances of success are on the side of the Democrats. Since its internal feuds in the city of New York have been composed, the party is probably strong enough to carry the State. Ohio has been wrested from the Republicans; but Pennsylvania adheres to the party which is most steadily opposed to freedom of trade. The Democratic managers rely with well-founded confidence on the solid support of the South. The enfranchisement of the coloured population has in its result disappointed its promoters. The superior race, having by more or less regular methods reasserted its predominance, will not forgive during the present generation the attempts of the Republican party to control the South after the civil war by means of the negro vote.

In 1880, and to a greater degree in 1876, the Presidential contest was supposed to turn on the condition and administration of the Southern States. The Republicans were naturally held responsible for General GRANT's high-handed policy of employing Federal troops to maintain order at State elections. On the other hand, the Democrats were accused of favouring the acts of violence which had been committed by the Kuklux Society and similar organizations. If any intimidation is still practised against negro voters, order is not superficially disturbed, and there has for several years been no question of Federal interference with the domestic affairs of the Southern States. Foreign observers find it difficult to understand even the limited interest which the American people still feel in the choice of party nominees or in the subsequent election. The candidates and election managers profess to approve of Civil Service reform, and both parties promise, in the event of success, to execute the recent laws in spirit as well as in letter. The manipulators of Conventions and Caucuses perhaps already find that the springs of their machinery are beginning to show signs of weakness. Competitive examinations and official fixity of tenure would, if they become universal and permanent, disarm the most skilful operators. Since the first establishment of General JACKSON's principle that the spoils belong to the victors, posts in the public service have been openly distributed or promised in payment for votes. If the spoils are henceforth to be at the disposal of Civil Service Commissioners and Examiners, the currency which has been employed in political transactions will have been effectually demonetized. The change is for the present only inchoate or impending. Veteran practitioners observe with pleasure and sympathy that almost all office-holders support the re-election of the PRESIDENT, in apparent confidence that their loyalty will not be unrewarded. It is not known whether a Democratic President would imitate his predecessors in former times by substituting followers of his own for all Republican holders of office. As far as the higher posts are concerned, he would be held in check by the Senate, which still maintains a small Republican majority; but he will assuredly be urged by his followers to give them an ample share of the good things which have now for many years been enjoyed by the Republicans. The custom, though it may have been partially affected by Civil Service Reform Bills, has not been allowed by the present Government to lapse into desuetude. Within the last year a head of a department was allowed with impunity to levy for political purposes a percentage on the salaries of his subordinates. Wealthy partisans are still expected to contribute liberally to the expenses of elections. The process is at present in full operation, as preparatory to the contest, or, as it is called, the campaign. Single votes are too numerous to command a price in the market, and there is probably no direct pecuniary corruption; but lavish provision is made for the expenses of canvassing and of party agitation, and there is an understanding that contributors and paymasters shall in case of success be rewarded by office.

EGYPT.

ONCE more on Tuesday the policy of being instant, in season and out of season, in demanding explanations from the Government as to its Egyptian schemes was justified of its works. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's speech may have had drawbacks, but it certainly elicited from Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE two remarkable disclosures. With the very worst grace in the world, the UNDER-SECRETARY for FOREIGN AFFAIRS admitted that General GRAHAM's force was going to try to find OSMAN DIGMA to give him a third beating; and that the Government regarded the keeping open or opening of the road from Souakim to Berber as of the very greatest importance. Of course Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE, when his avowals were put into plain language for him by Mr. GORST and Mr. COWEN, protested that he had said nothing of the kind. The less skilful members of the Government imitate freely their leader's license of disclaimer; but they omit to prepare the way for this evolution by their leader's admirable ambiguity of language. A plain blunt statement is not to be got out of by an equally plain and blunt denial of having stated it. But not even the arts of the PRIME MINISTER or of his own predecessor in the responsible office of dressing up foreign facts for home consumption could have saved Lord EDMOND. The news which arrived next day by telegraph, unintelligible on any other hypothesis, is intelligible on the hypothesis that the Government has done what Lord EDMOND first said they intended to do, and then said that he did not say they intended to do. The weary and wondering troops who, if the Government had heeded what was plainly set before them, would have been at Berber and Khartoum in January, have once more set forward to cover the thrice travelled ground between Souakim and Tamanieb, in order to kill more Arabs if the Arabs would come and be killed, and to come back again if the Arabs declined to come and be killed. The Arabs did decline to be killed in any numbers, and the force came or is coming back again. As the capture of Souakim by OSMAN is not, it may be supposed, considered now likely even by English Radicals who support the Government, this movement would be inexplicable but for Lord EDMOND's unwilling frankness. As it is, it appears that it is after a manner explicable. The troops went to find and beat OSMAN once more, and they went to open the route to Berber with the aid of the friendly tribes. By this time these friendly tribes are known pretty well. They are and will be friendly as far as English power is visibly shown, and no further. Therefore, if the road to Berber is to be opened with their aid, it will be opened by them in conjunction with English troops and not otherwise. It could have been, and should have been, opened in the same fashion three months ago. But it would then have been done in the cold season, not in the hot season, and in all probability with insignificant bloodshed, instead of with a preliminary deluge of blood. That is the difference between the ways of PROMETHEUS and the ways of EPIMETHEUS.

Unfortunately there is a further disadvantage in the Epimethean fashion of acting. Not only is it more difficult and costly to do things as afterthoughts, but it occasionally becomes impossible to do them. Readers of the telegrams from Souakim on Thursday morning must have been of a sanguine disposition if they were hopeful as to the accomplishment of the programme of which the Government have allowed glimpses. It is generally held that in about a fortnight action, by English troops, in this particular part of the Soudan (which is either in, or close to, the very hottest district of the whole earth) will become impracticable. The accounts of the newspaper Correspondents seem to show that it has already become foolhardy to the extent almost of madness. That there may have been some shamming among the hundreds of men who fell out on Tuesday is possible, for the troops are known not to be best pleased with the aimless and unexplained, but exceptionally severe, work on which they have been set. But this is far from being a very comforting or satisfactory explanation in itself, and it is besides certain that it does not apply to the majority of the cases. The cruel folly of keeping a small force unrelieved, unreinforced, imperfectly and improperly equipped, and composed in large part of men who have already had their full share of exposure to the weakening effects of Eastern climate, marching and counter-marching in such a furnace when England possesses thousands and scores of thousands of troops admirably suited for the work, would need no exposing if it were not the act of an immaculate Government and a more immaculate PRIME MINISTER. As it is, the patience which has received unmoved the greatest slaughter of enemies for the least intelligible cause recorded in the recent annals of English warfare may possibly be extended to this reckless harassing and jeopardizing of English troops. It would, however, be a bold man who cared to stand in Mr. GLADSTONE'S shoes, should the obstinate resistance of the Arabs inflict any disaster on General GRAHAM'S wearied and overtasked handful of men. For the present there is no immediate danger of this, as the Arabs have refrained from all but nominal resistance. But no one who reads the telegrams above referred to, and who remembers Tamasi, can say that such a disaster is out of the question, though it may be hoped that it is improbable. The risk is run, as Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE has said, for the sake of opening the road to Berber. It may be more than doubted whether at the present moment that opening is physically possible. And if it is not, General GORDON and Khartoum must simply be left to the enemies who at the latest news surrounded and threatened them, and who would certainly be encouraged by the intelligence that the English generals who threatened to go to Berber cannot get there. The time which would have enabled troops to be sent by the long way up the Nile has been lost just as the time for sending them by the short Souakim-Berber route has been lost. Everywhere the Procrastination Department has achieved a brilliant success, a success which should be the less grudged that it is the one single department of the present Government's administration which has been so favoured. It is true that, as it in a way pervades and influences all other departments, they may claim a share of its success.

There has been in recent years no more striking illustration of the audacity or the blindness of party spirit than the complacency with which not a few of the supporters of the Government contemplate the blunders of their leaders in this matter. It would puzzle the most generous apologist to devise any coherent series of explanations or excuses for the Government policy, regard being had to historical truth. On the principles of their original statements, General GRAHAM'S expedition had no locus standi on Soudanese ground at all except to defend the walls of Souakim. On the principles of intelligent policy, it should have been sent three months earlier. On the principles of military science and of common sense, it should have been differently composed, differently equipped, and have pursued from the first a clear and definite line of action. Turn from Souakim to Khartoum, and the same paltering, the same hesitation—to use the words of one of the chief apologists of the Ministry—shows itself. It was understood that General GORDON went out with an absolute carte blanche to use the means he might think best, and the very first important proposition he makes—the appointment of ZOBEIR—is refused by the Government which has sent him as a lamb among wolves. It was understood that every demand of his for support would be granted, and yet the "British "troops," to whom he has repeatedly referred in his proclamations, are not on their way, and apparently cannot be got on that way. The remarkable mission of two English officers to Berber with money but without troops, which is now announced, can hardly be said to be a compliance with his wishes; but it seems to indicate that General GRAHAM will not leave Souakim just yet. To the military as to the political historian, the steps taken in the Soudan by Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government up to this time must, taken by themselves, and regarded as parts of a general and intelligent design, ever remain a hopeless enigma, an enigma only to be matched in hopelessness by the Gladstonian policy in Egypt proper. Yet any discussion of these things in the proper assembly for their discussion, any prayer for light, any remonstrance with the mixture of rashness and reluctance which is dignified by the name of the Government policy, is howled at by Radicals of a certain type as treason in their fellow-Radicals and faction in Tories. To play pranks with the Constitution of the country, to tinker the franchise and potter with registration and redistribution—things which not a few candid Radicals in private conversation will acknowledge to be of no import whatever save a party import—is applauded as real statesmanship. To squander the blood of English soldiers in streams and of Arabs in oceans, to play chuck-farthing with the interests of the country, to wait on Providence in the hope apparently that Providence will somehow be kind enough to recall the gift which England cannot manage, this, perhaps, is statesmanship too.

LEASEHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT.

THE principle of the Irish Land Bill is, as might be expected, fructifying in the imagination of theorists, more or less sincere, and of political adventurers. The more audacious Socialists affect to justify wholesale robbery by the enumeration of the beneficial purposes to which hundreds of thousands or millions of revenue might be applied if it were only released from the encumbrance of private ownership. Other projectors, at the same time less consistent and less dishonest, propose to interfere in detail with proprietary rights for the supposed advantage of the community or of certain classes. Some changes in leasehold tenure may, perhaps, be fit subjects for remedial legislation; but Mr. BROADHURST'S Bill, as it was introduced, contained flagrantly unjust provisions, and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S language was justly stigmatized by a member of his own party as rank and cynical communism. The denunciation by a member of a ducal family of the owner of Belgrave Square may be described in the language which JOHNSON applied to another anomalous performance. "It is not well done; but the wonder is that it should "be done at all." Practical paradoxes generally attain their principal object by making bystanders stare. In serious argument Belgrave Square would not have been chosen as an instance of bad administration. If all urban freeholds were administered like the Westminster estate, many of the arguments which were urged against leasehold tenure would become inapplicable. Petty speculators who run up flimsy suburban houses would continue their operations if they were compelled first to buy the land, and then to sell the houses when they were completed. The statement that there is no freedom of contract between landlords and lessees would, as far as it has any meaning, be equally applicable to vendors and purchasers of land, or indeed of any other commodity. It is true that owners in the City or in Kensington enjoy a monopoly; but all property, real or personal, is equally exclusive. If a man's business makes it necessary for him to occupy premises in Bloomsbury or in Southwark, he would be as much compelled to pay the price of a freehold, if such a tenure were universal, as to hire the buildings at a rent fixed by competition under the system which now prevails.

Scarcely any speaker in the late debate ventured to support the scheme of compulsory purchase at the instance of any existing tenant who might have an unexpired term of twenty years. A prospective enactment to the same effect, though it would be less flagrantly unjust, would cause the greatest inconvenience. The objection which has been urged against agricultural tenant-right applies equally to houses; though it is fair to admit that Mr. BROADHURST has not proposed, like the agitators of the Farmers' Alliance, to confer a perpetuity on the tenant without compensation. In either case the owner, if he was unable or unwilling to occupy his house or his land, would be prevented from letting it, except at the risk of losing it altogether. It might, indeed, be possible to evade Mr. BROADHURST'S legislation by letting houses for nineteen years; but all the evils which are attributed to leasehold tenure would be aggravated by limitation of the customary term. The option of purchase is, according to the Bill, not reciprocal. It is true that in that case compulsion would be often impracticable. In other words, Mr. BROADHURST'S measure is intrinsically and necessarily unequal. The Bill expressly provided for the non-allowance of the percentage which is usually added to the cost of land taken for public purposes. The tribunals by which the purchase-money was to be assessed was required to assume, in contradiction to the fact, that the transaction was on both sides voluntary. Up to the present time Parliament has constantly refused expropriation for the benefit of private persons. The issue has frequently been raised when railway companies have promoted lines to single collieries with the proposed result of extinguishing way-leaves. If the practice were altered or reversed, it would be a strange proceeding to give purchasing lessees more favourable terms than those which are granted to a public company or a corporation.

One advocate of the measure urged as an argument in its favour the assertion that it was desired in Scotland; yet it is notorious that in that country building land is almost always alienated in perpetuity to freeholders who pay few duties or ground-rents to the superior or lessor. The custom might perhaps be advantageously extended beyond a limited number of districts in England, where a similar tenure has been found expedient; but it is seldom the business of Parliament to interfere with voluntary arrangements. There must be economical reasons for a custom which has become general. It appears that in some parts of the country the more objectionable tenure of leases for lives still survives. The combination of a suzerainty with a duration of perhaps seventy or eighty years seems to serve no useful purpose.

Both the Scotch and the English systems have hitherto been recommended by the almost perfect security which they provided for the payment of the fee-duty or ground-rent. One of the speakers in the debate inaccurately stated that the main object of the London freeholder was to obtain the largest possible ground-rent. It is true that, as long leases fall in, ground-rent is almost always raised; but the owners are prudent enough to take care that it bears a small proportion to the actual value of the premises. The rack-rent, if it has not been commuted in the form of purchase-money, is for the most part payable to the first lessee. The reversion, if it comes into the market, commands but a small price during the earlier years of a long lease, though the hope of enriching remote descendants may probably have a tendency to maintain the practice of granting terminable leases. As the Attorney-General showed, Mr. Broadhurst's Bill would have sometimes vested the reversion in the occupier for a nominal price. It is possible that the recent agitation against the rights of urban as of rural proprietors may induce some landlords to sell their property instead of reletting it at the termination of existing leases. On the other hand, the increasing difficulty of finding safe investments may serve as a reason for the retention of ground rents and of terminable or perpetual leases.

In the more prosperous parts of London there is probably but a moderate demand for freehold houses. If the great metropolitan estates were broken up, they would for the most part be bought by speculative builders or contractors, though in some instances occupiers might wish to become absolute owners. Only a certain number of residents of the upper and middle classes regard London as the permanent home of their families; and provident householders, before they effected a purchase, would remember the changes of local fashion which are perhaps not yet exhausted. Fifty years ago, the bankers, merchants, and judges who now swarm in South Kensington were content to live in the roomy streets and squares of Bloomsbury. Since that time the respectable district on the north of Hyde Park has flourished, and perhaps begun to fade. Mr. Broadhurst and his supporters would, perhaps, disclaim any special solicitude for the interests of the richer classes of occupiers. The fragile and ill-drained tenements which are run up in the suburbs for the use of clerks and artisans are undoubtedly not conducive to health or comfort; but it would be difficult to prevent the purchase of lots of building land by speculators with the intention of sub-letting houses when they have been constructed as cheaply as possible. Modes of dealing with property which have been widely adopted are always the result of economic causes. Arbitrary interference invariably tends to check both cheapness and convenience.

The outskirts of some manufacturing towns consist of cottages which for the most part belong to the actual occupiers. The laws which regulate the tenure of land are the same in Birmingham and in Leeds as in London; and the provincial freeholders have not acquired their possessions by the legislative expropriation of former lessors. If the circumstances differ, it is idle to complain that the results are not identical. One obvious peculiarity of London consists in the high value of land, and in the consequent waste which would be caused by the construction of houses only large enough for the occupation of single families of the poorer class. In the heart of the town large buildings, such as those of the Peabody or Waterlow trustees, are incomparably cheaper and more convenient than separate cottages. Neither Mr. Broadhurst nor his competitor, Lord Randolph Churchill, appeared to have taken into consideration the complicated questions which would still arise if the rights of house-owners were summarily abolished. Almost all the other speakers in the debate admitted the impracticable crudity of Mr. Broadhurst's proposals, though the division represented a vague and inaccurate belief that the scheme might perhaps be rendered just and practicable by alterations of detail. If it were proved that the system of building leases was injurious to the community, there might be some ground for endeavouring to prohibit the future existence of a mischievous tenure. The proposed remedy of allowing the occupier at his pleasure to buy out the landlord involved a confession that no rational plea for establishing a change of system had yet been devised.

ANDORRA.

THE dispute which has arisen between France and Spain—a controversy which can hardly have any important consequences—on the subject of Andorra must have led many readers of the newspapers to ask themselves what there could be to dispute about. It is true that at the present time the French nation, disabled by the arms and by the diplomacy of Germany from throwing all Europe into confusion, finds its satisfaction in threatening or attacking, on any or no pretext whatever, those countries from which a serious resistance is not to be expected. The public opinion of France, in spite of the severe lessons which the country has received, has not yet reconciled itself to the patent fact that France is no longer able to dictate to her neighbours and to the world at large. But the illusions which have beguiled the French mind from the days of Louis XIV. to the fall of Napoleon III. are such as do not die easily. To be the great nation, to have the lead in the politics of the world, to determine its affairs in accordance with the desires of France, was the ambition of half a dozen generations of Frenchmen. It was an ambition fed and worked upon by nearly every French statesman. In Europe, Asia, and America, the attempt was persistently made to render France the predominating Power in the world. During the last century the plans of France for founding an Empire in Asia and America were frustrated by England, and in the present century her preponderance in Europe, at one moment almost complete, has been overthrown. It is now impossible for the most imaginative of French patriots to think that France can play the same part in European affairs which she could play when surrounded by weak, decrepit, and divided neighbours. Her neighbours are now either strong States, too strong to be lightly assailed, or, which comes to the same thing, small States the maintenance of whose integrity is in the interests of the Great Powers. These facts have more and more, within the last few years, driven the French Government to satisfy the ambition of the French people, or the financial interests of French traders, by seeking influence in new directions. The action of France in Tonquin, Tunis, and Madagascar is due solely to the fact that her favourite part in Europe is played out. Still, something may be done even in Europe; and to assert French influence on the south side of the Pyrenees may be some kind of consolation for not being able any longer to assert it on the Rhine or beyond the Alps.

Andorra is one of the few European States which, like San Marino and Monaco, have not been absorbed into the larger countries of the same speech and blood by which they are surrounded. But it differs from San Marino and Monaco in the fact that its frontiers touch those of two other countries. When Cracow was annexed by Austria in 1846, the disturbance which the act produced in the diplomatic world was due to the impression which it made that the Treaties of 1815 were no longer to be held binding. Otherwise it might have been incorporated by Austria almost without notice. The only reason why the tiny Republic of San Marino does not now form part of the kingdom of Italy is that its existence as an independent State does no harm to anybody, and that its union with Italy would do no appreciable good to anybody.

Andorra is the debatable land between France and Spain; and it is not unnatural that, after the recent irritation caused on both sides of the Pyrenees by the unpleasant events which attended the visit of the King of Spain to Paris, any trifling difference between the two countries should be made the most of. The "Andorra question," as it has been called in the telegrams, is in itself one of the smallest. It consists in the fact that Andorra furnishes a convenient base of operations and place of refuge for smugglers, robbers, and all that class of persons who are "wanted" by the police. The reason why France is more interested in the matter than Spain is, apart from French love of interference, that France, as the richer country, has probably suffered more than Spain from those who find Andorra a convenient residence or halting-place. The natives themselves are, from all accounts, a people remarkably simple, honest, and industrious. Their history and their relations to the two countries are very curious. The "State" of Andorra, if one can apply the name to a district resembling the smallest of the Swiss cantons, is said, in popular story, to have been "founded" by Charlemagne. According to the legend, which may have had a foundation of fact, the independence of Andorra was granted by Charlemagne in return for the services which the natives rendered to him in the wars with the infidels by which he extended the southern frontiers of his Empire to the Ebro. At the same time the "suzerainty" over Andorra was conferred on the neighbouring Bishop of Urgel. It is needless to say that bishops were then persons of more territorial importance than they now are, in Spain or elsewhere. The rights conferred by Charlemagne were confirmed by Louis le Débonnaire. Four centuries later, the Comte de Foix was also invested with a kind of sovereignty over Andorra, the already existing rights of the Bishop of Urgel being expressly reserved. The Counts of Foix became in the course of time Counts of Bearn and Kings of Navarre; and, when Henry IV. came to the throne of France, his ancestral rights over the little peasant community became vested in the French Crown. With what justice those who are proud that their grandfathers destroyed the French monarchy, and appealed from documents and inherited rights to nature and reason, can now found their pretensions on these self-same documents and inherited rights it is not easy to see. According to reason and nature, it is perfectly clear that Andorra should be Spanish. The little Republic lies south of the Pyrenees; the language is a dialect of Spanish; the people are, and always have been, mainly of Spanish blood; all their traditions associate them with Spain. If inheritance is to decide the matter, then the Comte de Chambord and his successors, the present Orleans Princes, would be those who would divide the sovereignty of Andorra with the Bishop of Urgel. It is stupid to have recourse to this principle in one case and to repudiate it in another—to turn out, on the ground that mere technical right is of no value, a dynasty which had ruled for centuries in France, and then appeal, in a controversy with a foreign country, to documents which at home are treated as nothing better than old parchment.

Perhaps the pleasure of baiting a Bishop may have had something to do with the action of the present Cabinet in France. We read that the negotiations between the Bishop and the French Government have been marked by great courtesy. In this case we may safely conjecture that the soft answer was on the side of the Bishop. There is, indeed, no reason whatever why France should have any rights at all south of the Pyrenees. Spain neither is nor is likely to be a dangerous enemy to France. The only time when she was so was when Spain was only a part of the great Empire of Charles V. Since then Spain has not been an aggressor, but rather on account of its possessions the bone of contention between other Powers. France has every reason to be happy at home. Nobody wants to attack or molest her in any way. She is in many respects the most happily situated country in Europe. There is, if not greater wealth, at least more diffused wealth in France than in any other European country. The problems which an expanding population brings with it are of less importance in France than elsewhere. The population of France remains stationary; and for this reason alone the French desire to have a colonial empire, or to exercise that influence on the affairs of the world which an expanding country can and must exercise are denied to her. But there are in France means for a prosperous national life which hardly exist in any other country. The mere fact that her population does not increase, though it shuts her out from the great politics of the world, ensures her a freedom from the troubles which perplex the statesmen of growing countries. Only it is essential that Frenchmen should recognize facts; that they should give up old illusions, which history has shown to be no more than empty dreams; and that they should be content to play the honourable part which is always open to any nation if it is at once gifted and modest. The dominating part which France once played is gone for her, as for all other nations; and in this question of Andorra, as in others, France will find the principle of give and take to be the wisest. France is so isolated that she cannot afford even to quarrel with Spain.

THE CATTLE BILL.

THE machine of Parliamentary government, as it is understood by our present rules, is like the ill-horsed hansom commonly to be seen in the streets. It cannot be set going without a great deal of shoving and pushing at the wheels, to a chorus of shouting, rattling of sticks in hats, and even blasphemy. When voluntary assistance is at hand, the vehicle can be got under way and despatched on its erratic course easily enough. When cabby is left to his own resources, then a dreadful pother of strong language is kept overhead. There is a despatching of small boys to public-houses, desperate appeals and lavish offers of beer are made to the passer-by, and there the cab sticks with its backing hack, a spectacle to loafers and nursery maids. Even so is it with Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet when a Bill has to be driven through the Houses. Nothing can be done till the momentum is given by meetings, deputations, and infinite clamour of outsiders. It has now come to such a pitch that the first thing a Minister has to do is to look about for a mob to push behind. He must summon spirits from the vasty deep to help on his work, and, if they do not come (and they are certainly becoming very restive), then, by way of terrifying opponents, it must be roundly asserted that they are really coming. In the meantime an air of plausibility is given to the dreadful threat by dressing up the most imposing bogies. All the Ministers together declare that the country is clamouring for the Franchise Bill. Mr. Chamberlain is in the habit of saying three or four times a week that there is a deep and earnest persuasion in the minds of voters as to the pressing necessity of his particular measure. Now Brutus is an honourable man, and is, of course, firmly convinced of the truth of every word he utters; but to those of us who have not the good luck to have access to his exceptional sources of information, the existence of this popular persuasion seems at least doubtful. It is certainly curious that we should need to learn it at second-hand. Very juvenile politicians can remember agitations which contrived to assert themselves in a most unmistakable way and had no need to be revealed by Ministers. There are meetings held all over the country, and deputations come up to recommend this, and protest against that, but somehow they do not ring so true as they used to do when Mr. Plimsoll was a reality and the Bulgarian a pet. When we hear that the sailors of a second-rate port have held a meeting and unanimously voted that the Shipping Bill should be referred to a Grand Committee, and have utterly abhorred the notion of a Select Committee, nobody is much impressed. It is so very doubtful whether the honest fellows know the difference between the two things, and then their votes are so much like an echo of noises heard long ago in Birmingham—the new "other place" on which the House of Commons has now to keep its eye.

Now it seems that the country—the poor country which is at every agitator's beck and call—not content with being wildly excited by the Franchise and Shipping Bills, is fiercely intent on seeing the Cattle Bill carried. Of course it is not the measure now before the House of Commons in its revised and corrected form, but the first edition which has won the hearts of the familiar spirits of our wonder-working Ministers. The country has come in a body to ask Mr. Forster to tell Mr. Dodson that it wants the first Bill, the whole of the first Bill, and nothing but the first Bill. The member for Bradford has taken the message, and has given voice to the desire of the country in his place in Parliament, and now we know that there is yet another agitation to be taken into account. We live in an age of curious little enthusiasms, but this cult of Mr. Dodson's Bill—or is it Lord CARLINGFORD's?—is the funniest idol-worship we have yet seen. It has shot up more swiftly than JACK's beanstalk. Yesterday it was not, and now it overshadows the country, at least Mr. FORSTER and Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD say so. Then the nature of the worship is as wonderful as its rapid growth. The country is, it seems, greatly moved on behalf of two clauses of a little Bill introduced at the last moment and very unwillingly by a Ministry in abject fear of mutiny in its own camp. When Mr. FORSTER speaks of his moderation, which he does every time he opens his mouth on the subject, he very frankly confesses that he does not like the original Bill. He and his friends think it a dangerous measure. They do not see the necessity for it, and they do think it will lead to mischief. Nevertheless, they are prepared to support it, because, after the vote of last Session, something had to be done; because, if the Ministry played at being deaf, it would certainly have its attention aroused in an unpleasant fashion by the representatives of the agricultural interest; and because, whatever mischief the Bill may do, anything is better than the overthrow of Mr. GLADSTONE's Cabinet. Now as Mr. FORSTER, Mr. A. ARNOLD, Mr. ROGERS, and the deputations are, on their own showing, the spokesmen of the country, we come to a curious result. The country, it seems, is prepared to accept a Bill for restricting the importation of cattle from countries not free from foot-and-mouth disease provided the measure is wholly the work of the Ministry. It would, so its alleged representatives say, rather leave the thing alone; but to save Mr. GLADSTONE it will submit to a disagreeable necessity. Only let him say that he smites for purposes of his own, and such is the devotion of the country that it will kiss the rod. All it asks is that Mr. GLADSTONE shall choose the rod. Now there are unquestionably persons official and unofficial to whom this may seem credible; but, to everybody who is not in the bodyguard of our Mahdi, it is hard of belief. The English people, including the Scotch, will, as we now know, accept much from Mr. GLADSTONE's Cabinet; but it may be doubted whether it will submit to the rifling of its breeches' pocket. Its manuetude, as described for our edification, surpasses all the virtues of the saints. Before we believe that Leviathan has presented his nostrils for the hook so humbly as this, we should like to have better security than the word of Mr. FORSTER, who has voted yes after speaking no too often of late, or of Mr. ARNOLD, who is professedly acting against his own convictions in giving any support to the Cattle Bill at all.

There is, indeed, nothing in all this theatrical agitation which need scare the Opposition. It is too manifestly a mere chimæra bombinans in vacuo. If the country were really frightened at the Cattle Bill, and disturbed with fears of dear meat, it would not be so gingerly in its resistance. It would refuse to have anything to do with the measure, and say so plainly enough. Neither would the Bill ever have been heard of if the Ministry had not known well that it had no choice but to take steps of some kind. It was introduced because the Cabinet well knew that it would not be supported in any further attempt to treat the vote of last Session on Mr. CHAPLIN's motion as if it had never been given. Ministers want to do as little as they can, and do it under compulsion, in order that, if at any future time they are accused of not sufficiently considering the interests of the town population, they may be able to say that they submitted to pressure. The ricketty agitation now being nursed by the Ministerial press in town and country is as much a makeshift as the unamended Bill. A popular movement which takes so much count of the fortunes of a Cabinet is a very half-hearted business. If the Bill is needed at all, it should be effectual; and to be that it must make it a matter of necessity for the President of the Council to refuse admittance to cattle coming from countries which cannot show a clean bill of health. If the need of more stringent legislation has been proved, and if it has not the Bill should never have been brought in at all, then the limitation of the duration of the Act to two years which Ministers are striving to reintroduce is useless. The only reason for its existence is their wish to do the least they can, and for the shortest time. Two years hence, unless their hopes are more modest than anybody takes them to be, they expect to have a House in which members who think like Mr. CHAPLIN may be safely disregarded. There is nothing in the Bill to compel the exclusion of cattle from healthy countries, and the Ministry has already undertaken to exclude those which come from those which are infected. On their own showing, therefore, they may reasonably accept the Duke of RICHMOND's amendments, and their private motives for rejecting them afford the Opposition its best reason for insisting that they should be retained.

AMERICAN COLLECTORS.

"THIS is where our money goes," said the publisher to his partner when they dined with a hospitable author. "This is where our books go to," a European—and especially an Englishman—may say when he reads the series of little books on the Private Libraries of Philadelphia. To the dweller in the old world, whatever he may collect, the American competitor is naturally odious. We do not know that the American market has yet developed a taste for Scarabs. "Gather ye scarabs "while ye may" is, therefore, the motto of every one of the few and fortunate amateurs into whose hands Mr. LOFTIE's pretty Essay of Scarabs has fallen. The American is probably just awakening from the sleep of ignorance, with a healthy appetite for beetles "inscribed," like the Virgilian flower, "with the names of kings." He will soon know all about dates and glazes and dynasties, and refuse to be taken in by a sham Scarab of THOTHMES III. Meantime the American collector chiefly shows his vivacity in the matter of books. He has raised prices three- or fourfold all round the European market. He has privily suborned certain of the dealers in old books to send him the cream of their collections, and they prefer the alien dollar to the scanty shilling of the native amateur. What the Americans most love to collect are old books about their own country. Even such unattractive looking series as the Lettres Edifiantes sur la Nouvelle France are hunted for all through England and France on this side of the Atlantic. The slimmest and dingiest pamphlets of planters, politicians, missionaries, and Boston ministers are bound in morocco and fine leather, and are quite beyond the reach of the few students who want to read them. Fortunately, the British Museum is rich in Americana, and any one who can face the atmosphere of the Museum Reading-room may find out what he wants to know. But to buy books touching on the past of America, on the native races, and on the "pow-wowing" for which the Puritans (with their usual intolerance) fined the poor Redskins, has become practically impossible. These treatises go to decorate the shelves of New York millionaires, who probably never read them. Ultimately they will drift, no doubt, into American public libraries, and be at the service of the future historian. If we may judge by modern American works on ancient native history and native beliefs, the old Americana are collected rather than read in the States. They have been made to throw about as much light on the past of the native peoples as Nankin porcelain in an English house throws on the mediæval records of the Flowery Land.

America is not at all content with carrying back all the books which touch, even faintly, on her own antiquities. Her citizens are keen to possess whatever is valued in Europe, and, as some of us know to our cost, have a perfect fury for autographs. Many a British scribbler, wholly unknown by name to his countrymen, has letters from bold young ladies "on Algonkin Avenue," maidens as enterprising as the dauntless daughter of the carpenter in The Bread-winners. These adventurous ones demand his autograph, and declare that they will certainly come to see him when they visit Europe. To these flattering advances silence is the only safe reply, yet the British author goes round with a sad, weary feeling that a literary lady's heart is wilting "on Algonkin Avenue." However, the owner of the heart has probably more responsive correspondents, and casts her net widely enough to catch many of the small fry of letters. America is now the home of the hated Grangerite, who makes up one bulky and larcenous volume by cutting engravings out of any book he may come across and binding them together into a folio.

If we may judge by a description of the "Library of "GEO. W. CHILDS" in a Philadelphia series of pamphlets, DICKENS's autographs and letters from emperors are very highly prized by the Transatlantic curious. Among tables of ebony brought from the land of the gorillas by M. DU CHAILLU, and carpets from unique designs by OWEN JONES, are storked the treasures of Mr. CHILD. He possesses—sweet boon—a manuscript sermon of the Rev. COTTON MATHER, full of "the love which sainted" COTTON "bore "to all who came behind him or before." He also has Leigh Hunt's poems, a copy presented in 1844 to the creator of Harold Skimpole. There is something very moving in the sight of this offering of unsuspicious affection. More interesting still is a copy of Hood's Annual, with a MS. poem addressed to Dickens on the eve of the voyage whence he brought back Martin Chuzzlewit's impressions of the United States.

> May he shun all rocks whatever,
> And the shallow sand that lurks,
> And his passage be as clever
> As the best among his works.

Such is the lyric prayer of Tom Hood.

FitzGreene Halleck, whoever he may have been, and his poem on "Alnwick Castle" is also represented in Mr. Childs's collection. Here, at last, is a prize which jealous Europe does not envy. A MS. of Bryant's translation of the Iliad will also be most highly esteemed, no doubt, in Bryant's own country. A nine-page folio of Mr. Lowell's "June Idyll" recalls the fact that eighteen years passed in the construction of that poem. So many Aprils in hot summers burned between 1850, when the "June Idyll" was begun, to 1868, when it was finished, with very few alterations. The manuscript of Poe's Murders in the Rue Morgue has a curious history. It is written in Poe's beautiful minute hand on seventeen large folio sheets of paper. An office-boy picked the MS. out of the waste-paper basket of a journal about 1841. Twice the rooms of the finder (who had become a photographer) were burned between 1847 and 1850, and once again in 1857; but the MS. of the Murders in the Rue Morgue always escaped fire and water. From 1861 to 1864 the owner was fighting his country's battle; but, when peace returned, he discovered the MS. in an old music-book. He then became a hotelkeeper; and the indestructible MS. pursued him, as the brownie "flitted" after the flitting farmer, wherever this nomadic American pitched his tent and chose a new business. Finally he had the paper bound; and, after all its wanderings, it reposes, with an autograph (dated) of the Emperor of Brazil himself, in the collection of Mr. Childs. Little did Poe think, when he wrote his story for a few dollars, what illustrious associations were to gather round the unconsidered 'copy.' An interesting letter of Poe's demonstrates that he offered a new collection of his prose tales to Messrs. Lea & Blanchard in 1841. The emoluments of literature in 1841 were not considerable in America. Poe writes:—"I should be glad to accept the terms which 'you allowed me before—that is, you receive all the 'profits, and allow me twenty copies for distribution to 'friends." Here is indeed a document for that great unwritten work, the History of Publishers. With the exception of some of Hawthorne's tales, Poe's are perhaps the most remarkable works of fiction which America has yet produced. They may have been less popular than the Leather-stocking novels of Cooper, and less popular than Uncle Tom's Cabin. Still, they must have had an enormous sale in America if they were as much liked there as in England and France. Yet what arrangement did the publishers make with Poe? Why, they took "all the profits." Perhaps Poe found that this system was less complex than that of "half 'profits," while the results were the same. Modern American writers who have entered what is, comparatively speaking, a Promised Land of wealth should not speak harshly of Poe. How could a man of genius support life, and be respectable, and shun the bowl on the proceeds of stories whereof the publishers received "all the profits"? There is something very touching in the humble acquiescent attitude of the author of the Cask of Amontillado. He could not have been worse remunerated had he been a Briton unprotected by copyright.

In England many collectors will envy Mr. Child his MS. of Our Mutual Friend more than any of his other treasures, which are chiefly modern. Most of the Dickens manuscripts are in the South Kensington Museum, but Mr. Childs has acquired the only novel of the first class which has reached America. The folios contain a sketch or skeleton of the tale, drawn out before Dickens had quite settled on the names of his characters. The care with which the sketch is made should be a lesson for novelists who jump at once into their story without more than the vaguest idea of what is going to happen. Perhaps the skeleton might be published with fresh editions of the book, and guide us through the Podsnaps and Twemlows. Thus Mr. Childs's collection would be made useful as well as curious. Interesting, too, it is to learn that the Emperor of Brazil "inquired quite feelingly after Mr. Geo. W. "Childs."

THE GUARDIANSHIP OF INFANTS.

It is satisfactory, but only to a moderate extent, that on Wednesday afternoon the House of Commons read a second time Mr. Bryce's Bill relating to the guardianship of infants. The majority was large—208 to 73—in favour of the Bill; but, unless we are greatly mistaken, the division only indicates that many people are anxious for an alteration of the present law. The difficulties in the way of carrying out Mr. Bryce's proposals are very great, and whether they will be got rid of to any extent in Committee or in the Upper House remains to be seen. It is one thing, as Mr. Bryce has had but too many reasons to remember, to point out an evil, but quite another to remedy it. The present law is unsatisfactory; but, at any rate, we know what it is. A man who is married and has children is the head of his house. He can not only settle the profession for which each of his family is to be brought up, but he can settle what creed they are to be taught; and, moreover, after his death his wishes in these respects must be carried out, however disagreeable they may be to his surviving widow. This is the law, and people who make mixed marriages know it, and may calculate beforehand what risks they encounter. True, it is a relic of a semi-barbarous age, and is the last remnant of the ancient law which permitted a father to sell or even to slay his offspring. But whether it is worth while to abrogate a law which, after all, but seldom leads to complications, and impose rules instead which will lead to constant complications, is the question decided so far by the House on Wednesday. It decided, in short, that such a piece of domestic hardship as was revealed by the Agar-Ellis case, or by a recent case in Ireland where a Protestant mother has to bring up her only child a Romanist, ought not to occur again; but it remains to be seen whether Mr. Bryce's proposals will do away with the obvious injustice at which they are aimed. A court of law is to stand in loco parentis. It may make what order it thinks fit. A mother may be appointed guardian of her own children, even though the court be aware that she will bring them up in a different religion or to a different profession from that which the father approved. The Court of Chancery has some such power already. A father who has misbehaved can be denied access to his own children, yet the anomaly remains that such a father, who conceivably had never seen his child, could oblige the mother or the court-appointed guardians to order its temporal and spiritual affairs as he pleased. If Mr. Bryce was content to attack this anomaly, his Bill would have a better chance of final success; but he goes much further, and it will probably be seen that he will fare worse.

The cases cited above, and others adduced by Mr. Bryce, are undoubtedly hard, but they are exceptions; and there is much truth in Mr. Ince's contention that an extension of the present law in the direction of Talfourd's Act of 1839 and the Act of 1873 would be sufficient. Mr. Bryce interested his hearers by some romantic tales, chiefly from Scotland, though the hardest cases would probably be found in Ireland. Some time ago, he said, a lady who had been compelled to leave her husband found, on her return from a concert, that her children had been removed by their father during her absence. In a case like this one feels disposed to think that a lady anxious about the custody of her offspring had better abstain from nocturnal amusements. Mr. Bryce thinks the law should be altered. He tells of another lady who was ill-treated by a Scottish husband, and left him before the birth of her child. Yet the father obtained the child, and kept it. The moral of such a story is that young ladies had better not marry Scots. It is impossible for law to reach every kind of complication, and even Mr. Bryce would probably think a father entitled to the custody of his own child until at least some criminal act was proved against him. But, whatever the cases with which Mr. Bryce supported his Bill, he undoubtedly had the House, and probably a majority of thinking people, with him when he declared that the law at present does not work well, and that it is desirable that some change should be made. Mr. W. Fowler, Mr. Ince, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Forster, and others spoke more or less cogently against the Bill, but it was carried probably on account of the provision relating to maternal guardianship, which Mr. WALTER emphasized so strongly. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the mother is the proper guardian of her children after their father's death. Under the Bill both parents are guardians, with remainder to the survivor. The difficulty most likely to occur is that of religion; but Mr. WALTER's contention that, if a widow became a Romanist, she could interfere with the religion of the children is precisely the question at issue. This is a Bill to enable a widow, the survivor of the two parents, to bring up children according to her own wishes. The religious question remains practically untouched, though in working we mitigate its harshness. Mr. WALTER put the case of a widow turning Roman Catholic and bringing up the children of a Protestant father in that religion; but he did not put the case of a Romanist mother whose children are brought up Protestants after her death, or, still harder, during her life, under the existing law. In the present state of things there is both difficulty and hardship, and something may well be proposed to ameliorate the law; but Mr. BRYCE apparently would do too much, and make difficulties and hardships of a fresh kind.

THE PARKS RAILWAY.

THE majority at the Westminster meeting which affirmed the principle of the Parks Railway Bill was the victim of a not unnatural confusion between the end which the Bill has professedly in view and the mode in which it proposes to attain it. The working classes, it is said, would greatly benefit by the construction of such a line; consequently those who oppose it are enemies of the working classes. It is not needful to deny the premiss in order to deny the inference. Those who oppose the line are not in the least enemies of the working classes, and yet it is true that the working classes would benefit by its being made. There is no real paradox in this. What we contend is that the working classes would benefit much more by a line taken in a different direction, and that, whatever be its direction, it ought not to be constructed at their expense. In tracing the course which a new railway is to follow, it is not enough to prove that it will serve a certain number of people. Railways in London are mutually exclusive. If one is made, another will not be made. The Metropolitan Company are not going to waste their substance in carrying first a line from Paddington to Westminster, next a line from Baker Street to Charing Cross, and finally a line from King's Cross to Charing Cross. If they make one of the three, they will leave the other two alone. It is possible, therefore, to offer a perfectly honest opposition to a line from Paddington to Westminster, not on the ground that it would be useless, but simply on the ground that it would be less useful than some other line. Every consideration that naturally bears on this question points to one of the two alternative lines as supplying a much more urgent want than will be supplied by the railway from Paddington to Westminster. The vast district that lies to the north of King's Cross, and the rapidly-growing suburbs that lie to the north of Baker Street, would yield a far larger number of passengers than can be furnished by Paddington; and Charing Cross, as the terminus of a railway commanding the south of the Thames, is a point to which a far larger number of passengers will wish to be carried than are ever likely to want to go to Westminster. Even if the population to be served were equally large in all three cases, the greater distance of King's Cross from the existing line which takes passengers to Westminster would be a strong argument in favour of its being chosen as the starting-point of the new line. A working-man at Paddington can go round to Westminster with an appreciably less sacrifice of time than from King's Cross. As a matter of fact people do often go by the Metropolitan Railway from Paddington to Westminster; but we doubt whether any one goes by the Metropolitan Railway from King's Cross to Westminster. When, therefore, we oppose the railway across the Parks, we are really contending for a much more useful railway. What the working-men who suppose themselves to be interested in the success of this project have to consider is not simply whether they will gain by it, but whether they would not gain much more by a different project. If they think this, they must get the Parks Railway Bill rejected before they can hope to get either of the other Bills brought forward. The Metropolitan Railway Company, we repeat, will not make more than one new line across London from north to south. Those who wish that line to be carried either from Baker Street or King's Cross, and who think Charing Cross a better southern terminus than Westminster, must strive first of all to put an end to the present scheme. Otherwise Paddington will be benefited at the cost of districts which need a railway more and can turn it to better account.

The majority which carried the amendment at the Westminster meeting did not see why it is that the Metropolitan Company wish to make the line for which they are now asking the sanction of Parliament, in preference to making one which would attract more passengers. From the point of view of their own pockets they are quite in the right. Their profits will not be so large, but, as the cost of construction will be very much less, they may be even larger in proportion to the capital invested. But why is the cost of construction so much less? Simply because the land taken belongs not to rich men who look for compensation, but to poor men who do not think of compensation. This is nothing more than the literal truth. Technically, indeed, the Parks are the property of the Crown, but whose property are they beneficially? They are the property of the people of London, and, in so far as London attracts visitors from all parts of the country, of the people of England. And to what section of the people of London do they specially belong? Surely to that section which remains in town from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, which knows no distinction between season and out of season, which looks to the Parks as the one place in which it can enjoy air and space on summer evenings and on Sunday afternoons. It is the working classes who will be the real sufferers by any injury done to the Parks, because they have nothing to take their place. The Parks might be destroyed, and all that the rich would have to do would be to invent a new drive and a new Rotten Row. All else that the Parks supply they can have in greater perfection at their own country houses. The irreparable loss would fall on the working classes, and on this principle it is the working class who have the greatest real interest in protecting the Parks. If they are to be given up, the Metropolitan Railway should at least pay the same compensation that it would have to pay to private owners, and the money should be devoted to some public object by which the working classes would specially be the gainers. As it is, the Company simply propose to take public land for private purposes, and to pay next to nothing for the use of it.

ROWING AND SCULLING.

THE long lead which this country took about the middle of the present century in almost all branches of athletic sport has in these later years, as we all know, been woefully diminished, if not altogether taken from us. And in no case has the change been more remarkable than in the department of aquatics. About twenty-one years ago the best sculler that the Colonies could produce came over to England to row a match with the then champion, Bob Chambers, and was beaten with ridiculous ease, having exhibited an extraordinary turn of speed for a short distance, but no staying power at all. The United States made their first attempt three years later, when another English champion, Harry Kelley, defeated Hammill of Pittsburgh with equal ease in a match on the Tyne. Australia had been the first to challenge our supremacy on the river, and it was Australia which first succeeded in a like attempt just ten years later. But in the meantime no other colony or country attempted to interfere with our honours either in professional rowing or professional sculling. An international regatta, held on the Seine in 1867, and actively favoured by Napoleon III., only served to demonstrate the superiority of the English oarsmen, both amateur and professional; and the sole occasion of any importance before 1876, when this superiority was again called in question, was when Harvard University challenged Oxford, which won the University race of the year, to row them a four-oared race on the Thames. The invitation was accepted, not indeed by the University itself, but by a club within the University, which was able to turn out a crew probably quite as good; and the race, about which there had been many opinions even amongst the connoisseurs at Putney, ended in a very easy victory for the Oxford Four. At length, in 1876, when Joe Sadler, never one of our strongest champions, was manifestly in declining health, the match was made which resulted in first taking away the palm from the Thames and the Tyne. Trickett, of Sydney, then carried off the title of Champion Sculler of the World, which was next rowed for on the Parramatta river; and the subsequent matches in England could decide no more than what began to be called the Championship of England. For this inferior honour Boyd, Higgins, and Elliott contended, with varying success, for two years, until Canada put in an appearance, and at once rushed to the front with a brilliant victory. In June 1879 Elliott, who had now beaten his two English rivals, was defeated in an ignominious manner by Edward Hanlan, of Toronto. The new comer astounded every one, not only by rowing the course in shorter time than had yet been known, but by the extraordinary vigour of his style and the extreme ease with which he disposed of a man then supposed to be well worth backing against any one in the world. This victory of Hanlan was the forerunner of a series of others equally decisive. Trickett, who had retained his title against all comers in Australia, came over to meet the new prodigy on the Thames. He succumbed without giving the Canadian any trouble at all; and, in a match rowed shortly afterwards over the same course, Laycock, the second string of the Australians, fared rather worse than his fellow-colonist. The winter of 1880-81, which produced these two last races, also afforded the most humiliating proof possible of the decline of English professional sculling. A grand water tournament, historically known as the "Hop Bitters" Regatta, brought on to the course between Putney and Mortlake eight Englishmen, two Canadians (Hanlan not condescending to start), two Australians, and two men from the United States. In every one of the four heats into which the fourteen scullers were divided the Englishmen took the hindmost places. Not one of them beat a single one of their opponents; and the final heat showed Laycock of Sydney first, a Canadian second, an American third, and another Canadian fourth. Since then almost the only attempt made to retrieve our lost laurels has been the match between Bubear and Wallace Ross, which resulted in so disastrous a defeat for this country. That race disposes of our chance for many a day to come, and again condemns English professional sculling to a place in the international list far below Canada, Australia, and the United States. Those who attempt to console themselves for the loss of the championship by saying that it has gone to colonists of our own nationality forget that in the last general trial of merit all our best scullers were beat either by the American Hosmer himself, or by men whom the same Hosmer beat in a subsequent race.

For this extraordinary change in the relative position of English and foreign scullers many reasons have been assigned. It is, in the first place, hardly possible to deny that in point of mere physique we have lost ground as compared with the rest of the world. Evidences are not wanting to prove the superior bodily strength of the labouring class in the Colonies, which is both better bred and better fed than our own people, and also lives in a purer atmosphere, further removed than they are from the material and moral dinginess of the town. These reasons perhaps account sufficiently for the excellence of the colonists in any sport which they seriously take up. But it is also supposed, not altogether without good grounds, that English watermen are becoming not only relatively, but actually, worse than they were. The habit of spirit-drinking, now so long established amongst the working classes, has undoubtedly begun to have a serious effect upon their health and constitutions; and their custom of idling away nearly the half of every week is productive of a laziness prejudicial to all manly vigour. But the greatest evil of all from which English rowing has suffered is the lack of public encouragement. For several years past the watermen of the Thames have been dependent upon the chance munificence of public-spirited men for anything in the shape of a national regatta. The grand display of 1880, which has been already mentioned, was the result of an offer of no less than a thousand pounds presented by the Hop Bitters Company to be rowed for. Since that some well-known sportsmen have had the generosity to give handsome prizes to be rowed for by second and third-class professionals; but there has been nothing in the shape of a subscription regatta, as in the amateur world, and there have been no prizes at all worth mentioning for rowing as distinguished from sculling. Such a dearth of patronage might well be expected to cause a decline of interest amongst the class affected, and to hinder the most likely men from taking up the amusement of rowing as a business. It is not very flattering to our national good sense and good taste to find that, when so many thousands of pounds are annually offered for horse-racing, which so little promotes the strength or health of the people, it should have been found impossible to raise the very few hundreds necessary to give a first-rate regatta, such as was formerly held upon the Thames every year. The failure to keep up such regattas is often accounted for by saying that the men would not row fair; but this objection, even if it were well founded, is not one that has been, or need be, fatal to other sports. There is, moreover, little reason to believe that the chief prizes in the Old Thames regattas were at all commonly taken by other than the best crews entered. Probably the one thing which has most discredited professional rowing is the fact that betting-men—bookmakers, in fact—became mixed up with the races, and manipulated the matches so as to suit their own personal ends to the detriment of the public on the one hand and of the performers on the other. Minor causes also helped, such as the new practice of using steam-launches for the purpose of carrying umpires at Henley and elsewhere, instead of depending upon the services of paid crews; and, lastly, the wholesale decline of the waterman's trade, properly so called, by reason of the multiplication of bridges and steamers, which have made it no longer necessary to "hail a boat," according to the old-fashioned practice, whenever a person wishes to cross the river or to travel from one place on its banks to another. It must, however, be remembered that in its best days professional rowing had one great disadvantage as compared with amateur rowing. There were practically only two centres which had any esprit de corps of their own—London and Newcastle. The amateur clubs in a dozen different parts of the country had each an exclusive pride and ambition of their own; but there was no such healthy rivalry amongst the watermen of separate districts; no "clubs" worth speaking of; no local prizes from which outsiders were barred; nothing, in short, but the old-standing rivalry between North and South, which was not enough to keep up a lively competition and lead to renewed struggles for supremacy year after year between a number of good crews.

Very possibly it is this last-mentioned difference between amateur and professional rowing which has enabled the former to retain in this country so far a better position than the latter. It is true, no doubt, that when we speak of the high position of our amateur oarsmen as compared with those of other countries, we are talking rather without book. The definition of an amateur is more strict here than in other countries; and, although some latitude has hitherto been given to strangers, yet, on the other hand, crews which were allowed the name of amateurs in America have already been excluded from our regattas, and are likely to be still more often excluded in future. Still there are plenty of signs, later than that afforded by the four-oared race already mentioned, to show that our amateurs have not suffered the same loss of prestige as the watermen. There is the negative evidence supplied by the fact that foreigners so seldom enter for the big events at Henley; but we have also seen them fairly defeated, as in the sculling race at Henley last year, when a Frenchman and a German both entered, and the former was defeated still more easily than in former years, while the latter, although he won his trial heat, and also beat the Frenchman, stood no sort of chance against Mr. Lowndes, the winner. Races which have been rowed in other countries have not had so gratifying a result, but they cannot certainly be said to have proved any inferiority on the part of England. The analogy of cricket and other sports, moreover, besides professional rowing, seems to show that if there had been crews anywhere good enough to win the Grand Challenge Cup or the Diamond Sculls, they would have appeared at Henley to dispute those coveted trophies. However this may have been, undoubtedly an immense influence in keeping up the public interest in boat-racing has been exercised by the remarkable equality which has long existed between a number of rival clubs. Oxford has never got so far ahead of Cambridge as to make their meeting at Putney an uninteresting affair. The Grand Challenge Cup has never fallen so often to one or two or even three clubs as to discourage others from sending their representatives. The London Rowing Club, Leander, Thames, Kingston, all these are known every year to be pretty sure to send a formidable crew, and it is worth their while to train men hard for the event. The leading College boats at Oxford and Cambridge are almost equally sure to appear, and are encouraged by knowing that College crews have several times taken this chief prize of the year. In the multitude of competitors there is an assurance of excellence and a guarantee for hard practice and hard training; for oftentimes, as last year, the eight-oar which was thought least of by the connoisseurs has been known, with a little of the luck that is so powerful an agent at Henley, to make an example of far better-looking crews.

In these headquarters, the clubs and Colleges, rowing has accordingly been kept up with unabated zeal. Many changes have been introduced since the first University race was rowed in 1829, and since the amateur sculling championship was founded in the following year. The old tub boats have developed into very different-looking craft. Outriggers, sliding seats, self-acting row-locks, and steering sails, have all been successively added, with divers other refinements of the boat-builder's art; but the science of rowing remains after all essentially the same; and the same bodily shape and muscular conformation are still usually to be observed in the most successful oarsmen. If we could confine our attention solely to these great clubs and the two Universities, there would be little cause for finding fault with amateur rowing or sculling. Unfortunately the prospect is by no means so limited or so gratifying. The increasing taste for "boating," as it is very advisedly termed—that is to say, of going in a boat—has led to the formation of a host of third, fourth, and fifth-rate clubs, as well as to an enormous amount of rowing in hired boats by people who think they would like to learn the art all by themselves. Now rowing is, of all things, that which a man finds it most impossible to learn by himself. There is nothing, perhaps, in which unaided practice is so certain to make a man develop a bad style. If any person doubts this, let him look at the river Thames on a Saturday afternoon. From Teddington to Wandsworth it is covered with boats, which are being rowed and sculled by persons exhibiting every possible fault that an oarsman can commit. The round back, the bent arms, the hanging head, the wriggling body—these are only a few of the hideous distortions observable on every side. How are they to be accounted for? Simply by this—that the wretched creatures who indulge in them are too proud to take a lesson. Go and suggest to one of the tradesmen's clubs which is out for practice on a Saturday evening that one or two of its members would be all the better for a little coaching, and ten to one both those individuals themselves and the bulk of the club, if not even its captain, will feel insulted at any such suggestion. This sort of feeling is one which fortunately still exists only in the lower ranks of the aquatic world. But it is constantly liable to spread and infect the upper spheres, even as it infected the highest class of professional scullers, inspiring them with a bumptiousness which despised good advice, and prevented them from perfecting their style in proportion as new improvements were introduced into the boats they used. Such presumptuous vanity is particularly misplaced at a time when technical skill and education are requisite for excellence in sporting as well as other matters. It is to a very large extent responsible for the defeats we have suffered at the hands of the colonists, who are more modest, to begin with, have more perseverance in learning what they want to do, and, finally, enjoy a far better prospect of earning fame and public honour when they do credit to their native city or place.

LORD DALHOUSIE AS HENRY VIII.

IN these days of literalness and of scandal we cannot make too much haste to assure Lord Dalhousie that the parallel above indicated between him and the largest and most married of English kings means nothing offensive. We do not insinuate that Lord Dalhousie has had six wives, or has got rid of two of them in a sanguinary manner, or has indulged in any of the other enormities attributed by Hume, Mrs. Markham, Little Arthur's History of England, and other authorities to Mr. Froude's favourite. But as we all know on those same authorities that Henry sent about to consult universities and great scholars when he wanted to unmarry his dead brother's wife, so has Lord Dalhousie for two years past been sending about to consult universities and great scholars now that he wants (Heaven only knows why) to procure leave for other people to marry their dead wives' sisters. Part of the results of this correspondence were published by the active and well-subsidized society which exists for the purpose some two years ago, and Dr. Candlish, of Glasgow, disposed of them very satisfactorily then. They have now been republished, with a queer appendix of additional opinions, partly got from the Biblical Revisers of England and America, partly culled from the writings of Dr. Stanley, Dr. McCaul, and other persons in days long past. Sufficient unto the year is the bad literature thereof, at least of this kind; and we must not here pay much attention to the previously-published matter, though it is tempting. The ingenuity with which Professor Geddes, of Aberdeen (there are wide-awake people as well as cauld kail in Aberdeen), declines to commit himself on the subject, and the delightful certificate of a certain Dr. Naber, Professor of Greek Literature in the University of Amsterdam, which appears on the same page, contrast pleasantly. Professor Naber asserts that "there is nowhere any evidence in Scripture against your bringing forward the measure you propose to introduce to the Senate," and that "the various arguments adduced by your adversaries are totally inadequate to shake your position." That is something like a Greek Professor! But this field, though, as has been said, tempting, must be left to Dr. Candlish. The business of a periodical is to shoot flying, and not round the corners of the past.

The new matter which has resulted from Lord Dalhousie's (or some one else's) fresh appearance in the character of Henry VIII. (always with the limitations above made and provided), is, as we have said, extremely miscellaneous. The wise know what is meant by counsel's opinion, and would be surprised to find anything but a majority on the side of the consulting party. However, even among this number there seem to have been some whose answers the Marriage Law Reform Association would hardly have published if it had been wise. Dr. Ezra Abbot, of Cambridge, Mass., Dr. Angus of the Regent's Park (who displays his exact scholarly and logical faculties by answering the question of scriptural authority in the words "I have known many cases illustrating the cruelty of the present law"), Dr. Birrell of St. Andrew's, and so forth, declare themselves unhesitatingly on the side of Bottles. But when we come to Mr. T. K. Cheyne, whose authority as a Hebrew scholar is certainly as high as that of Dr. Angus of the Regent's Park, Mr. Cheyne is found pronouncing roundly that "the circumstances of the writers of the Bible being different, he does not see how we can appeal to their authority on either side." All these epistles are headed by recent and intelligible dates. But after hearing Chancellor Crosby of New York (he makes a lovely paralogism which it would unluckily take too long to expose), we come upon a blast from the wild horn of Benjn. Davies, LL.D., who in 1865 signified his "hearty sympathy with the objects of your Association, as seeking to remove a hateful monkish blot from our law of marriage." Monkish blot is good, but as Lord Dalhousie was, according to the Peerages, only eighteen in 1865, it is clear that we have got among new strata. A man surely does not send circular letters to burgomasters and great oneyers in languages and theology requesting permission to marry his deceased wife's sister when he is eighteen! Indeed these later opinions are a sufficiently perplexing medley. Dr. Gotch does not think the marriage should be prohibited by law; but, on the other hand, he does not think it in general desirable. When Professor Henry Green, of Princeton, N.J., says that "such marriages shock no one's sense of propriety," he says what may be true of Princeton, N.J., but what even the Marriage Law Reform Association will assert hardly to be true of England, so that he cannot be said to be good for much. Dr. Kennedy, of Cambridge, whose opinion seems to be regarded as of such value that it is given twice over on two different pages, chiefly refers us to the late Dr. Hook, but this scarcely seems conclusive. Dr. Stanley Leathes says that "there is nothing in the letter of Scripture which can be twisted into an explicit prohibition." Prof. Mead says that the arrangement works capitally in America, which, as we know on very good authority, it does not. Dean Merivale takes the ground (which is compatible with the strongest objection to such unions) that "the texts usually discussed have no reference to the present time." But perhaps the pluckiest thing here done is the publication of Cardinal Newman's opinion. That is, as is well known, that, if the interests of the lower classes are consulted, the law ought to be relaxed; if the interests of the educated classes are consulted, not so. For this odd and characteristic distinction the writer gives no reasons. But he is careful to say that this concerns the social question only, and that, in his opinion, there is "in favour of the law standing the danger of its repeal acting in the serious movement now making all over Christendom to relax the sanctity of marriage." Beyond this it is not necessary to go, though it may be observed that Canon Westcott, whom the Association, or Lord Dalhousie, or somebody else seems to have consulted so recently as last month, "cannot but feel that the early Church rightly expressed the spirit of scriptural teaching by forbidding marriage with a deceased wife's sister." After this the ruck of Americans, who naturally defend the existing law of their country; and of Dissenters, who sometimes avowedly and always pretty evidently object to the prohibition because it expresses the law of the Church they hate, do not seem to require much attention, though it may be freely confessed that they are in the majority. But what is noteworthy is that in almost all this argument the single text in Leviticus and not the general spirit of Biblical injunctions as to marriage, far less the great question to which Cardinal Newman briefly alludes, is handled. The far more important text as to the "one flesh" is practically left alone, or treated only in the spirit of idle flippancy with which a distinguished member of the House of Lords thought proper to treat it last year. No notice is taken of the well-known fact that, as far as literal prohibition is concerned, an argument for a marriage between father and daughter might be founded on Leviticus. It is on the supposed permission implied in the prohibition that the assailants of the law of marriage rely, and it is noteworthy that, in so relying, they do not so much as notice the argument (not flawless no doubt, but which as rough common-sense argument will always have great weight with common-sense people) that a prohibition to marry two persons at the same time when polygamy is permitted, implies a prohibition to marry them successively when polygamy is not permitted.

However, this is a digression. We fear that the result of this supplementary appearance of Lord Dalhousie, or of Mr. Paynter Allen, or of the canvassers of the Marriage Law Reform Association, or of whoever it is in the guise of seekers for the opinions of wise men, will not have any considerable effect, except on persons who have a mind to their sisters-in-law as Henry VIII. had to Anne Boleyn. Probably it is not Lord Dalhousie at all who makes this heterogeneous collection of letters dating from last month, undated expressions like Dean Stanley's "ecclesiastical rubbish" (by the way, did he think that deaneries came under that denomination?), the opinions of the great Dr. McCaul, delivered before Lord Dalhousie was born, and the twenty-year-old indignation of Benjn. Davies, LL.D., with monkish blots. Just at the present moment Lord Dalhousie seems to have modestly withdrawn from this particular scene. The deceased wife's sister craving for brothers-in-law does not address him in the famous lines:—

> Dalhousie of an old descent,
> My stoup, my pride, my ornament.

It is Mr. Broadhurst who is at this moment the stoup and ornament of the deceased wife's sister, Mr. Broadhurst who has Sir Pandarus of Troy become between her and her sighing brother-in-law (what will brothers-in-law have to be called when they are not brothers-in-law?). Mr. Broadhurst is going to move a motion or a resolution or something of the same kind which was so successful on another notorious occasion. The way has been smoothed by harrowing stories of deceased wives' sisters who have been married in the colonies and deserted in England. These stories a wise association would perhaps have kept in reserve, for they do not testify either to the stable attractions of deceased wives' sisters, or to the high-minded morality of the brother-in-law whom we are asked to relieve of disability for this particular indulgence. What may come of this none can say. Meanwhile the assailants of the law of marriage may obtain counsel's opinions from every so-called college of every minute sect in Christendom, and they may garnish them with the venerable extracts which have been kept standing forty years by the Association's printers. They may pass resolutions and lobby for majorities to their hearts' content. But there are some things that all their money and all their energies will not enable them to do. They will not overthrow the great consensus of the Christian Church on this point from the earliest time. They will not dissever the particular case they are busied on from the general case of marriages of affinity. They will not show that a relaxation of the marriage law can be anything but a curse to the world.

BARRISTERS AND SOLICITORS.

A GREAT number of ignorant people have been clamouring lately for the abolition of what they call the monopoly of the Bar, by which they mean the exclusive right of audience which barristers have in the highest courts of law. Next to an anomaly, there is nothing your Radical likes so much as a monopoly. Behold! here is a monopoly, let us sweep it away, is so fascinating a sequence, and appeals with such seductive force to persons properly permeated with the sentiments of freedom and equality, that the many people who seek destruction for its own sake are sometimes quite ready to obey the precept without stopping to consider whether the piece of information on which it is grounded is true or not. It may therefore not be inopportune to consider for a little what this alleged monopoly is not, what it is, and whether, whatever it is, it ought to be abolished. In the first place, it is not a monopoly. A monopoly is, strictly speaking, an exclusive right, acquired by favour or purchase, of selling goods of some particular kind. In the so-called monopoly of the Bar there is no sale of goods; there is no exclusive right, because any one can be a barrister who chooses; and the right is not acquired by favour or purchase, but by passing examinations. Waiving, however, this perhaps pedantic point, we may admit the existence of what may be inaccurately called a monopoly, not of the Bar, but of law. Since it is obviously to the advantage of the public that some limitation of the natural right, whereby any man is as good as any other, should be imposed in the matter of legal assistance, it has been found convenient to ordain that no one shall follow the profession of the law, either as advocate or as agent, who has not satisfied certain tests. The tests now in use are examinations, and the lapse of time which may be supposed to be devoted to professional study. Any one who has satisfied these tests may become a professional lawyer, and any one who acts as a professional lawyer without having satisfied them is liable to punishment. Thus it may be said by a loose analogy, likening the giving of legal advice and assistance to the sale of goods, that lawyers have a monopoly of law. This monopoly, however, it has not yet occurred to the aforesaid shallow-minded persons to complain of. The business of supplying law (we continue to make use of our halting simile) may be divided into two parts, for which it is convenient to have two men. These are the advocate and the agent; or, in English, the barrister and the solicitor. It is not found practicable, except in a very small way, to be both of these at the same time, partly for the reason that one must be a great deal in court, and the other must be a great deal out of court; but in some countries the distinction is only practical, and in some it is nominal as well. In England it is nominal as well as practical, and the fact that it is so is what the gentleman who tried so hard to spoil the Christmas holidays of many virtuous barristers by four columns of dreary twaddle in the Times calls the monopoly of the Bar.

The demand that solicitors should have equal rights of audience with barristers granted to them is made by two classes of people, of which the more noisy, and probably the larger, consists of people at large holding Radical views on all subjects, and therefore quite capable of being excited by the bogey of a monopoly which they have fashioned for themselves without taking the trouble to ascertain the facts of the case. The other class consists of solicitors who desire the change for personal reasons. It must not be supposed, however, that all solicitors take this view. On the contrary, among the men at the head of the profession a large majority is in favour of keeping things as they are. It is only natural that it should be so. Men who have succeeded in any pursuit are naturally tolerably well satisfied with existing conditions. Besides this, the position of a successful solicitor with a practice of a high class has some very attractive features. His business, besides being highly profitable, is more or less in the nature of property. He could if he liked sell it, and can and does make provision out of it for one or more sons. It is not, like the practice of a successful barrister, absolutely dependent on his own personal exertions. If he falls ill he is not harassed by the reflection that if he does not recover soon his means of livelihood will disappear. Besides these solid and comforting qualities, the solicitor such as we are describing occupies, or may occupy, a station in society good enough to content any man who is not prompted throughout life by the ambition of public distinction. Success of a notorious and public character is the one good thing in life which the solicitor must not hope to gain in the ordinary practice of his profession. But how many men there are who gladly forego their chances of such success for the sake of an assured and moderately dignified way of earning a livelihood! There are, however, a certain number of younger and less distinguished solicitors, who do clamour for, and hope to get, the abolition of all distinction between the two professions. What these gentlemen really want is to eat their cake and have somebody else's. They want to retain the comfortable security of their business as solicitors, and at the same time to have a chance of winning themselves glory in the comparatively perilous adventure of the Bar. Then if they found that the brilliant success which they so confidently anticipate did not attend their efforts, they would be able to fall back upon the obscure but trustworthy resources which they at present command. Now this is an unreasonable wish, and cannot be gratified; for if the solicitor whose heart burns within him for the Woolsack gets his way, and speaks with his tongue, his business as a solicitor will suffer for want of his attention, and if, to prevent this, he engages somebody to look after it while he is occupied with more lofty matters, he will find that this somebody will expect a share of the profits. It is like betting: the long odds are more profitable when you win, but you are more likely to win the short. If solicitors of this covetous nature are really ambitious, and really confident in themselves, it is now made perfectly easy for them to be called to the Bar, more especially as their connexion with their old firms can hardly fail to give them a start as soon as they are called. Many of them boldly plunge, and with brilliant results; but even if those who want to combine the advantages of long and short odds get their way, they will at best only get middling odds, which means middling profit when they win and a middling chance of winning.

Such being the reasons which really give rise to the agitation for removing the distinction between barristers and solicitors, it is not surprising to find that the ostensible reasons which are urged by the agitators are not of the most cogent nature. The principal one is that the amalgamation would diminish the cost of litigation. It is in the highest degree unlikely that it would do so to any appreciable extent. The work of advocacy must be done, and the work of agency must be done, and both must be paid for. They cannot practically be done by the same man, and the expense that would be saved by the two men being partners in the same business, instead of being only temporarily connected, is either nothing at all, or something so trifling as not to be worth legislating for. The lawyer who does the barrister's work must have his brief drawn, and his copies of documents prepared. The conveyancer must have his instructions put into some kind of shape, and the fact that he is himself the solicitor through whom he is instructed will not in the least diminish the necessity of somebody engrossing the deeds who has to be paid for doing it. The work of lawyers is worth what, in the presence of very keen competition, it will fetch, and the shifting of different parts of it on to different shoulders will not substantially diminish its total burden or reduce its total price. It is true, as has been pointed out, that a certain number of fees for "delivering briefs" and "attending counsel" would, or might, disappear; but those who suppose that a solicitor, because he was given the right of audience in the Supreme Court, would be unequal to the task of devising charges to replace such losses as these, knows little indeed of the ways of solicitors. Then it is urged that solicitors are often more thoroughly acquainted with the details of a case, and the wishes of their clients, than the counsel whom they instruct, and could perform the duties of counsel more satisfactorily than they are performed. The simple answer to this is that prolonged experience has shown it not to be true, and that the two functions are too distinct to be performed adequately by the same person. The existence of the two professions shows that this distinction was found practically convenient in England long ago; the fact that in America there invariably comes to be a distinction of persons between those who do the two sorts of work shows that it is so still. The final contention of the advocates of change is that solicitors are as good as barristers; that they know as much law, and are as virtuous, intelligent, and gentlemanlike; and that they ought not to be placed in an inferior position and held in lower esteem. Every one of these propositions we hold to be directly contrary to the facts. There are, of course, many solicitors who are excellent lawyers, and many barristers who are very bad ones; but to assert that, on the whole, an ordinary practising solicitor is likely to be as well qualified as an ordinary practising barrister to give an opinion on a question of pure law or to conduct a case before a judge or a jury is to make a claim on behalf of solicitors which every one in the least qualified by observation to form an opinion knows to be flagrantly absurd. And, though there are many solicitors than whom the country does not contain more upright and honourable persons, there are many others—and this would be notorious even if the constant activity of the Law Society did not testify to it—who are not only not honourable, but are exceedingly dishonest. Which could not be said of the Bar without exaggeration. Solicitors who feel that they are not quite gentlemen should seek to attain to that dignity individually. Amalgamating the professions would not do it for them. What it would do is to destroy the still considerable remains of esprit de corps which animates not only the best, but the largest, part of the British Bar, and, slightly perhaps, but certainly, to lower the prevailing standard of learning, intellect, and morality. That standard is now remarkably high, and it is of the greatest public importance that it should remain so. It is unnecessary to point out that whatever lowers the standard of the Bar also lowers that of the Bench; but it should be borne in mind that the efficient administration of justice depends in a great degree upon how the work of barristers is done. By making every solicitor a barrister, and every barrister a solicitor, the best and the worst men would be brought more or less into rivalry and contact, with the result that the possible amelioration of the worst would be dearly purchased by the certain deterioration of the best. The opponent of an unscrupulous antagonist cannot afford to be scrupulous, and if you bring men whose morality allows them to play tricks and take unworthy advantages into competition with men of higher principles, association with the former will inevitably corrupt the latter. It is not worth while to risk such a result for the sake of gratifying the social ambition of a certain number of second-class solicitors, and still less for the sake of appeasing the light-headed reformers who cannot resist that meaningless phrase, the monopoly of the Bar.

THE LONDON INQUISITION.

ON one day of last week sixty parents appeared before Mr. Bridges to meet summonses issued by the London School Board. The general public do not know what an amount of illegality is implied by this wholesale fashion of summoning people to the police-courts, and a plain statement of facts may do good. Each division of London is subdivided into a number of districts corresponding to the number of members elected to serve on the School Board. Thus Marylebone is marked out in seven subdivisions, each of which is under the charge of one member; and this member's duty is to hold at intervals a kind of secret court, in which cases relating to the attendance of children are investigated. Supposing that a child is irregular in attendance, then sooner or later the parent or guardian receives a notice directing him to appear at a given hour or place before "The Divisional Committee," to show cause why he should not be summoned and fined. Now, as a matter of fact, there is no such thing as a Divisional Committee. The phrase sounds large and impressive, but there is no sign of a fact to match it. Every man and woman who obeys the peremptory notice is privately interrogated by a single member of the School Board, in whose hands are placed powers which are foreign to all English notions of justice. The meetings are generally held in a private room of a Board School, and the scene is much the same in all parts of London. The crowd stand about on the stairs and wait their turns. Draggled women with babies at the breast lean against the walls or sit on the steps; rough workmen who are losing time straddle and spit, and use bad language; blowsy matrons of the drunken sort laugh and joke with shrill vulgarity. One after another the culprits are ushered into the private room by a decorous visitor, and men and women are subjected to questioning. Here is a list of pleasing queries taken down on the spot. "Carroll. Oh, another Irish Catholic. Now, Mrs. Carroll, how is it that your girl doesn't attend school? Be careful, mind. All you Irish Catholics lie, but I know you. Be careful." "Well, sir, the child suffers from a wakoness, sir." "Oh, weakness. Nonsense. Another Irish lie." Then the following stock set of inquiries followed:—"How much does your husband earn?" "Does he drink?" "Do you?" "How many children have you?" "One of them is over age. What does he earn?" Then, after a long time of badgering, the unfortunate parent was allowed to go away, and the presiding dignitary went on to the next case.

This is a specimen of what has occurred when a hard man was in charge of a district. The women who loiter in dull silence or drunken levity on the stairs may wait for three or four hours until their turn comes. The time usually chosen is midday, and thus many a labourer comes home to find his wife absent and his dinner unprepared, while many men lose a day's work and run the risk of losing their employment through having to travel a long distance and lounge about till their names are called. When twenty or thirty women of the lower class are called together, the scenes of shrewish violence are sometimes very unpleasant indeed, and exasperated viragos use the language of the alley with freedom. It must not be thought that many "Notice B" meetings are conducted by persons like the man of whose proceedings we have given a sample. On the contrary, nothing can be more admirable than the patience and gentleness shown by most of the Board members. Wealthy ladies and gentlemen spend wearisome hours in sifting cases of distress, in granting remission of school fees, and in choosing objects of charity. They might be engaged on their own business or pleasure, but they are content to work on obscurely amid depressing surroundings. They listen to stale hypocrisies, to impudent falsehoods, to angry abuse, and to heartrending stories of hardship and dire poverty, and they are kind and indulgent through it all. The amount expended in private charity by some members is very heavy, and the general tendency is toward helpful counsel and indulgence rather than toward harshness and threats. But, however good and wise a member of the Board may be, it is not right that powers so great should be entrusted to any man or woman. A parent may be summoned to a police-court; he may wait among ruffians and brawlers for several hours; he may be tried in two minutes and fined—and all this on the behest of one man or woman who presides over what is practically a secret tribunal, and who is irresponsible.

We must now turn to a darker and more disagreeable side of the subject. The members of the Board are undoubtedly overworked. If any one of the fifty chooses to do his duty thoroughly, he must give his whole time to the service of the Board; and this sacrifice is, of course, impossible in the case of business men. Thus it often happens that when a troop of parents are brought up to a "Notice B" meeting there is not even one member of the Board present to hear the cases, and unknown underlings fulfil the duty of judges in matters of the extremest delicacy. In every division there is an official called "The Clerk to the Divisional Committee, and Superintendent of Visitors." This clerk may have been an officer in the army, or a tradesman, or a private secretary to some one or other, or a rate collector; he may not have one tittle of legal training, yet he exercises judicial functions of a very important nature. Worse than this, it often turns out that even the Superintendent is absent; and instances have been known in which a clerk, (paid at the rate of 80*l.* a year) or a visitor has taken the chair, and sat with inquisitive majesty while parent after parent was brought in before him. Jack-in-office is always an unpleasant person, but Jack-in-office stuck in the place of a legal functionary is simply intolerable. It is true that the Board has authorized Superintendents of Visitors to hear cases, but not to order prosecutions; yet, in practice, this rule is constantly violated. Let it be observed that in thus delegating any of its functions the Board acts with gross and absolute illegality. The Act says:—"No legal proceedings for non-attendance or irregular attendance at school shall be commenced in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction by any person appointed to carry out the compulsory bye-laws of a School Board or local authority, except by the direction of not less than two members of a School Board or School Attendance Committee." The letter of the Act cannot be construed as meaning that two members shall investigate every case before a prosecution is ordered; but the spirit is sufficiently evident, and it is a pity that the whole of Clause 38 cannot be rigidly amended, so as to ensure that no British citizen shall be dragged to a police-court until the nature and extent of his offence have been investigated by a competent tribunal. The poor are ignorant of legal subtleties; but we are certain that, if any defendant were to demand the names of the Board members who ordered a prosecution, and were then to force the prosecuting officer to prove in court that the two members had really investigated the case, there would be far fewer convictions. As it is, the poor people are dragooned, and dragooned by beadles in mufti, and not by persons duly qualified to order prosecutions under the Act.

We have no wish to say anything sentimental about the treatment of the lower classes. The poor are often lazy, shiftless, thriftless, drunken, and false. But the fact that a man has every positive and negative vice named in the dictionary does not justify any one who twists a statute in order to punish him. His trial should be fair, and his punishment assured when his guilt is proven. Under the present system, the proceedings are so loose and haphazard that magistrates have grown sick of the whole business, and positively refuse to convict. People who would obey the law if they could are badgered and persecuted; while other people who have not the smallest intention of obeying the law are enabled to laugh at visitors, members, and police-courts. Unmerited hardship, and equally unmerited impunity, are the main results of a system which is at once grotesque and cruel.

Let us take two typical cases to illustrate the working of the Act in London. John Smith is a labourer who leaves home at five every morning, and returns about six every evening. John's son is a wild little fellow of ten years old, who manages to play truant for a week at a time. A visitor calls and sees Mrs. Smith while John is away. The visitor says, "You must make your boy attend school better, ma'am; I have to serve you with this notice," and he thereupon hands out a piece of paper which tells Mr. Smith to "Take Notice" that the young Smith has been absent. Mrs. Smith says nothing at the time, and in a week or two John is ordered to attend a meeting to show cause why he should not be summoned. Mrs. Smith dare not destroy the peremptory notice; there is an explanation and probably a quarrel, and John stays away from work one day in order to attend before "The Divisional Committee." The Superintendent inquires, "Well, and what have you to say for yourself?" whereupon John explains that he "didn't know the kid was playing the truant." A give-and-take discussion begins; John grows ill-tempered and receives a warning; he goes home, beats the boy, and then matters go on for awhile until the youth again forgets himself. In due time the inevitable summons arrives, and John Smith goes to the court. Perhaps, after he has waited from eleven o'clock to one, the magistrate discovers that no School Board cases can be taken that day; and the bevy of chattering women and swearing men are sent off home. At the second attempt John stands in the dock at last; the visitor formally states the case; and the magistrate inflicts a small fine amounting to half of Smith's day's wages.

The man is enraged, puzzled, and rebellious. His fine is not heavy, but the sense of restraint and indignity works in his mind; he is not improved in any way by the experience he has gone through, and, if by any chance the visitor passes through the street, poor Smith is more likely to growl a curse at "the bloomin' School Board" than to think of the blessings of education.

Take, now, the case of a more acute person. Thomas Brown has a son of twelve years old. This lad goes to work and earns four shillings a week, without having passed even the fourth of the Government standards. In time Notice B arrives, but Thomas pays no heed to it. Then comes the summons, on receipt of which Brown immediately sends the boy off to school. As soon as Thomas appears in the dock, he says, "Please, your worship, the boy is at school now." The magistrate is hurried by the crowd of cases; he snaps out, "Pay costs of the summons and go away," and Thomas is free. This mode of proceeding is lovingly termed "The Two Bob-and-go-away trick," and it may be repeated again and again, for the simple reason that the courts are crowded, and that the wholesale ordering of summonses produces a deadlock. Innocent John Smith suffers; wily Thomas Brown gets clear off on advantageous terms, and nobody in the world is a whit the better for all the confusion. At present the strange thing is that the compulsory bye-laws are administered with surprising kindness by most of the persons who carry them out. The School Board members who order prosecutions are generally gentle, long-suffering, and charitable; the visitors are usually thoughtful, although offensive instances of bumbledom have been charged to the corps; the magistrates are always compassionate. And yet the poor suffer under the Act, and suffer severely. The reason is that the law is applied in a haphazard way. If Notice B meetings were only held in the evenings, so that men would not lose time; if ladies and gentlemen were deputed to hear cases in every district; if paid officials were absolutely forbidden to hear cases; and if no order for a prosecution were signed except after full investigation; then the sufferings of the poor would be relieved. The present state of things is neither more nor less than a flagrant social scandal, and we wonder that the people have tamely submitted for so long.

CITY CHURCHES.

THE very influential deputation, headed by Lord Devon, which waited on the Lord Mayor a few days back to secure his influence for the preservation of three of the most recently threatened of the City churches, had a more powerful argument to urge against the contemplated vandalism than some of those who in former years have pleaded the same cause. The former defenders of the City churches have usually been met by the argument that the buildings where they stood were practically useless, while the endowments, set free from the grasp of "the dead hand," and augmented by the sale of the consecrated site for an exorbitant figure, would do much to relieve the spiritual destitution of the suburbs. There was no use blinking the fact that the churches were, practically speaking, empty on the Sundays. The bells, still as when Arthur Clennam listened to their dreary chiming from the window of the coffee-house on Ludgate Hill, exchanged their "deadly-lively importunity of 'Come to church, come to church' for the low-spirited complaint, 'They won't come; they won't come,'" and at last, abandoning hope, gave a dismal swing per second "as a groan of despair" at the obstinate refusal of the parishioners. That the City churches were not doing their work, at least on Sundays, was an undeniable fact. Hard-headed, keen-eyed, utilitarian Philistines were ready to prove it by their statistics. They had been round to the churches with their note-books on their unholy errand of espionage when they ought to have been saying their prayers in their own parish churches, and had reckoned up every worshipper, down to the youngest of the "Charitable Grinders," with his leather breeches and muffin cap, and the most crouching old charwoman, waiting her turn for the charity loaf. Not one escaped this inquisitive inspection. And the sum total, it must be confessed, was disheartening to those who felt the many and great dangers of playing into the hands of those who desired not more useful churches, but no churches at all.

What ground then, it will be asked, have the recent protesters for renewing the conflict? What fresh arguments could Lord Devon and his colleagues at the Mansion House add to those which had been urged so often already? Certainly in this case they could not plead the architectural beauty, or, except in one case, their historical associations. The three churches now doomed—St. Olave's, Jewry, St. Katherine Coleman, and St. Thomas in the Liberty of the Rolls—are among the least interesting of City churches. The last-named is a modern building, dating some forty years back, in the revived Norman of the day, neither better nor worse than a hundred other churches of its date. St. Katherine's, happily lurking behind the houses in Fenchurch Street, is a dowdy, burnt-brick conventicle, with a stumpy little tower at one end, and a semicircular sideboard recess for the altar at the other; internally a mere neat-ceiled room, without the slightest attempt at architectural design, an index of the utter deadness of all ecclesiastical feeling in the early years of the second George. Nor in either case do the historical associations compensate for the absence of beauty. St. Katherine Coleman—which one of our contemporaries strangely confuses with its neighbour the historic St. Katherine Creq Church, rebuilt and consecrated when Laud was Bishop of London, the ceremonies introduced by him on that occasion being among the counts of his indictment, and which others no less perversely place in Coleman Street—is utterly barren of historic reference. Stowe tells us it takes its name "of a great haw-yard or garden of old time called Coloman-Haw." Spared by the Great Fire, and so not rebuilt by Wren, it was unhappily rebuilt in the mean guise we have described in 1734. With St. Thomas's the case is slightly different. The name of "the Liberty of the Rolls" calls up many associations, from the time when Henry III. erected his "Domus Conversorum," or home of shelter and maintenance for converted Jews, in the "foul and noisy thoroughfare betwixt the Old and New Temple," known as Chancellus or Chancery Lane, which, when the Jews had been banished the realm and converts waxed few, his great-grandson Edward III. annexed to his newly-created office of "Custos Rotulorum," or Master of the Rolls, which, such is the irony of history, we have seen filled by a Jew, still unconverted. The memories of Butler, and still more recently of Brewer and Brookfield, it is almost needless to say do not belong to the threatened church, which is a modern foundation as well as a modern building, but to the adjacent Rolls Chapel, from the pulpit of which the famous "fifteen sermons" on Human Nature and Morals were delivered by the author of the Analogy. Greater historic interest is associated with the third of the churches in the doomed list, St. Olave's, Jewry. One-half of the name reminds us of the strange popularity of the martyred King of the Northmen, Olaf, who is commemorated in four London churches, including that in Tooley (St. Olave's) Street at the Surrey end of London Bridge, one of the predecessors of which the Norwegian monarch is accredited with having burnt. The other half takes us back to the time when the unbelievers, to aid whose more speedy conversion the Rolls House was originally founded, were a recognized contingent of the population of London as of all our ancient cities, living in a quarter by themselves "in Veteri Judaismo," "a source," as Mr. Loftie remarks in The History of London, "of regular revenue as well as an always ready scene for irregular exactions" as well as of popular violence, bloodshed, and judicial murder. The church itself is a work of Wren's. It may not be one of that great architect's happiest conceptions. But, like all Wren's designs, it is characterized by much dignity of design and harmony of proportion which raise it above the commonplace. The exterior, though plain, is well designed. The western tower is low, but of pleasing proportions, obelisks at the angles taking the place of pinnacles. The east front towards the Old Jewry has more architectural pretensions. There is a stateliness about its pediments and the large carefully-designed Venetian window, which the eminently prosaic street, no long time back the residence of the wealthy merchants of the city, could ill spare. When we add that it contains the monument of Alderman Boydell, the creator of the English school of engraving, who was buried within its walls, and that it was the place of interment of Robert Large, the famous mercer of Cheap, once Caxton's master before he exchanged silks and velvets for metal-types, of Thomas Morshead, surgeon to the three sovereigns of the House of Lancaster, and of Giles Dewes, Clerk of the Library to Henry VII., and schoolmaster for the French tongue to Prince Arthur and his sister, the Lady Mary; and that among its rectors is counted the brilliant "Scott of Hoxton," it must be acknowledged that none but reasons much stronger than any yet urged could justify the demolition of another of the few remaining churches of England's greatest architect, and the removal of another source of wholesome religious influence from the very busiest centre of City life.

That St. Olave's, in common with the other doomed churches, is capable of becoming such a source of influence, was the argument so powerfully employed by last week's deputation at the Mansion House. The attacks of the destructives were not easy to meet so long as the old idea of a church being only intended for use for an hour or two on Sunday ruled men's minds. Even this argument was based on a misconception. Active incumbents living among their own people have not been slow to discover that the city is not so absolutely deserted on Sundays as has been popularly believed, but that the materials of large congregations exist close to the church doors. As Canon Ingram has proved at St. Margaret's, Lothbury, and Mr. Benham more recently by his bright telling services at St. Edmund's, and, as we do not entertain any doubt, Canon Mason will soon show in his missionary work among the dock labourers and wharfingers of Thames Street and Tower Hill and the adjacent East End districts, in his revived collegiate church of All Hallows Barking, and Mr. Shuttleworth is already exhibiting in his crowded congregation at the other end of Thames Street among the warehousemen and clerks of Queen Victoria Street and the great business thoroughfares which surround his church—absorbing, so far has demolition gone, no fewer than six parish churches into itself—there is no longer any question that even on Sundays a man who knows how to adapt himself to his position, and suits his services and his sermons to the actual wants and feelings of the people, careless of his own ease or leisure, as well as of the supposed "dignity of the Church" of which she has been so nearly dying, will have, if not a full church—a rarity, we fear, anywhere, especially in morning, except in special cases—yet a congregation large enough to tax his energies to the utmost, and entirely to remove the disheartening sense of labour in vain. At one church—we purposely abstain from particularizing it—where the average morning congregation was four persons, since the change of incumbent the morning congregation fills the church, while in the evening the crowd is so great that there is no standing room. At another, where the services, we are told, are of the ordinary kind, with no special musical or oratorical attraction, the church is always full on Sundays. At a third the congregation, which was of the scantiest at the beginning of the present rector's incumbency two years ago, has gradually worked up, little by little, until it now as a rule fills the church, the people being almost entirely parishioners. At a fourth a lecturer, whose predecessor's congregation was usually limited to the clerk and sexton, has succeeded in getting together, and, what is more, keeping together, a good congregation.

Such facts as these are sufficient to prove the truth of the words of the Mansion House deputation, that if only the right men are appointed, men of energy, of zeal, and real devotion to their work, men who will live among the people and be their pastor all the week through, instead of driving down from the West End for their "Sunday duty," the City churches would once more attract regular congregations. The right man in the right place has proved the remedy for many apparently hopeless evils.

But the main argument for the maintenance of the remaining City churches lies in the self-evident though tardily recognised truth that the parish church is the parishioner's house of worship every day in the week, and not on Sundays only. If the Sunday population of the City is comparatively small, for Sundays in the week it is immense. These clerks and warehousemen and porters have each of them an immortal soul, for which the pastor in whose parish they pass the greater part of their lives must surely, if any one, be accountable. Slowly have our City incumbents awoke to the responsibility thus attaching to them. Many, indeed, are far from being awake to it yet. But wherever this self-evident truth has been realized, and the consequent duties faced, the results have been most encouraging. To take only one example, though happily they are many, and constantly growing. At St. Edmund's, in Lombard Street, the 1.15 services on week days are generally attended by at least a hundred, nearly all men, mostly clerks and young men of the age when the purifying and strengthening influences of religion are most needed. On special days, such as the Rogation Days and Holy Thursday, the church was crowded to the street door. The church is left open from ten to four, and whenever any one goes in he will notice some men kneeling in prayer, others sitting quietly reading the Holy Scriptures, copies of the Bible being wisely provided for every sitting in the church. Weekly Bible classes are well attended; while, as the surest test of the reality of the work, the communicants sometimes amount to seventy. Surely in such facts as these, which we repeat represent the experience of one City church only, there is a sufficient answer to those who so persistently assert the absolute uselessness of the City churches, and a convincing proof that, as has been well said, "Every church in the City might be used for the advancement of God's glory if only the clergy would bestir themselves." Where they do the result is always the same. As Mr. Shuttleworth, the Vicar of St. Nicholas, Cole Abbey, has said in his address of "A City Rector to his Friends," "Out of nearly three-quarters of a million of people there must be a large proportion to whom a short bright service on a week-day in a City church, or a daily Te Deum or anthem, or a meditation with organ music for its only voice, or a few minutes' address or opportunity for private prayer or undisturbed thought would be welcome." "Many a busy heart-weary City man would be thankful beyond measure if the doors of the City churches, like the gates of the City of Rest, were ever open continually that he might freely enter and spend his few spare moments in quiet or in prayer."

Before our great National Church, with her illustrious history, makes the humiliating confession that she can turn to no good service her noble heritage in the City churches, and begs the Legislature for power to demolish the houses of God, and transfer elsewhere their endowments, at least let an experiment of using them be fully tried. If it fails—and where wisely and patiently tried it never has failed—it will then be time enough to make the heritage over to other husbandmen in another place, who will know better its value and its capabilities.

THE NAVY.

It can hardly be said that the unfortunate Return respecting the strength of the navy which was issued last week has been the subject of much controversy, and, when the facts contained in it are considered, this certainly does not seem surprising. There is little use in continuing to argue with an adversary who has virtually capitulated, and as the Admiralty has been at some pains to show in the most brief and clear manner possible how weak we are in fighting ships, and especially in ironclads, critics are of necessity to a great extent silenced. Alarmists may cease from troubling when officials admit that they did well in sounding the alarm, and that there is excellent ground for the misgivings which they have expressed, and practically this is now admitted. Mr. Campbell Bannerman did indeed express surprise at the reception of the Return, and his word cannot be doubted; but it is difficult to suppose that his surprise was shared by any one else; and those who have, without any party bias, opposed the naval policy which has been pursued for years past may, without hesitation, point to the "Statement of the Fighting and the Sea-going Ships" as being substantially an admission that they were perfectly justified in their reiterated complaints. Of course, however, it is not a formal one. An official confession must be made in the official manner. Men who speak from Whitehall cannot be expected to say plainly that our navy is much weaker than it should be. But when the humorist who draws up a solemn report includes in his list one vessel which has never been to sea, another which has hardly been begun, and another which has never been trusted out of sight of land, it may fairly be said that generous antagonists can hardly ask for more. No doubt, it is not well to insist too much when, under cover of certain forms, an optimist view which has long been maintained is abandoned; but still it must be remembered that forms are misleading, and that there is a wonderful amount of superstition afloat respecting our power at sea. While, then, it would be most unfair to triumph over the Admiralty, which may have had an excellent object in publishing the Return, it is well to point out what is the real meaning of the evidence they now give, and to show that what purports to be a statement of naval strength is really a confession of naval weakness; unless, indeed, there is to be complete disregard of the constantly-increasing strength of foreign armaments.

Cogent criticism this remarkable statement of the present condition of our only safeguard against invasion did receive in the House of Commons from Sir J. Hay, who had small difficulty in showing how misleading it is, if taken seriously; but we cannot but think that the gallant Admiral treated the Return in rather too matter-of-fact a spirit. It is true that the "Abstract of both the Fighting and Sea-going Ships" gives a total of sixty-two armoured vessels; and it might at first sight be supposed that this is intended to indicate a really effective force. When, however, the list is examined in the light of a moderate knowledge of naval affairs, it is so clear that there is nothing like this effective force as to make it difficult to suppose that the Admiralty meant to attempt even the most superficial deception. One vessel on the list is, as has just been said, only just begun. Mr. Campbell Bannerman, in introducing the Estimates, spoke of the Hero, a projected turret-ship of 6,300 tons, as if she had been commenced; but as at best she is only to be advanced to 2·4 per cent. by the end of the present month, she belongs altogether to the phantom fleet. For the exactly opposite reason another vessel must also be included in this reserve. Of the Waterwitch, now seventeen years old, Mr. King said, in 1878, that she had never been trusted out of sight of land, that she was not fit for coastguard defence nor harbour service, and that probably the next step would be to break her up. This step was not taken, but surely this poor, rickety, turbine-wheel vessel, which had such a feeble life, must be looked upon as having been long defunct, and nothing but a feeling of pleasantry can have caused her name to appear amongst those of the armoured ships of the British Navy. To many other vessels in the list objection was justly made, as they cannot be considered fit to form part of an effective sea-going fleet. Amongst the sixty-two names appear those of the coast defence vessels Cyclops, Hecate, Hydra, and Gorgon, which are not even fit for coast service in the winter. To one of them alterations have been made with a view of improving her sea-going qualities, which may or may not prove successful. If it is found that the desired result is attained, the others will be altered, and at some future date they may be within certain limits sea-going vessels; but they can only be described as ships for harbour defence. The larger home-service vessels Glatton, and Hotspur, and the Prince Albert, with Captain Coles's cupola, must also be excluded from the sea-going class, and it would be absurd to include in it the Scorpion and Wyvern, which were built for the Southern States during the war, but seized and purchased by our Government. Equally absurd would it be to treat as effective armoured ships those obsolete plated gunboats the Vixen and Viper.

For other reasons several vessels of a different type must, as was clearly pointed out in the debate, be struck off the list if it is desired to ascertain what our naval strength in fighting and sea-going ironclads actually is. The Warrior, Black Prince, and Resistance are, in common with the redoubtable Watermitch, described with some humour as waiting for repair. As they are more than twenty years old, and as it is impossible to say how much work an old armoured ship may require until she is thoroughly opened up—impossible, indeed, sometimes to say whether she will be worth repairing—these vessels can no more be classed as forming part of an effective navy than invalids who may take long to recover, or may never recover at all, can be treated as part of the effective strength of a regiment. Beside these old and possibly worn-out ships there must be placed in the ineffective list ships which are not likely to be of use for some time because they are still far from complete. Strictly speaking, of course, no incomplete vessel should figure in the list of fighting-ships, but there is no need to be pedantic in this matter, and it may fairly be admitted that, in estimating the strength of foreign navies, vessels which are being built are usually included. Such Estimates, however, relate to future strength. In a statement meant to show the present strength, and the strength within a moderate time, of a navy, it is ridiculous to include ships which cannot be completed for sea until 1887 or 1888; and the Camperdown, Benbow, Anson, and Howe must, at all events, be launched before they can be put down as ships of war. Altogether, then, twenty vessels must, under any system of computation, be deducted from the effective list; and to their number should be added some which must before long need large repairs. Accepting these, however, accepting vessels which are practically obsolete, and disregarding the condition of boilers—a trifling matter, concerning which no information is to be given—we have, on the most liberal computation possible, forty-two ironclads to answer all needs—to protect important ports abroad, and to be ready for service at home. Of course it may be contended that this is enough, because France has not, at the present moment, quite so many; that practically there is no danger, because, for the time being, we, without an army, are somewhat superior in naval strength to a country which has a huge army, and is in many respects far less vulnerable than we are. It can, however, no longer be contended that the navy of this country is a match for the navies of any two foreign Powers. We have more than once insisted on the fact that England might be overmatched at sea by an alliance between France and Italy, and now at last the truth of what we have said seems to be realized. Sir J. Hay stated in his speech that in number of effective ironclads the French and Italian navies were now superior to ours, and the absence of all contradiction gave the best possible confirmation to his words and to the predictions which we have made.

The decline of our comparative naval strength seems, then, to be now admitted, and oft-repeated criticism is virtually ratified by the official return which has been published. Owing, not to any official incompetence, not to any misuse of the money which has been voted, but to the simple fact that the money voted has not been sufficient, our navy is now quite inadequate for the work which might be required of it in the event of a European war, and the statistics of the Admiralty, when properly examined, show this to be the case. This state of things may be allowed to continue, and indeed it is doubtful whether the general apathy will be dispelled; but, at all events, no excuse for it can be pleaded: On the whole it may be thought better to have a weak navy than to add to taxation, but there can be no doubt that the choice lies between danger and increased expenditure.

THE PROPOSED MONUMENT TO COLIGNY.

THIS is an age of reparations and rehabilitations in the historical domain. It has been argued that Nero was a model of filial piety and Henry VIII. of conjugal fidelity; Richard III., we have been assured, was deformed neither in body nor in character and was a most affectionate uncle; and Frederick the Great—one of the most accomplished tyrants and hypocrites the world has ever seen—was selected by a writer, who by many is still looked up to, as little, if at all, short of "a prophet new inspired," as the ideal of heroism and "reality." And as it is also an age of artistic revival, our historical palinodes or repairs of past neglect are apt to be translated into bronze or marble. Within recent years, to take but a few examples, we have erected a Scott memorial at Edinburgh, and the Germans a Luther monument at Worms; and we are now preparing to do honour to the immortal Samuel Pepys. Only last year the first steps were taken, certainly not at all too soon, for the erection of a monument to Grotius at Delft, and it has just been proposed—with far more questionable reason or fitness—to put up a monument at Frankfort to Schopenhauer, the chief modern apostle of pessimism, who conspicuously illustrated the worst features of his philosophy in his life. No such objection can be raised against the very natural proposal advocated the other day by two leading members of the French Protestant Church, at a meeting held in the Westminster College Hall, under the presidency of the Dean, to erect a monument in honour of Admiral Coligny at Paris. But we fail to understand why Englishmen should be asked to take part in what is mainly, if not exclusively, a matter of national interest for Frenchmen; neither indeed can we quite accept, even on the authority of Voltaire, the Dean's somewhat enthusiastic estimate of Coligny as, "if not the greatest of Frenchmen, one of the most illustrious of the sons of France," or M. Bessier's commendation of him as a martyr for "liberty of conscience" and bright example of "perfect self-devotion to the service of God." Dean Bradley was careful to disclaim any sectarian bias, yet it is difficult to see how, except as a demonstration of Protestant sympathy, any but his own countrymen can be asked to join in commemorating one whose only title to distinction beyond that of a national hero is that he was a leading Huguenot. And the names—neither very numerous nor very illustrious—of English attendants at the meeting seem to point in the same direction. Of course the massacre of St. Bartholomew was an event of European interest, and those whose knowledge of history, ancient and modern, does not go much further than a schoolboy recollection of Lord Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, and his hardly less popular Puritan and Huguenot ballads, must have, cursorily at least, > thought of Seine's empurpled flood

> And good Coligni's hoary hair all dabbled with his blood.

The musical echoes will still linger on their ear of the lament of the vanquished after "the Battle of Moncontour," who had to leave their "dear desolate home"

> To the serpent of Florence, the vulture of Spain,
> To the pride of Anjou, and the guile of Lorraine, which serpentine and other pleasing qualities were very remarkably exemplified in the St. Bartholomew. But still it is not obvious why Englishmen of any creed should particularly concern themselves, except in the way of abstract sympathy, with the erection of a monument to Coligny at Paris. However that is a matter which must be left to their own judgment and their own pockets to decide. Such assistance as the scheme may derive from a brief notice here of what is assuredly a memorable epoch, in a century exceptionally rich in eventful memories, we need not grudge it.

Mr. Lecky, who of course disapproves himself of religious persecution, but, like some other writers of his school, is always anxious to insist that it is the only consistent policy for those who have any positive beliefs to maintain, has selected as one of his proof-cases the massacre of St. Bartholomew. "France," he observes, "is still ostensibly, and was long in truth, the leading champion of Catholicity, but the essential Catholicity of France was mainly due to the massacre of St. Bartholomew and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes." On the contrary, it would be less of a paradox, though no doubt an exaggeration, to say that the widespread scepticism of modern France is mainly due to those causes. For the moment the plot succeeded, though even Catherine found herself obliged, almost immediately afterwards, to disavow her share in it; but, as Ranke, a higher authority than Mr. Lecky, very justly asks, "Can crimes of so bloody a dye be crowned with lasting success? Are they not at variance with the deeper mysteries of human events, and with those inviolable laws of nature which, even when not understood, are in constant though silent operation?" It is instructive to remember that the massacre of St. Bartholomew preceded by little above two centuries the no less horrible noyades of Carrier, and the enthronement of Reason, in the person of a naked prostitute, on the high altar of Notre Dame. But there is a further objection to Mr. Lecky's method of stating the case. The dragonnades of Louis and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes do afford an example of a genuine religious persecution, alike cruel and impolitic, and for the time it went far to extirpate from France the Protestant minority. But it was and always had been a very small minority among the people generally, though at one time including about a third of the aristocracy, and it was certainly not their expulsion which preserved, to use Mr. Lecky's phrase, "the essential Catholicity of France." The leading motive however was a religious one, Louis being at the time under the influence of his Jesuit directors. It is no excuse for the odious policy of Catherine de Medicis, but rather the reverse, that its inspiring motive was clearly not a religious but a political one; but it places the Huguenot massacre in a somewhat different category from the dragonnades of the next century, and a still less respectable one. Neither party, Catholic or Protestant, in the sixteenth century had the least idea, begging M. Bessier's pardon, of what we understand by "liberty of conscience," or felt the slightest scruple, when they got the upper hand, of inflicting on their rivals the persecution they naturally exclaimed against when their own turn came to suffer it. Mary's Protestant martyrs only "got as good as they gave," to put it bluntly; Cranmer had enforced on the boy King the burning of Anabaptists, and Latimer in the previous reign had preached a brutally jocose sermon while Prior Forest was being roasted to death suspended over a slow fire for denying Henry's spiritual supremacy. Coligny and his Huguenots, to cite Ranke's words, "gave no quarter," because "in the papal soldiers they beheld the army of Antichrist." But Catherine de Medicis, like her rival Elizabeth of England, was, consciously or unconsciously, a true disciple of Machiavelli, and for religious ends as such she cared nothing. As Mr. Froude puts it—and his testimony may be trusted here, for Catholicism is even more offensive to him than Catherine—"religion, in its good or in its bad sense, was equally a word without meaning to her." She had favoured the plan for the marriage of Anjou, and, when that fell through, of her third son, D'Alençon, with the heretic English Queen. When the crisis came, and her interests required the sacrifice of Coligny, who had already been wounded but not killed by the shot of a hired assassin of the Duke of Guise, she would apparently have been satisfied with his death only. But the feeble and frightened boy in whose name she misgoverned France dared not go so far without going further. It was he who cried out in a paroxysm of tears, when driven to desperation by the fierce insistence of his infamous mother:—"Since you will have the life of the Admiral, take it; but, at the same time, you must kill all the Huguenots in France, so that not one may survive to reproach me." Catherine declared that she only desired the death of six men and would charge her conscience—a tolerably elastic one—with no more; 50,000 actually perished. There is no need to repeat here the too familiar details of the hideous tale. But it must be noted that the whole North of Europe, Catholic as well as Protestant, including a large portion of the French Catholic nobility, protested against the ruffianly crime. Charles found it prudent on the same day to have letters written by his Secretaries of State signed by his own hand, representing the affair as a private quarrel between the partisans of Guise and Coligny, and despatches were sent soon afterwards to warn the Cardinal of Lorraine that he must cease to extol it as a glorious triumph. When the Pope sent a legate to congratulate Charles, he was coldly received by the Queen Mother, and the Court of Rome had the discretion to make no parade of the present sent it by some zealots among the assassins of the head of Coligny.

But for the part played in the business by the Popes of the day there is unfortunately nothing more to be said. It cannot be proved, as Ranke points out, that Pius V. was privy to the preparations for the massacre, "but he did things which leave no doubt that he, as well as his successor, would have sanctioned them." He had formally approved the butcheries of Alva in the Netherlands, and had privately encouraged plots for the murder of Elizabeth. But Pius had gone to his grave four months before the fatal day. His successor, Gregory XIII., best known to the world as the reformer of the Calendar, was an able and cultivated man, and is described in the Memoirs of Richelieu, with imperfect accuracy, as "prince doux et benin, meilleur homme que bon pape." He at all events did not leave doubtful his estimate of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. He celebrated the event by a solemn procession of thanksgiving to San Luigi, and by medals struck to commemorate it, where the Archangel is depicted presiding over "the slaughter of the Huguenots," and a picture of it was painted, which may still be seen at the Vatican. It is curious that the Venetians, who had no interest of any kind in the matter, should have expressed in official despatches to their minister at Rome their satisfaction at "the mark of God's favour." Cardinal Santorio, who was the Spanish favourite some years later, in the Conclave of 1592, and narrowly missed his election to the Papacy, has designated the event in his autobiography, still extant in MS., "the celebrated day of St. Bartholomew, most joyful to the Catholics." He tells us by the by, in this same autobiography, that the night after learning his failure of the election, which he had reckoned upon as certain, "was more painful than any moment I ever endured. The heavy grief of my soul and my inward anguish forced from me—incredible to say—a swine of blood."

On the whole it is impossible to exculpate the Court of Rome from full complicity at least after the fact. In the chief perpetrators the crime must be attributed rather to political Machiavellism of the worst kind than to religious bigotry. In the subordinate agents there was probably a mixture of political and religious fanaticism, as the Huguenots were always looked on as the unpatriotic, and therefore naturally became the unpopular, party in the country. And this of course helps to account for the acquiescence, if not approval, accorded by public opinion to the persecuting policy of Louis XIV. But some further explanation is needed for the peculiar atrocity of the transaction we are immediately concerned with, and it must be imputed partly to "the fool fury of the Seine," which has again and again since then deluged Paris with blood shed by her own citizens, partly to its Medicean authorship. That family concentrated in itself, as in a microcosm, the darkest corruptions of the moral side of the Renaissance, and it rejoiced them to revel in a carnival of lust and blood. Such little "grain of conscience" as they retained—and we have seen that Catherine could talk about her conscience—only served to "make them sour" towards heretics, whose Puritanism was offensive, and whose destruction might possibly prove acceptable to heaven as a makeweight against many pleasant sins. Charles IX. indeed is said to have suffered agonies of remorse on his death-bed, though he was really far less guilty than his wretched mother, but he had in his veins French as well as Italian blood. And to "the serpent of Florence" must be chiefly traced the original sin of the terrible tragedy of St. Bartholomew.

THE THEATRES—MARGERY'S LOVERS.

TRUE drollery is so rare a quality on the stage that Mr. Royce was ill spared from the Gaiety Theatre, and his return last Saturday was the more welcome because it had been little expected. Two years since a stroke of paralysis incapacitated the comedian who has done so much for the fortunes of the Gaiety, and it was feared that the chance of his reappearance was hopeless; but such predictions have fortunately been falsified. Mr. Royce has recovered much of his health and strength; his desire to return to his profession was strong upon him, and Mr. H. J. Byron's burlesque of Don Cæsar de Bazan was specially revived for the purpose of allowing the original Don José to resume his character. The fascination of the footlights is not to be resisted, and why this is so, the experience of Saturday went far to prove. Much kindness and friendly warmth of feeling pervade English audiences; that Mr. Royce would be cordially received was certain, but he could scarcely have anticipated the enthusiasm with which he was greeted. When the familiar figure in the broad-brimmed hat stalked upon the stage early in the burlesque, a round of cheers broke forth, and these signs of welcome were again and again renewed. It seemed as if the audience which filled the theatre would never have ceased to congratulate the favourite on what the programme particularized as his "partial recovery." Mr. Royce soon proved that the power of grotesque dancing had not left him, and he dived through a trap at the end of one scene with no lack of his former agility. His voice, both in speaking and in singing, was somewhat weak; but after so long an absence and so severe an illness this was natural. There seems every reason to hope that Mr. Royce is permanently restored to the stage, and if the rough and tumble fun of burlesque be too heavy a strain, he is so good an actor that other paths in which intelligence and dramatic aptitude are of more avail than physical activity will be open to him. A comedian of ability might be better placed than in a theatre where audiences receive with positive rapture such inanities as Miss Farren's song "I'll strike you with a feather," of which little is comprehensible, while that little is worse than merely senseless. What does duty for Sheridan's Critic is now pressed into service. To burlesque what was burlesque to start with is a sorry task. The Gaiety company by its preposterous exaggerations is completely successful in excluding all the fun from the piece. As here represented The Critic is a very tedious affair.

At Toole's Theatre Mr. Burnand's Paw Clawdian goes more brightly than ever. It is a return, and a more successful one than Sings Dora, to the true spirit of burlesque, burlesque as Talfourd and Planché imagined it. Mr. Toole's exquisite caricature of Mr. Wilson Barrett grows upon one; as does Miss Linden's humorous imitation of Miss Eastlake. Mr. E. D. Ward is vastly diverting as the hermit, and Mr. Shelton as the Tetrarch contrives to give a really funny parody of what is in itself a feeble caricature. The earthquake now works admirably, and is quite as impressive as the original earthquake at the Princess's.

There is something eccentric about the proceedings of a dramatist who energetically claims the paternity of an unsuccessful work. Apart from any question of success, however, a charge of plagiarism may reasonably annoy the author who knows that his piece, whatever it may be worth, is at least purely original. And Mr. Brander Matthews, the author of Margery's Lovers, which was recently produced at the Court, has issued a small pamphlet to prove that when he put his name to that comedy he did so because it was in every particular his own. For ourselves, we recognized considerable merit in the play. Its career was short, however, perhaps because the representation was inadequate in important particulars, perhaps because the management was hasty and timorous, or possibly for other reasons; and it would not be worth while to recur to the affair except for the fact that a vague and clumsy charge against the honour of a distinguished man of letters, who is a stranger to the country where his play was produced, needs refutation. Mr. Brander Matthews's pamphlet makes the task which courtesy suggests a very easy one. Mr. H. P. Stephens, who is known as a writer for the stage only by his crude imitation of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's comic operas, professes to have written a play called Hearts, from which he supposes that Mr. Brander Matthews, who has earned reputation as a writer on dramatic subjects, English and foreign, stole—plain speaking is best—his story, characters, and incidents. Mr. Stephens seems to show some reticence as to the date when his comedy Hearts saw such light as has been vouchsafed to it. The first traceable proof of the existence of Mr. Stephens's play comes from Mr. Augustin Daly, the manager of Daly's Theatre, New York. Writing on the 21st of February, 1884, Mr. Daly says, "it is scarcely two years since Mr. Stephens (one of the Billee Taylor authors), who was then on a visit to New York, sent me a play of his to read. My present recollection is that I examined the piece immediately, and returned it with my answer within thirty-six hours after its receipt." The play in question is understood to have been Hearts, and what Mr. Daly's answer was may be easily assumed. But two years previously to this Mr. Daly had read Margery's Lovers, then called Breakers Ahead. Corroborative evidence—were it needed—is furnished by a writer who in 1878 was collaborating with Mr. Brander Matthews and saw him daily. Speaking of Breakers Ahead, this gentleman, Mr. H. C. Bunner, says of his partner, "he talked with me about the play from its inception to its completion; we discussed its progress, and I knew of every emendation or modification of the original schemes, and was familiar with the plot, as first conceived and as finally perfected. If one man can properly say of another's work that it is original, I can and do make that affirmation in this case." Furthermore, Mr. Coghlan knew Margery's Lovers in June 1881. If Hearts does indeed bear a striking resemblance to the Court comedy, it can only be said, as was said by Mr. Puff with reference to himself and Shakspeare, that "two men hit upon the same idea." But Mr. Brander Matthews used it first.

CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

THE programme of the Crystal Palace Concert of last Saturday was one of very great interest. It opened with Mozart's Prague Symphony in D, and an extremely fine performance of this beautiful music was given. In these days Mozart's music is, as it were, crowded out between two schools, one of which professes to despise him on account of that which makes his great charm to most music-lovers, his intense power of melody, which they are pleased to call too sweet and cloying, whilst the various branches of the followers of the modern school are unable to see any merit in any composer except the particular master whom they choose to worship. We thus too rarely get an opportunity of getting the thorough musical repose and satisfaction which may be got more surely from Mozart's works than even from those of the greatest of all masters, Beethoven. Schumann's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra (Op. 54) was also played, with Mlle. Janotha as the pianiste. She also played Chopin's Nocturne in C sharp minor and Valse in A flat. The Concerto was, on the whole, a good performance, and Mlle. Janotha's exquisite touch even succeeded in producing pleasing sounds from the piano which is generally used at the Crystal Palace Concerts. For her solos she used an instrument by Bechstein; but, though her touch is as delicate and beautiful as ever, and though her manipulation has, of course, if anything, improved with time, both in the Concerto and in the pieces by Chopin we could not avoid feeling that there was some falling off in musical sentiment. Even in the Concerto, though here Mlle. Janotha must still feel the influence of Mme. Schumann, there was a slight coldness, and in the Chopin solos the artist seemed to be a little out of sympathy with her composer. The concert ended with an admirable performance of Rossini's William Tell overture—a performance reflecting great credit on Mr. Manns both as a bandmaster and a conductor. He may be congratulated on taking the "Ranz des Vaches" in the proper tempo and avoiding the practice which has grown of playing this movement so fast as completely to destroy its meaning. It might have been better had he shown the same moderation in the March movement, which, to our thinking, ought to be taken a trifle slower than it is by Mr. Manns.

At the present moment, when Mr. Dvorák's name is in every mouth and his music being performed at almost every important concert in London, the great interest of the concert centred in certain of his compositions—two orchestral pieces, performed for the first time in England, and two songs. The first of the orchestral pieces was a Notturno for strings (Op. 40). This is an example of the composer's own individual or national manner, and therefore is perhaps the more important as regards estimating his powers than even his "Stabat Mater" which we have so recently noticed. The main theme of this Notturno is extremely beautiful, full of character and individuality. It is treated in a scholarly way, and so as to bring out its full beauties. The piece is short; but perhaps the theme is rather more drawn out than the idea will quite bear. However, on the whole, this composition is so beautiful that we hesitate to point to even the smallest blemish in it. The second orchestral piece, Scherzo Capriccioso for orchestra (Op. 66), is even more peculiar than the Notturno. It is, indeed, peculiar to the verge of eccentricity. As is truly pointed out in the programme, it belongs to the class of musical rhapsodies. To describe it is almost impossible. It seems to be built on a waltz movement of great beauty, which is perpetually interrupted by the most extraordinary, weird, and almost comic passages, distributed freely amongst the different parts of the orchestra. We can, perhaps, give an idea of the character of this remarkable work by saying that it might well have been written as a piece of programme music with the title of "A Rustic Fête." The waltz movement might be taken here to represent the dancing of the young people in the market-square, and the interruptions as representing now the shouts and contortions of mountebanks, now the garrulity and laughter of the greybeards over their wine, and now the harsh calls of showmen. But, in spite of this eccentricity and almost incongruity, the work is beautiful, and stamps its composer as a man of strong individuality. Mr. Dvorák did not show to such advantage as a conductor on this occasion as he did when directing his "Stabat Mater." His beat was so uncertain, so often invisible from being made below his desk, and altogether so wanting in that fire and light and shade which his music so emphatically demands, that we feel sure that his compositions would have been heard to greater advantage had the batón been left in Mr. Manns's hands.

The songs "Mein Lied ertönt" and "Als die alte Mutter," which are Nos. 1 and 4 from the Gipsy songs (Op. 55), were both extremely pleasing, each of them being a flow of quiet, beautiful, unforced melody. Though perfectly original in thought and style, they may be best described by saying that they are conceived in much the same form as some of Gounod's best songs and the beautiful opening serenade in Goetz's Taming of the Shrew. The accompaniments were played by the composer himself, who showed considerable skill as an accompanyist, and were admirably sung by Mr. Winch, who is the fortunate possessor of a true tenor voice. He sings well, and his phrasing and expression show that he has a true musical mind. Mr. Winch was also heard in the Barcarole from Gounod's Polyeucte, in which, owing to nervousness, he was less successful. He showed a tendency to force his voice and end each breath with an audible gasp; but even with these faults the success which he achieved obviously restored him to full command over himself, and in Dvorák's songs both these defects had entirely disappeared.

The programme of Mlle. Janotha's Pianoforte Recital at St. James's Hall on Wednesday was highly interesting and varied, including three songs by Schumann, excellently interpreted by Herr von Zur Mühlen, and Beethoven's Sonata in C Minor for piano and violin (Op. 30, No. 2), in which the pianist was assisted by Herr Joachim. It is only natural that Schumann's compositions should occupy a prominent position on this occasion, and it is significant of the decay of the stupid prejudice which for so many years deprived the works of the great master of romance of the honour due to them. No one has done more than Mme. Schumann to correct public taste in this direction, and if there are people still unconvinced, we fear that even the brilliant rendering of the Kreisleriana by her pupil, Mlle. Janotha, would prove a vain appeal. Mlle. Janotha's performance of this fascinating work exhibited not only perfect technique, but complete mastery of its vast range of expression; the bizarre and fitful character of the various numbers, the quaint and changeful rhythm, the exuberant colour, the most delicate alternations of light and shade were rendered with faultless perception and exquisite subtlety. In the allegretto of Beethoven's Sonata in E minor (Op. 90) the pianist's beauty of touch and refined style were strikingly displayed. The other contributions comprised Chopin's Nocturne in C sharp minor and Barcarolle; a Romance in E flat minor, by Clara Schumann; and a Gavotte and Valse, by Janotha, in the execution of which Mlle. Janotha showed the versatility of an accomplished artist. The Barcarolle, in particular, was rendered with true sympathetic insight. The C minor Sonata was, of course, the chief attraction to a large audience, Herr Joachim's masterly interpretation eliciting rapturous applause. Mr. Zerbini was the accompanyist.

NITA'S FIRST.

AT the Novelty the strange adventures of a baby inspire the action of Mr. T. G. Warren's farcical comedy, Nita's First, and exemplify the magnitude to which one initial error may attain if not at first rightly apprehended. If Nita, clandestinely married to Will Frankleigh, had not treated her first-born very much as the man in the Arabian Nights' story treated his guest who was choked by an inhospitable fish-bone, the tissue of diverting events that sprang from her extraordinary conduct would never have overwhelmed her family with confusion. Inexperience, and the exigencies of the case, may certainly plead for her, and there is just that element of nature in her act which, in farce, justifies the most extravagant humours and the most grotesque situations. Impelled to precipitate action, she no more foresaw consequences than the reckless person in the old story who, having incontinently caused the death of his visitor, sought to escape responsibility by passing on the body to a neighbour; there is just sufficient extenuation of her conduct to make its probability, faint though it is, a clear and reasonable basis for the astonishing imbroglio that follows. In this Nita's First differs from many similar comedies; while in farcical broadth, ingenuity of construction, and vivacity of action it is excelled by none.

No mere outline of the action can convey a true notion of the spirit of merriment that animates the piece; it is too volatile in its nature to be caught, and to exist in any other medium than stage atmosphere. Its ingenious series of surprises, each accentuating the other through an extreme rapidity of development, can only be appreciated by representation. The art, however, by which every member of her family is gradually involved in the consequences of Nita's escapade merits recognition, and may be in some measure demonstrated; the cleverness with which the force of destiny is thus humorously illustrated is the chief, though not the most obvious, merit of the play. Returning home at dawn, Fred Fizzleton indulges in a brief sleep in the morning-room, and is disturbed by Jane, the servant, who enters with the shawl-enveloped parcel which contains the fruit of future discord, and places it on the table, with the information that it had been left at the house for her master. With surprise and horror he discovers the baby, and, hastily resolving to escape the dilemma, sets off down the street, not without the baby's crying reaching Mrs. Fizzleton's ears. In his absence his wife questions the prevaricating Jane, and her imperturbable schoolboy nephew Jim, in vain. The ensuing breakfast-scene is very amusing, and ends with Mrs. Fizzleton's determination to leave for ever the house of mystery. In the meantime, the unhappy babe is deposited by Fred in the hall of Miss Prim's house, with the inevitable result of much scandal. Fred learns the truth in a letter from his sister Nita, and, agonized by the discovery, bids Jim fly to rescue it. Henceforth, in what ways the baby wanders—how it is taken from the house of the maiden lady to the police-station, and from the police-station to the interior of an empty cab—Jim only knows, and suffers for his knowledge when interrogated by his distracted uncle. In the next act we are introduced to the elder Fizzleton, irascible by name and nature; and Mrs. Patience Fizzleton, a charming old lady, whose placidity continually exasperates her husband, and whose observations strikingly recall the naïveté of a well-known character in Frank Fairleigh. Nita is naturally anxious about the success of her scheme, and is speedily made a sharer in the contagious excitement by the arrival of Jim, who tells his miserable experience; and, shortly after, her husband enters, during the absence of the old folk, and declares his intention to announce the marriage and reclaim the baby. He, of course, ultimately learns the horrible truth; and the climax is reached when Fred, with the cabman, bursts into the room with the dread intelligence that the missing baby was supposed to be en route for Edinburgh, and more inaccessible than ever. This is too much for the overcharged feelings of the unhappy parents, who rush forward, divulge their marriage in the presence of the whole family, and proclaim the paternity of the little wanderer, amid voluble explanations and general prostration. In the last act a ray of comfort gleams across the stricken household; news such as consoled the owner of Mark Twain's white elephant arrives; the searchers are "on the track" of the baby, and every one is busy with Bradshaw and expectant of the desired moment. The entrance of Miss Prim, who is bent on extracting substantial damages for her injured fame, and the presence of a Mr. St. George, an inane youth who had been paying his addresses to Nita, further complicate the situation. From this point to the triumphal entry of the jubilant father with the babe in his arms the laughter provoked is so general and hearty that the play lapses at times into pantomime, though the final culmination is inferior to the ingenious and cleverly constructed finale of the second act.

Nita's First is excellently interpreted throughout, Mr. W. H. Denny's Irascible and Miss Fanny Robertson's original and piquant Mrs. Patience Fizzleton being particularly admirable. The schoolboy Jemmy is played with much force and stolid humour by Mr. T. W. Robertson; Miss Clara Jecks' Jane is a capital study of the servant girl, full of character, and never exaggerated; and Mr. T. G. Warren's Fred Fizzleton is very humorously conceived and energetically played. Miss Stella Brereton's Nita is natural and pleasing, and Miss Minnie Bell as Mrs. Fred Fizzleton, Mr. Kerr as Will Frankleigh, and Mr. E. W. Gardiner as St. George, are efficient in their parts. In the old and amusing little piece, The Bonnie Fishwife, which precedes Nita's First, Miss Minnie Bell fills two parts with much spirit and humour, and is well supported by Mr. Denny and Mr. Percival Slark.

THE ART GALLERIES.

THE regular exhibitions had a powerful competitor last week in the Potter collection which was on view at Messrs. Christie's. It consisted mainly of eleven great pictures by Mr. Briton Riviere, all of which fetched fair prices, though perhaps hardly so much as was expected. The average, however, was just under 1,000*l.* a piece—namely, 10,909*l.* 10*s.* The highest price was given for "Daniel in the Lions' Den," which was sold for 2,500 guineas. Two exquisite Mulreadys were strangely neglected. Pictures by this great artist are so rare that to see fine examples like these sold at such nominal prices as 105*l.* for the "Fathers" and 315*l.* for the "Surprise" was a disappointment, the more so as two very poor, not to say unpleasing, portraits by Mr. Millais fetched 1,470*l.* and 1,365*l.* each. On the whole, the result of all the sales of this season so far has been to show a fall which last season hardly led us to expect—a fall which should be taken into account by artists now engaged in estimating the value of their pictures in the forthcoming summer exhibitions. Mr. Cromptin Potter was a judicious buyer. He had early training in art, for his father was the chief promoter of the famous Manchester Exhibition of 1857; yet it may be doubted whether the sale of his gallery would show, if examined, that even the capital sum invested without interest had been realized. While works of art thus appear to be cheaper than they were, the production seems to increase. The number of exhibitions, public and private, is so numerous that a conscientious critic might spend all his time in going from one to another. With this activity, however, it cannot be said that much real progress is apparent. Nothing can be more disheartening than to go from a modern exhibition into the National Gallery, except perhaps to look at the copies made there by the artists who crowd the rooms every Thursday and Friday. A few good copies, perhaps four or five, may be seen, the best being of pictures of a kind no one would think of painting now as originals, such as the early Italian "gold grounds." But when we visit a gallery like that of the "Society of Lady Artists," and look in vain for evidence that all this study of old masters has any effect in improving public taste, we may well feel despondent as to the present state and future of English art. The dull dead level of mediocrity to which the lady artists sink is hardly relieved by a single picture which we can praise unreservedly. Even artists like Miss Clara Montalba and Mrs. Jopling, who really can paint pictures when they care to do so, are represented here by works wholly unworthy. Miss Helen Thornycroft sends nothing; Miss Ellen Partridge two figures of very moderate interest; Mrs. Naftel four or five sketches which call for no remark; in short, as we have hinted, even when good names occur in the Catalogue, pictures such as we might expect are not to be seen.

Taking the order of the Catalogue, Miss Marian Croft's "My Gipsy Queen" (79) is a delicate little water-colour, so delicate, in fact, as to verge on weakness. Mrs. Oliver's "Richmond Park" (95) may be praised for firm, if somewhat conventional, handling, but the foreground is too spotty. The background shows some of the best work in the gallery, if not the very best. "Young Egypt" (103), by Miss Cookesley, occupies a place of honour over the chimney-piece, a distinction to which we cannot consider it entitled. "Early Autumn" (106), by Miss Spiers, is small and neat, and might have been expanded into a good picture. Miss Kompson's "After Sunset, Loch Tarbert" (111), is a pretty water-colour, with considerable force and depth. "Chrysanthemums" (112), by Miss Hastie, is a little hard, but on the whole a fair flower-piece of a very ordinary kind. Miss Beresford's "Roman Leguminara" (118) is not up to the mark aimed at. A fine solid-looking rock and sea-piece, "On the Beach—St. Margaret's, Dover" (140), by Miss Wenham, is almost skied, but might repay a closer examination. Miss Kempson's illustration of Wordsworth's line, "The sleep that is among the lonely hills," may be compared with her "Loch Tarbert" mentioned above. "Trade on the Bosphorus" (176) is a pleasant, bright picture of a fruit-seller and two veiled women by Miss Mary Sharp, and looks like a study on the spot, which may account for a certain hardness so often seen in Oriental sketches, on account, perhaps, of the strong light. "Sailing at Sunset" (207) is one of a number of very similar water-colours by Miss Macaulay, representing the same yellow skies and tan sails. Of "Mist in the Meadows" (221), by Miss Deakin, it is not possible to say anything unfavourable, the little that is left of the landscape being well and softly painted. Miss Wratislaw sends several pictures of very various degrees of merit. Her figure subject, "A Nubian Beauty" (231), is very inferior to her architectural interiors, of which "St. George's Chapel, Windsor" (214), is the hardest and flattest, and "The Cathedral, Monreale, Sicily" (248), the most pleasing. "Samedi en Finisterre" (257) is the best work we have seen by Miss Helen Mabel Trevor—a Frenchwoman sweeping out a neat chamber, decked with all kinds of "properties." The painting is solid and the drawing correct, but there is a certain want of harmony in the colouring which goes far to spoil one of the few good figure paintings in the gallery. Another figure study is "From Damascus" (277), by Miss Merrick, which shows a familiar face, and looks as if it came from the school of the Royal Academy, as does "Iseult of Brittany" (291), by Miss Clow. Mrs. Schenk's "Sad Memories" (304) is of the same class. "A Swedish Landscape" (297) is by Miss Hilda Montalba, and represents a pleasant-looking girl in red walking through a very ragged wood, altogether a good, solidly-painted, and harmonious picture, but with a great deal too much "canvas to let." "Winter" (652, but wrongly numbered), and "Summer" (662) are by Miss Cook, and are very simple little flower pieces, set off by well and solidly-painted crockery. We have gone rather out of the way to find what we could praise, but the whole exhibition is extremely disappointing if we look at it as really representative of the state of art as practised by English ladies.

The ladies of a different profession have opened another exhibition—that, namely, at South Kensington, in the Royal School of Art-Needlework. A magnificent and widely-representative loan collection of ancient embroidery, chiefly ecclesiastical, has been gathered and admirably arranged. The Catalogue is a curious compilation, being not only incorrect, but needlessly long in some places and short in others. The first object mentioned is a cope of Florentine gold tissue, lent by Mr. Eyre of Stonyhurst, which is described as having been "made at Florence for Henry VII., along with numerous other ecclesiastical vestments, and doubtless used at the consecration of his chapel at Westminster." An extract from Henry's will is given which is believed to relate to the suit of which this was one. It would be curious to try how this cope would fit into the cope-chest still remaining in the triforium of Westminster Abbey. Little is known of the history of this magnificent piece of embroidery, but there can be small doubt of its identity. "It found its way to the English College at St. Omer, and was brought back to England at the time of the French Revolution—about 1794." It is ornamented with two twining stems, bearing red and white roses. The portcullis of Henry VII. is four times represented, as well as the mysterious "SS" mark and other significant badges. A chasuble (74A) is one of three said to have belonged to Westminster Abbey, and is lent by the Bishop of Southwark; it is composed of a patchwork of very old embroidery, some of it probably of the thirteenth century. Very conspicuous are a number of Hebrew embroideries, "Mantles," for keeping the scroll of the law. Some of them are lent by the South Kensington Museum, others by the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Bevis Marks, and by the Great Synagogue in Aldgate. They are all very handsome, some of them really magnificent, and chiefly dating from the end of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth century. An "Antependium" (36) is lent by the Dean and Chapter of Winchester Cathedral, and is embroidered with the arms of William of Wykeham. Its date is not certain, but it ornamented a pulpit of the time of Elizabeth or James I. in the chapel of New College, Oxford, and is probably of that period. An "Altar Frontal" (88A) is lent by the Rev. Thomas Miller, of Ridge Vicarage, near Barnet. It was presented to Ridge Church by Katharine, Lady Blount, in 1600. Another parochial possession of the kind is a Cope (94), which comes from East Langdon Rectory, near Dover. The Catalogue oracularly says of it:—"Originally it formed a Priest's Cope, but was subsequently cut to make a hanging for the pulpit, the pieces being used for a cushion, now completely destroyed." Some wonderful embroideries in gold, silver, coral and pearls, and much beautiful darned work and lace altar-cloths, must be passed by. A little picture on paper (131) looks like an illumination from a manuscript. It is a representation of the scene in the Garden of Gethsemane, and is lent by Mrs. Williamson. It is really an embroidery, "and, if held up to the light, the piercings of the needle can be seen, though both sides appear the same." A beautiful altar-frontal of Spanish work, gold on white (not in the Catalogue), is lent by the Countess Brownlow. A magnificent pair of cuttings from ancient vestments (160, 161) are lent by the Duke of Westminster. They are greatly spoilt by the bad taste of the mounting, which makes them into fire-screens. There are many other objects of great interest and beauty; but probably nothing in the Gallery is of greater value and importance than the fine series of five palls lent by the Vintners', the Merchant Taylors', the Fishmongers', and Ironmongers' Companies. That of the Vintners is well known as having been exhibited on several occasions, and is figured in the third volume of the Transactions of the London and Middlesex Archæological Society. It has figures of saints on the sides and ends, the centre being a magnificent piece of the so-called "pomegranate pattern." The arms of the Vintners' Company, and those of, probably, the donor. A long, but confusingly printed, appendix relates to the "Herse Cloth" lent by the Merchant Taylors' Company. It is described, as well as the others, and one belonging to the Brewers which is not here, in the second volume of the Catalogue of the famous exhibition of art and antiquity held in the hall of the Ironmongers' Company in 1861. A second, belonging to the same lenders, is embroidered with the scissors which used to be the Merchant Taylors' badge. The Fishmongers' Pall (178) is known to have been used for the funeral of Sir William Walworth in 1381. This interesting relic is beautifully ornamented with figures of saints and coats-of-arms. The Ironmongers' Pall is of the sixteenth century, and has the arms of the Company and the name of the donor, John Guyva, who presented it in 1505; but the date is, perhaps through the ignorance of the embroiderer, marked on it as 1515. Altogether, this is one of the most pleasing and interesting exhibitions which has been opened in London for many years.

THE INDIAN WHEAT TRADE.

THE problem how to develop the resources of India is at last attracting the attention of which it is eminently deserving. The Chambers of Commerce of Bombay and Calcutta, backed by those of the principal towns of this country, have long been urging the importance of the question upon the Government, and now it has been referred for consideration to a Committee of the House of Commons, whose inquiries, we trust, will lead to the adoption of practical measures. India is periodically liable to famines, because its people are so poor that the failure of a single harvest plunges them into dire distress; and because the means of communication are so defective that it is not easy to transfer the surplus food of one district to another where there is a deficiency. Government has endeavoured to cope with the evil by establishing great public works when the need for them arises, and by giving relief upon a vast scale; but it is evident that a permanent remedy can be found only by so increasing the prosperity of the country that there will be everywhere such an accumulation of wealth as will render famine as impossible in India as it is now in Western Europe. Although India is, in one sense, one of the poorest countries in the world, in another it is extremely rich—it is rich, that is, in undeveloped natural resources. Could those resources be developed employment would become more abundant; wages would rise; the margin out of which savings could be effected would be increased; wealth would accumulate, and after awhile the prosperity of the country would so greatly augment as to render drought a much less serious disaster. The Government would be relieved from the financial embarrassments that now harass it, since the people would be better able to pay their taxes, and each tax would be more productive. And this country would derive material benefit, inasmuch as from this country India receives the bulk of its imports, and, if its purchasing power were increased, it would buy more from us. If it is thus desirable to develop the resources of India generally, it is especially desirable to stimulate the wheat trade. At present we obtain our principal supplies of wheat from the United States and Russia; two countries with protective tariffs, which are eager enough to sell to us, but endeavour by every means in their power to contract their purchases from us. India, on the contrary, is a Free-trade country, which buys from us the greater part of its imports; and if, therefore, we were to transfer our custom largely from the United States and Russia to India, we should enable one of our best customers in turn to buy more largely from us. Moreover, India is a portion of the British Empire, and every addition to its strength is an addition to the strength of the Empire. Lastly, the development of the wheat trade would increase the value of land in India, would improve the condition of the peasantry, would raise wages, and, above all, would tend to accumulate surplus food which, in case of need, could be retained at home. From a telegram that appeared in the Times on Monday last we learn that inquiries instituted by the Indian Agricultural Department show that the area under wheat is about 26 million acres. This is about nine times the area under the crop in the United Kingdom; it is fully six times the area under it in Hungary, itself an important wheat-growing country; it is very nearly equal to the area under this grain in European Russia; and it is fully two-thirds of the area under the crop in the United States. India, it thus appears, ranks third amongst the nations of the world as a wheat grower, and the yield also is very considerable. It is estimated at from seven to seven-and-a-half millions of tons, or, roughly, about thirty-two millions of quarters. The Agricultural Department is of opinion that in good seasons about one-fourth of the whole yield would be available for export, assuming that the railway communications were improved. This would give an export of about eight millions of quarters, or about one-half our total import in a year. In other words, if the statistics of the Agricultural Department are trustworthy, India under favourable conditions would be able to supply us with half the wheat that we at present buy from all the world. It would be able, therefore, very largely to take the place of both America and Russia. We know of this report only from a telegraphic summary, and cannot judge therefore of the value of the evidence upon which the estimated surplus available for export is based. It is, however, higher than has hitherto generally been accepted. Unquestionably there has been an extraordinary growth in the wheat exports of late years, which seems to show that the ability of India to supply the European markets is very great. But it is to be recollected that the Indian peasantry are in the habit of storing up their wheat in pits, that they refuse to sell when the price falls below the customary figure, and that it is usually estimated that nearly three years' supply is thus held back waiting for a favourable opportunity to sell. If this be so, it is clear that for a few years an enormous export might be maintained. But it does not at all follow that the volume of the exports could be kept up when the old accumulations had been exhausted. However, the surplus available for export is a mere estimate, which can be tested only by experience, and we need not therefore dwell upon the subject. It is probable, indeed, that if a ready market were afforded, the area under cultivation would be greatly extended. It is certain that there is a great extent of land now uncultivated or under other crops which might be applied to the growing of wheat. But in the opinion of many who are well acquainted with the country, the production of wheat cannot be considerably increased without trenching upon the growth of the food required by the natives, or without such an increase in the cost of production as would check export. This, again, is a question that can be decided only by actual experience.

The Indian wheat trade was called into existence by the opening of the Suez Canal and the depreciation of silver. In 1874 the total export was no more than 33,080 tons; in 1882 it had risen to 417,954 tons, and last year it exceeded 1,100,000 tons. Now that the Suez Canal dues are to be considerably reduced, a further impetus will doubtless be given to the trade. But it is to be recollected that, if the trade becomes really great, it will tend to raise the value of silver. At present the depreciation in silver is about fifteen per cent. The gold price obtained in London for wheat, therefore, when turned into silver, is really fifteen per cent. higher than it seems to be, and, consequently, the depreciation in silver greatly aids the Indian wheat trade. Still further has the trade been stimulated by the construction of railways. one-twelfth of the mileage of the United States, while the area of India is about half that of the United States. For every six miles of railway in the United States, therefore, there is only about one in India; and it is evident under these circumstances that India does not compete with the United States on equal terms. Consequently, it is urged by all who are interested in the trade that the construction of railways should be greatly accelerated. The Chamber of Commerce of Bombay has put forward a scheme which is totally impracticable, which would increase the debt of India too rapidly, which would draw too largely upon the London money market, and which would burden the Indian taxpayers too heavily. It may be put aside, therefore, without discussion. The Chamber of Commerce of Calcutta has urged in more general terms a more moderate scheme, and Sir James Caird, in his evidence before the Parliamentary Committee last Tuesday, recommended that about six millions a year should be expended on the construction of railways in India. Unfortunately, India itself is without such an accumulation of wealth as would enable a large construction of railways by native capital, while the natives themselves are apparently unfit for engaging in the work. Private enterprise in Europe, too, is little willing to embark in this kind of venture. On a small scale, private railways are being built without a Government guarantee; but if railways are to be pushed forward at the rate that is desired, it seems clear that they must be built by the Government, or the Government must be prepared to give a guarantee. That it need not guarantee five per cent. is highly probable; perhaps a guarantee of three per cent. would suffice. But some guarantee is necessary if there is to be a great and rapid extension of railways, unless the Government itself undertakes the task. The question then arises, whether there is such a prospect of developing the wheat trade as would justify the Government in doubling or trebling its present outlay upon railways or burdening itself with guarantees? At present it engages in railway-building chiefly as a precaution against famine; but, if it is to yield to the new demand, it must satisfy itself that the railways will pay commercially. The inquiries of the Agricultural Department referred to above show that there is a vast area under wheat already, and that there is a large surplus; but as this area was cultivated before the export trade had attained considerable proportions, it seems to follow that the wheat must have been raised for home consumption, and consequently that, if the export trade is to become permanently important, the price must be raised considerably. If so, is there any probability that India can successfully compete with the United States? In other words, can wheat be grown in India so much more cheaply than in the United States that the native demand can be fully supplied and a considerable export to Europe maintained, while bearing the cost of a voyage so much longer than that to America? Upon this point the evidence is very conflicting. The best Indian wheat—that which is in most demand in the London market and which commands the highest price—is grown in Northern India; and, according to the Agricultural Department, the cost of producing it is about 12*s.* per quarter. If this be so, undoubtedly India can compete with America, for the American cost of production is considerably higher. But we should like to know how the estimate of the Agricultural Department has been arrived at. Usually the peasant obtains his seed from the village money-lender, paying interest for the advance at the rate of about twenty-five per cent. per annum. When the time comes round he has to sell a portion of the crop to pay his rent, and he must sell at whatever price can be obtained. Has the Agricultural Department based its estimate upon the selling price at the time the rent is paid? or has it taken the price in some out-of-the-way market where railways do not yet penetrate? If so, the estimate is worth little. If, on the contrary, the estimate is based upon the average price at a sufficient number of considerable markets all over Northern India throughout a series of years, it fairly represents the present cost of production. Doubtless, if the export trade were to assume large proportions, other land of a worse quality would be brought under cultivation, and the cost of production would increase. But still, if the average cost of producing wheat in Northern India now is only 12*s.* a quarter, it seems clear that a very large trade can be maintained.

The Chamber of Commerce of Bombay, besides calling for a great extension of railways, is demanding that the existing Companies should reduce their rates. It is doubtful whether much can be done in that way. It is obviously to the interest of the Companies themselves to encourage a trade which would add largely to their earnings, and they may be trusted to do what they can towards that end. But it is to be borne in mind that the Government guarantees the Companies a minimum interest, and if that interest is not earned the charge falls upon the taxpayers. It would be very questionable policy, indeed, to encourage the wheat trade at the expense of the poor taxpayers of India. Now, it seems to be beyond question that the existing rates for the carriage of wheat hardly pay; in other words, if all the goods carried by the Railway Companies were conveyed at the same rates as wheat is, there would be little or no profit to the Companies. The Companies charge low for wheat, and compensate themselves by charging high for more valuable commodities. The real difficulty appears to be, not the railway charges, but the extortionate usury of the money-lenders. For example, in Northern India, where, we are told by the Agricultural Department, the cost of production is only 12*s.* a quarter, the market price in several important towns is 22*s.* The peasant who raises the crop money-lender. As already stated, he advances the seed to the peasants at about 25 per cent. interest, and it is he who collects the grain and stores it. As long as the crop is raised in this manner, it is difficult to see how local prices can be brought down. If a system of land banks could be established, the rate of interest would be at once reduced, and the profits made by the peasants would be proportionately increased; while with additional prosperity they would doubtless be enabled to adopt better systems of cultivation and to raise their own standard of living. All this, however, is a question of time; but it is a question all the same that eminently deserves study. The charges of the middlemen appear to be overweighting the trade at present, and until they are legitimately reduced it is not probable that the trade will be greatly increased.

REVIEWS.

THE DUKE OF BERWICK.*

SEVEN years ago (November 4, 1876), when reviewing Colonel Wilson's earlier volume bearing the title of James II. and the Duke of Berwick, we expressed surprise that he should have broken off his memoir of so renowned a commander precisely at the point where its interest as a record of important military achievements would have begun. Before the death of his royal father and the outbreak of the war of the Spanish Succession, Berwick's public career, though it had already earned for him a considerable reputation as a general, which his personal loyalty and integrity had enhanced, was after all to be summed up as a long series of unfortunate experiences. In the Hungarian campaigns of 1686 and 1687, with which his service under arms began, he was at first only a volunteer, and then a subordinate. The rapidity of his father's downfall, hastened very probably by his uncle's very potent instinct of self-preservation, prevented the young Duke at the critical moment from striking a blow for the maintenance of the Stuart throne; nor could he render any service to the cruelly disenchanted King beyond accompanying him in his final flight. It was Berwick who sat faithfully by his father's side, penned up in the small cabin of the Harwich, during the arduous and perilous Christmas voyage which bore them into a common exile. Soon afterwards in Ireland the Duke showed strategical ability in the operations designed to prevent the advance of Schomberg upon Dublin; but he was unable either to avert the disaster of the Boyne, where he led the cavalry on the right wing, or, after being appointed to the command-in-chief of the Irish forces, to arrest the further progress of the English arms. During the remainder of his father's life he served in the Low Countries at the head, first of Irish soldiery, and afterwards of a French regiment of his own. But he had no opportunity of very specially distinguishing himself, and at Neerwinden (Landen), where he had been heard urging a body of two hundred volunteers to an attack upon the person of King William himself, he was even unfortunate enough to be taken prisoner by his uncle, Brigadier Churchill. Three years afterwards, in 1696, occurred his secret mission to London, when he was charged with the task of inducing the Jacobites to rise before the landing of the French expedition, and then of placing himself at their head. As is well known, this mission proved a failure, and something worse than a failure. It is very well for Colonel Wilson, in a footnote in his present work referring to a passage in its predecessor, to contrast with Berwick's generosity in absolving Stair from any intention to procure the assassination of the Old Chevalier the readiness of Berwick's opponents to accuse him of conspiring to murder William III. We fear that the Duke's own memoirs convict him unmistakably of a clear insight into Barclay's designs; a conclusion in which we are at one, not only with Macaulay, but even with a Catholic historian such as Onno Klopp. This solitary blot will not easily be washed away from the fair scutcheon of Berwick's fame. His journey to Rome, undertaken in 1701, with the purpose of persuading Pope Clement XI. to support the Bourbon cause in Spain, was likewise unsuccessful; nor was it till the middle of the War of the Spanish Succession that the Pope's neutrality, benevolent as towards France, ended with a little war waged on his own account against the Emperor.

The second, and far more brilliant, part of Berwick's public career, which Colonel Wilson has undertaken to narrate in the volume now before us, was begun by him still in a subordinate capacity. We may here observe at once that the biographer (if so modest a term will suit his humour) leaves the reader, as best he may with the help of an index, to disentangle the narrative of the Duke's campaigns and other doings from that of other more or less contemporaneous transactions. In the case of his services in the campaign of 1703 under Villeroy, Colonel Wilson may be right in suggesting that the sagacity of Berwick had some part in the contrivance of the French movements, which, together with the slowness of the States-General and the undue haste of one of their commanders, almost completely disappointed the hopes of Marlborough. But it was not till after the close of this campaign that Berwick's opportunity at last arrived. In November 1703 he was appointed to the command of the French army corps destined to support the cause of Philip V. in Spain; and, feeling his foot at last upon the ladder which might speedily raise him to the marshalate, he obtained the permission of the "King" at St. Germain to be naturalized as a Frenchman. Colonel Wilson protests against the insinuation of St.-Simon that Berwick owed his appointment indirectly to that redoubtable intrigner Mme. des Ursins; and certainly the indifference (to say the least) which he showed to the question of her ascendency in Spain—an indifference which afterwards brought about his own recall—is not easily reconcilable with any such assumption. Soon after his arrival at Madrid, in 1704, he was appointed Captain-General of all King Philip's forces; and, though his strength was unequal to that of the Anglo-Portuguese forces, he contrived by a bold substitution of the offensive for the defensive to push them back across the frontier. The Golden Fleece rewarded his success; but, to the astonishment of Louis XIV., female influence induced Philip before the year was out to part with his preserver.

Berwick, though an honourable and high-minded man, was a soldier first and above all, and on more than one occasion in his military life addressed himself without hesitation to the execution of tasks against which it might à priori be supposed that he would have felt a natural repugnance. There is no reason to suppose that such had been the case in 1696, when, as Montesquieu puts it, he had undertaken a strange kind of commission, of which the object was to induce persons to act against common sense. At the end of the War of the Spanish Succession he was employed to suppress the heroic resistance of the Catalans, with whom, as a brave man, he can hardly have failed in some measure to sympathize. On the other hand, when, in 1705, he was appointed to the command in Languedoc, and had, in the first instance, to stamp out the remains of the revolt of the Camisards, he seems to have regarded the work as both righteous and necessary. His strictly Catholic training may have had something to do with this feeling; but he evidently looked upon the Camisards as savages, deserving nothing short of what, mutatis mutandis, William III. and the Master of Stair would have called extirpation. He tells us in his Memoirs that, "by means of executions, tranquillity was restored in the course of a single month"—a passage which naturally reminds an historian of the Camisards (Bonnemère) of the famous Tacitean "solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant." Yet he does not seem to have been altogether without bowels. Curiously enough, the memory of the fearful struggle in the Cevennes was not long afterwards revived on the occasion of Berwick's most brilliant military success. At Almanza the Huguenot regiment raised by Cavalier in the Netherlands was opposed to a French Catholic regiment; and so savage was the fight between them, conducted entirely at the point of the bayonet, that, writes Colonel Wilson, "Out of 1,200 contending men, not more than 300 escaped unhurt . . . Voltaire relates that the Duke of Berwick, familiar as he was with the horrors of war, never spoke of the incident without emotion."

Before Berwick had been again invested with the command in Spain, his capture of Nice in January 1706 had obtained for him the desired marshal's bâton. When, in the following February, he found himself once more at Madrid, he was confronted by difficulties of all kinds; and the greater part of the year during which the Anglo-Portuguese entered the capital, and which, in point of fact, marks the highest tide in the achievements of the Grand Alliance, brought to him nothing but bitterness and vexation. Berwick himself attributes the recovery of the Bourbon cause out of the desperate condition into which it had fallen to the gross errors committed by the generals, together with the matchless fidelity of the Castilians; but Colonel Wilson's narrative makes it clear that, without the resource and patience of the Marshal, the allied generals might have quarrelled, and the Castilians might have displayed their fierce enthusiasm, in vain. The great battle of Almanza, in April 170-, justified to the full the previous tactics of Berwick, which cannot perhaps be precisely called conciliatory, but which had enabled him to form an army which he could at last lead to decisive victory. Philip V. was now really King of Spain, and a shower of royal rewards descended upon the great commander, such as even Berwick's uncle might have looked upon without disdain. The Marshal was himself too good a family man to contemn either honours or income; but the scheme which he afterwards developed of leaving to his eldest three sons three peerages of the highest rank in England, France, and Spain respectively had to be curtailed after the prospect of a restoration in the first of these countries had virtually passed away. Hence his eldest son, the Marquis of Tynemouth, actually succeeded to the Spanish grandeeship, and as Duke de Liria took possession of the estates which had been granted to his father after the battle of Almanza. His second son was to have inherited what Colonel Wilson severely calls "the barbarous and shameful title of Fitzjames"; but, as he died childless, and the next two brothers were ecclesiastics, it went to the fifth son (the fourth by the Duke's second marriage), who became a Marshal of France like his father. Colonel Wilson states that the Château de Fitzjames in the Beauvoisis was alienated only two years ago by the present holder of the French title.

Berwick conducted many campaigns after that to which he owed so large a part of his reputation and his wealth; altogether, says Colonel Wilson, he boasted twenty-nine campaigns, in fifteen of which he led armies.

Nevertheless, strange as it may seem, he was present only in six battles, in one of which—Almanza—he commanded in chief. Averse from mortal arbitrament, he used to say that a general should never deliver a pitched battle, the result of which is always uncertain, unless nothing else remained to be done. The purpose of a campaign, of a war, perhaps the existence of the State, should not be staked when the object might be attained by wise dispositions and skilful manœuvring.

Villars said of his brother-Marshal, that among his many talents he perfectly understood the art "de fermer bien un pays"; and Montesquieu reported a saying of Berwick himself, that he had all his life desired the duty of defending a first-class fortress. Never was his ability in maintaining the defensive better illustrated than in 1709, when he held the chief command in Dauphiny—at a time when France would have been lost, had her King and her people, as well they might have done, despaired of the commonwealth. Berwick's system of defence, which extended along a frontier stretching from the Lake of Geneva to the Riviera, with Briançon in Dauphiny as a slightly protruding centre, proved completely successful, so that in the next year he could spare for service elsewhere nearly a quarter of his forces. In his campaign, already mentioned, against the valiant Catalans in 1713, he once more assumed the offensive; and the capture of Barcelona at last made Philip V. master of the whole of Spain. Strangely enough his next campaign, in 1719, was conducted against the prince whom he had established on the Spanish throne. Yet neither his sword nor his counsel was at the back and call of every occasion; he declined to serve on the Council of War of the Regent Orléans, having believed himself entitled to a seat on the Council of Regency; and at the risk of losing the confidence of "James III.," he declined to go to Scotland to head the army there in 1715, on the ground that as a naturalized Frenchman and an officer of the French crown he could not leave the country against its will. After his return from Spain, where the war had been no doubt instinctively carried on by him with less than his usual vigour, he served in several important provincial governments—in Provence combating an enemy more terrible than in Spain, the plague, against which he was not contented with half measures. (The statue of the good Bishop Belsunce, whose efforts had preceded the Marshal's, will be remembered by every visitor to Marseilles.) In 1733, when the War of the Polish Succession, which of itself would suffice to point many a speech in support of the principle of non-intervention, broke out, Berwick was speedily sent to the Rhine. But little was done till the following year, in the course of which the Marshal invested the much-contested fortress of Philipsburg. The siege was in progress, when, on the 12th of June, 1734, Berwick was killed by a cannon-ball while inspecting the trenches in the company of his son the Duke de Fitzjames. Marshal Villars, who was very shortly to follow his comrade and fellow-townsman (both were born at Moulins), exclaimed on hearing of the circumstances of his death:—"Cet homme a toujours été heureux."

Whether or not this judgment was exact as to the career of the Duke of Berwick, he certainly as a soldier deserved the success which neither genius nor a lucky star can at all times ensure. He never conducted his campaigns with a view to popular applause or royal favour; nor was he afraid of the charge of tardiness and want of spirit which has at all times menaced the circumspect commander. He provided with special care for the supplies on which the health and strength of his troops would have to depend, and was a consistent disciplinarian without being a martinet. The simplicity and high-mindedness of his nature, which were accompanied by an openhandedness to which even his vast revenues proved unequal, must have stood him in good stead in his dealings with many kinds of men; in an age the insolence and servility of which alike revolted an observer such as St. Simon, the victorious general seems to have taken no liberties, and the bastard of an exiled King to have permitted none. His private life was almost proverbial for its kindliness and purity; but Colonel Wilson verges on the namby-pamby in his imaginary picture of the last parting of "James Fitzjames" and his second wife.

If the truth has to be told, Colonel Wilson in the course of this volume not only verges on, but lapses into, several excesses and defects of manner which we had hoped he might have cast off in the course of seven studious years. Though his book as a whole is neither heavy nor trivial, his style is occasionally all too solemn (as where he takes away our breath by informing us that "woman is the pivot of our social system"), but far more frequently errs on the side of flippancy. Why should a military historian, borrowing the phraseology of Tommy Traddles, speak of the Princess Marie Louise of Savoy, afterwards Queen of Spain, as "one of the dearest girls imaginable"? Why should he introduce "the vivacious matrons of the present day" into an anecdote concerning the experiences of the Countess Tilly? (What warrant, by the way, has Colonel Wilson for calling her husband a Fleming? The family took its name from a place south of Brussels, not very far from the field of Waterloo.) But we have no inclination to multiply examples of what Colonel Wilson evidently considers ornamental passages. In the same light he doubtless, and more naturally, regards his quotations, which are strewn through his pages thick as leaves—but we may leave him to finish the quotation for himself, although it is not taken from his and Dr. Pangloss's favourite author. An almost equally troublesome habit is that of interlarding his English narrative with bits of French. Inasmuch as his book is necessarily founded to a large extent upon the memoirs of his hero, while he has liberally used St. Simon and other French sources, there were of course many occasions on which historical writer a reasonable liberty in the use of tongues. But Colonel Wilson's text is (he obliges us to quote) "of amphibious nature." On the other hand, we gratefully acknowledge that he has taken a hint on which we ventured in our review of his earlier volume, and has greatly enhanced the value of its successor by giving chapter and verse in nearly all the useful references with which it abounds. He does not, however, say whence he has taken his statement as to the cause of the disgrace of Count Gallas, which appears to us incomplete if not incorrect, while the mention of Maurice "de Saxe" as having served under Marlborough at Malplaquet is misleading, inasmuch as a letter from his mother thanked the boy's immediate commander, Schulenburg, for keeping him out of the battle.

Military readers will find in Colonel Wilson a critic who preeminently has the courage of his opinions, and who justly holds that students of the art of war may learn something from great generals who lived before Count Moltke. In this as in other respects there is not a little to be learnt from the narrative before us; it is the more to be regretted that its author should not have confined himself more closely to his subject, and have treated it without a succession of flourishes and antics which no biography could have better spared.

MR. TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVEL.*

THE volumes before us contain work which, as was explained in the preface to the author's Autobiography, was written before The Land Leaguers, but which, unlike The Land Leaguers, was finished and perfect. An Old Man's Love, moreover, is, in more than the mere mechanical sense, a more finished book than The Land Leaguers. It is very much shorter, and deals with a much more confined set of situations; indeed the whole really important part of the action is comprised within a space of time very little longer than the twenty-four hours of the venerable Unities. It is also more original in design and donnée, not only than The Land Leaguers, but than any of its author's more recent work, with the doubtful exception of The Fixed Period, which was not so much a novel as a jeu d'esprit. There are a few slips here and there, pretty evidently due to failing memory and other physical weaknesses. A personage is named Furnival in one place and Hall in the rest of the book; a sentence or two here and there has a slight slovenliness which he would certainly not have committed in his earlier days. But, on the whole, the book is not an unfitting finale to an almost unparalleled series of works in fiction; and there is something in its pathetic motive which may be thought without much fancifulness appropriate to a pièce d'adieu. Not, of course, that Mr. Trollope meant it as his good-night to the auditory which he had amused continuously for a whole generation, but that the Fates did. And the Fates have an even better habit than the best artist of shaping things decorously, and so that they shall come to an harmonious, or, at any rate, a not inharmonious close.

The plot of An Old Man's Love is simple enough. William Whittlestaff, aged fifty, is a kind of squireen, or, to speak more exactly, a rentier, with a country house and certain acres appertaining near Alresford. He is a person who has had losses in the world—losses of a sort which breaks no bones, but still affects some natures very amply. He has failed in making his mark at Oxford; he has failed still more in attempting to make his mark as a poet; he has been jilted at thirty by a certain wicked, fair-haired Catherine Bailey, who afterwards married an odious and successful lawyer; and his fortune, which would have been ample, has become simply comfortable owing to certain injudicious speculations of his father, who was disgusted at his son's refusal to go to the Bar. So at fifty Mr. Whittlestaff is something of a humorist (in the old sense), though no misanthrope, and something of an old bachelor, without exactly being that kind of old bachelor which corresponds strictly to an old maid—in the worst acceptation of that opprobrious term. He is reasonably familiar with his neighbours; carries, or has carried, his gun now and then; reads the classics (than which his contemporaries might find many worse employments); and half teases, half is teased by, his ancient housekeeper, Mrs. Baggett. After many quiet years, and at the age already twice mentioned, something happens to him. In an extra-legal kind of fashion an embarrassing ward is thrown on him in the person of a certain Mary Lawrie, daughter of an old friend, and left at five-and-twenty quite penniless. After a little reflection he decides that he is old enough and confirmed bachelor enough to take her into his house and treat her as his daughter. Mary Lawrie is attractive without being beautiful, affectionate without being demonstrative, and reserved without being shy or sly. She comes to Croker's Hall (as Mr. Whittlestaff's house is named), and abides there for more than a year, feeling very grateful to her host, who has redeemed her from the inferno of governesshood or companionship. By that time Mr. Whittlestaff has necessarily, and according to the common way of [illegible] with a maid in the same house, fallen in love with her—a process in which he is, in an odd sort of way, encouraged by Mrs. Baggett, who thinks it only right that he should do what he likes, being a man, though she is at the same time determined not to endure a mistress, and agonised at the thought of having to retire to the society of her graceless husband, ex-Sergeant Baggett. At last Whittlestaff proposes, and Mary, after some changes of feeling and some grotesque interferences of Mrs. Baggett's, accepts him. She tells him, however, that her heart is not, and cannot be, wholly his. There is in the background a certain John Gordon who two or three years before, being, like her, penniless, has had to leave England to make his fortune, and from whom she has never heard since. But Gordon had never spoken, and she does not feel justified in rejecting her guardian and benefactor summarily because of this vague and half-imaginary tie. Sur ces entrefaites, as the practised reader anticipates, John Gordon turns up with a fortune made at the diamond fields, and with the fullest intention of claiming Mary. Here is a deadlock which is rather complicated than resolved by the explanations which follow. Gordon is determined to win if possible, Whittlestaff is determined not to lose, and is backed up by the ancient housekeeper, who is contemptuous of the instability of diamonds and indignant at her master not having his way, while Mary, though all her affection for Gordon has revived, is steadfast to her word. So the situation is fully evolved before the first volume is finished. How it is settled in the second need not be formally stated. The two noteworthy things in the book are, first, the conflict between selfishness and generosity, or, rather, between selfishness of the vulgar and selfishness of the more refined sort in Whittlestaff; and, secondly, the manner in which his housekeeper, a most excellent soul, urges him to persevere and hold Mary to her word. It would almost seem as if Mr. Trollope in this last character had wished to show in decorous and modern matter the same curious peculiarity of the feminine nature and its tendency to side with man against its own sex which Middleton drew so cunningly in Women Beware Women, and Richardson more elaborately, but perhaps not more cunningly, in Pamela and Clarissa. It is rather a shame to compare good Mrs. Baggett with Mrs. Jewkes and Mrs. Sinclair; but there is little doubt of the comparison holding, proper allowances being made. The battle of the good and evil angels in Whittlestaff (under the somewhat unexpected influence and guidance of Horatian "tags," instead of texts of Scripture) is one of the best pieces of what fine writers call soul-dissection that Mr. Trollope ever did. It must be left to readers to decide whether the curious and rather unmanly garrulousness of the hero after he has made his election in or is not true to life. For ourselves, we do not think it out of character. At any rate, Mr. Whittlestaff is one of the least commonplace of Mr. Trollope's personages. John Gordon has nothing particular to differentiate him from scores of his likes; and Mary Lawrie is not much more than an addition to Mr. Trollope's vast army of girls—attractive enough, but not at all out of the common way, and by no means too bright or good for human nature to make hearty meals off them daily.

The story would not be its author's if, short as it is, it had not plenty of minor characters, and episodic sketches. Mrs. Baggett and her drunken reprobate of a sergeant might perhaps undergo considerable "cutting" without much disadvantage. John Gordon's partner at the diamond fields, Fitzwalker Tookey, and his wife Matilda (the latter, however, does not appear in person), are thumbnail sketches from Mr. Trollope's African tour of a somewhat naturalist kind, and we are not certain that we could not, despite their liveliness, have spared them. Mr. Hall, the squire, who "could give a dinner without champagne," and "thought forty shillings a dozen enough for port, sherry, or even claret" (by the way, if by this is meant the sum which the wines cost him when he laid them down, he might have treated his guests very well, but if otherwise we praise him not), who achieved the ideal of living upon half as many thousands a year as he had, and who was not by any means a friend in need where money was concerned, but still a hospitable and not disagreeable old person, is one of those thoroughly lifelike outlines the abundance of which in Mr. Trollope's books always went far to conciliate the judicious reader. He never gave bad measure in this respect, never seemed (as some practised novelists do) to be wondering how little the reader would take for his money. The four Miss Halls are merely supernumeraries, and so is their friend Kattie Forrester, who, however, has some of the not wholly commendable pertness which sometimes showed itself in her creator's girl studies. But Kattie Forrester's betrothed, the curate Montagu Blake, the last and not least good-humouredly malicious figure of Mr. Trollope's famous clerical gallery, almost deserved fuller handling. Mr. Blake is quite amiable, and by no means wholly a fool. His criticism on the diamond business—"if you gave me three diamonds, I can easily imagine that I should toss with another fellow who had three also, double or quits till I lost them all"—exhibits an amount of good sense and knowledge of human nature, as well as of neat expression, which the reader (this is at Mr. Blake's first appearance) is sorry not to find constantly borne out. But he is garrulous, a busybody, singularly devoid of delicacy in his attempts to make other people happy, and ludicrously indifferent to anything but the very smallest small beer (metaphorically speaking, for speaking literally he has a generous, though not excessive, taste for port and whisky). He plays his part, however, very well, and indeed the whole little story, as Captain Clutterbuck would say, goes trippingly off, and presents in very curious miniature the merits and the defects of its many predecessors. Nor ought a word of praise to be omitted for the descriptions. The author's work in this kind was so unobtrusive in contrast with the fearful daubs of the day that it has too often lacked the praise it deserved.

TWO ILLUSTRATED BOOKS ON THE EAST.

M. LE DOCTEUR GUSTAVE LE BON is an anthropologist who some time ago wrote a work entitled L'Homme et les Sociétés. In this he dealt with the physical and intellectual evolution of the individual man, and discussed how, during the lapse of time, individuals agglomerated, and societies of men passed upwards through the various stages which lie between the nomad tribe and the civilized State. He now proposes to examine in detail the history of each of the civilizations which the world has seen, and he has begun with that of the Arabs. To hit noble quarry one must aim high. The subject is a noble one, and the author's aim is high; but in the beautifully illustrated volume which lies before us, we feel that the author sometimes gets beyond his depth for lack of erudition, no superfluous accomplishment in one who would write the History of Civilization. It is not enough to have journeyed in Syria and Egypt, to have travelled by rail in Spain and Algeria. To compose a history of Arab civilization that can be worthy of the name, the writer must be versed in the Moslem sciences, and have a very competent knowledge of the classical Arabic; he must be sufficiently acquainted with the sciences of the Greeks of the seventh century A.D. to appreciate our debt to the Arabs when, in the third century A.H., they snatched up the torch, and for a time carried on the work; and, finally, he must have studied the history of Europe during the middle ages to judge why the philosophy of Averroes was the bugbear of Rome, and to appreciate what was the learning that Christian theologians went to study in the porticoes of the Great Mosque at Cordova.

Up to the present time translators have not worked enough to enable this chapter in the history of civilization to be written by one who does not command his materials at first hand. The authorities which M. Le Bon has used in the composition of his works are not cited at the foot of his pages, but are gathered together at the end of the volume in a "Bibliographie Méthodique." He states that he has given here "la liste de tous les ouvrages arabes importants traduits dans une langue européenne" and other works "utiles pour la connaissance de l'histoire des Arabes." Such a list would be extremely useful were it compiled with some small critical faculty by one who had read the works cited. But with M. Le Bon this is far from being the case. He mentions, for instance, Conde's most apocryphal Historia de la Dominacion de los Arabes, adding, "Ce livre, écrit d'après les manuscrits arabes, a été traduit en français par Marles," and in the same column, without any note of excellence, follows Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, a work that is really of the first rank both in scholarship and style. Typographical errors are annoying to the reader, but do not impeach an author's scholarship; also let any system of transliteration for Oriental names be employed that the writer may prefer. But M. Le Bon's carelessness (not to use a harsher word) in such matters is unpardonable for a serious work. The historian Nowairi, both in the body of the work and in the table of contents, is written Howairi, and we have to recognize the celebrated biographer of Arab physicians, Ibn-Abi-Osaibia, under the mutilated form of Obou Osaibat; Ibn-Khordadbeh, too, is reduced to Ibn-Khardabih. The well-known German Professor, Nöldeke, figures under the M's as Moeldeke, and then again under the N's as Noeldeke; and a list of Arabian philosophers is given without any indication of what would be the real transcription of their names, with mediæval forms, such as Albumazar, Avenzoar, or Alchindus, although we notice Alkindi written rightly enough two lines below. "Les ouvrages arabes non traduits," says M. Le Bon, "n'ont été cités que lorsqu'il s'agissait de livres d'une importance exceptionnelle, tels que les séances de Hariri, par exemple"; but then why does Ibn-el-Athir's Chronicon follow Mr. Howorth's History of the Mongols as though it were a translation? and does our author imagine Wüstenfeld's Chroniken der Stadt Mekka to be in German? Such blunders are the more annoying to the reader who turns to these pages to find "les indications nécessaires pour compléter l'étude des points qu'il voudrait approfondir," and on such principles as the above we opine that the author has laboured needlessly in the compilation of his bibliographical index.

Let us, however, give all praise to M. Le Bon's volume on the score of its illustrations. On the remains of the architecture of the Moslems, and for describing their arts, his book is one of no inconsiderable merit; his readers will be saved, also, many pages of tedious description by the exact delineation of monuments and objects of art which the camera has enabled our author to bring home from his travels. By the use of the instantaneous process, furthermore, photographs have been taken of such scenes as are presented by the crooked Eastern street, blocked up by the Oriental procession; and we have the shops of the various trades, with the craftsman squatting at his work, his tools spread out around him, and his assistants in the background. Besides photographs, M. Le Bon has made an excellent selection from the works of O. Jones and Murphy for Spain, of Prisse d'Avesnes and other Frenchmen for the Levant; while for Persia he has had to trust to the folios of Flandrin and Coste, since, apparently, he has not visited that country himself. It is, however, time to give our readers some detailed account of M. Le Bon's volume and of the theories set forth therein. It is divided into six books, of which the first is chiefly anthropological, while the second and the third depict the genesis of Islam, and the Arabian Empire in its various provinces from India to Spain.

The chapter treating of the Arab dominion in Spain is, perhaps, one of the best in the work. After describing in some detail the high degree in civilization which Spain enjoyed during the eight centuries that the Moslems owned her soil, M. Le Bon notes the extreme feebleness of the political genius of the Arabs, and points out how completely their princes failed to weld the Arab tribes settled in the Peninsula into a body politic that should make head against the continual encroachments of the Christians from the North. In recounting Abd-ar-Rahmán's invasion of France and his defeat by Charles Martel at Poitiers, M. Le Bon starts the somewhat novel theory that after all Poitiers was not one of the decisive battles of the world, and that it would have mattered but little for Christendom in the end had the Arab won the fight. According to our author's view, the expeditions into France were mere raids for the purpose of obtaining booty, and no permanent settlement of that country was ever intended by the Arab chiefs. That Charles Martel's victory did not annihilate the power of the Moslems on the French side of the Pyrenees is shown by the fact that for two hundred years—till the end of the tenth century—the Arabs still held Provence. And M. Le Bon concludes that had Pépin d'Heristal's son never led the Frankish chivalry to victory against the Moslem hordes, the course of history might still have run on much the same, and that the Arabs would have retired again into Spain laden with the booty of Tours or some few of the neighbouring towns. So far we may follow M. Le Bon; but it is hard to share his regrets that France was not in point of fact conquered as Spain had been by the Moslems. The view taken is that, seeing the gross barbarism into which Europe at this time was plunged,

Il est évident qu'au point de vue de la civilisation de l'époque, les populations chrétiennes n'auraient eu qu'à gagner à se ranger sous la bannière du prophète. Adoucis dans leurs mœurs, les peuples de l'Occident eussent sans doute évité ainsi les guerres de religion, la Saint-Barthelemy, l'inquisition, en un mot, toutes les calamités qui ont ensanglanté l'Europe pendant tant de siècles, et que les musulmans n'ont jamais connues.

The italics are our own. We refer M. Le Bon to any volume of Moslem annals, and let him see whether toleration, as in mediæval Europe, was not rather remarkable by its absence in the days of even the most enlightened of the Khalifs. Do not the massacres of the Alides and the persecutions of the Mo'tazelite philosophers indicate but too plainly how matters fell out in "the Golden Prime"? In dealing with the Crusades our author, as might be expected, and in full justice, has little to say in favour of the Christian knights. The barbarism of the middle ages learnt in the end many lessons by being brought into contact with the luxury of the civilized East; but it must be admitted that the knights of the West behaved, for the most part, very like savages, pillaging friends and foes indiscriminately, and giving but a poor example of the effects of Christianity in the bad faith and the blind ferocity with which they treated their enemies. The East, on the other hand, could and did learn but little in civilization from the Europe of those days; and in the West it was during the Crusade that the clergy, greatly fostered in their intolerance, learnt that indifference to bloodshed which bore such terrible fruit in the cruelties of the Inquisition and the massacres of Jews and Albigenses. Prior to the Crusades intolerance was rife enough, but deliberate cruelty was rare. After the Crusades it became the habit of the Church to seek to extinguish heresy in blood.

Passing on from their history M. Le Bon in his fourth book takes up the discussion of the manners and customs of the Arabs. On the subject of slavery and on the position of women he has much to say from personal observation during his travels in the East. The position of a slave in a Moslem household is very different from that which was his fate in times gone by on the plantations in the West Indies and America. In judging the question it is well to bear in mind how little in the East servitude is regarded as humiliating. Slaves in the Arab State have often filled the highest posts under Government, and in their masters' households are regarded as members of the family. Still, granting all this, our author should not let his readers forget that, although the lot of a slave may not be unpleasant in a Cairene household, yet slave-holding presupposes slave-hunting, and this last is the cause of diabolical oppression and the ceaseless fighting in the interior of Africa. On the subject of women, too, we can hardly agree that "la femme est plus respectée et plus heureuse en Orient qu'en Europe," and it is assuredly untrue that "la jalousie et la rivalité n'existent pas dans ces mariages polygames." In the main, however, the picture of harem life is painted in true colours, and our author concludes that the women have little to complain of, they are kindly treated and enjoy great power indirectly over their husbands, and the Law of the Prophet may compare favourably in this respect with the legislation of Christendom in the days of chivalry. After manners and customs we come very naturally to the arts and sciences of the Arabs, and here the reader greatly profits by the splendid illustrations of the various productions of Moslem artificers and builders. Chromo-lithographs of mosques with gorgeous tiles, stained-glass windows, pottery, and mosaic floors, with over three hundred and fifty woodcuts in the text, attest M. Le Bon's industry and excellent taste. In the four sciences of medicine, [illegible] astronomy and mathematics, the Arabs, as is well known, became great adepts; and we particularly recommend the chapters devoted to the discoveries of the natural philosophers of Islam, trusting that our readers will be rid of their "préjugé héréditaire . . . accru à chaque génération par notre détestable éducation classique, que toutes les sciences et la littérature du passé viennent uniquement des Grecs et des Latins."

In the section on the Arab geographers we find a reproduction of a map of the World, drawn in A.D. 1160 by Edrisi, by which it is evident that the Arabs were perfectly aware of the Nile having its sources in the great equatorial lakes. The three lakes are shown (the Victoria and Albert Nyanzas and Tanganyika); while besides the Nile a great river (the Congo?) flows from them westwards, falling into the Atlantic. The last book of M. Le Bon's work is devoted to the decadence of Arab civilization, which may be attributed in the main to the extreme feebleness of the political institutions of Islam—to a want, in short, of solidarité. As regards India our author has much to say on the rule of the Mongols and of the English—chiefly, too, in favour of the former. He holds that the effect of our rule has been "de plonger le pays dans un degré de misère tel qu'on n'en a jamais observé de semblance dans aucune contrée du monde," which lamentable state of things is brought about, he says, chiefly by the fact that yearly there is sent home from India to England five hundred millions—let us hope, in charity, that francs are understood, and not pounds sterling. But we must now take leave of M. Le Bon, and we have no space to discuss with him Indian finance. For illustrating the arts and architecture of the Arabs M. Le Bon has produced a most charming book, but it would have been well had he been more careful in the compilation of his text, and his title is, to say the least of it, misleading.

The sumptuous folio containing Dr. Lortet's travels in La Syrie d'aujourd'hui does not demand any very detailed review, containing, as it does, but little that is new about countries already so well known as Phœnicia, the Lebanon, and Palestine. M. Lortet's volume is magnificently illustrated, and he depicts in a charming style the people and the places he has visited; he is a naturalist too, and his volume abounds in interesting zoological and botanical observations. But, alas! that such entertainment should be entombed in a ponderous folio which, to be read, must be supported on a dining-room table, especially if one desires to open out the map. Had the publishers contented themselves with a manageable octavo, and put the map in a pocket, M. Lortet's work would certainly have become more widely known than can now be the case in a size which nine readers out of ten will qualify as "impossible." During the five years that M. Lortet spent in the country he saw very thoroughly all that was to be visited on the coast, from Alexandretta to Jaffa, and also inland from Jerusalem to Damascus, and that his readers may the more vividly understand his descriptions, he has adorned his work with three hundred and sixty-four wood engravings, more remarkable perhaps for beauty of execution than for any novelty that they may contain in the way of unknown sites. M. Lortet, however, did now and again stumble across queer people in out-of-the-way places, as, for instance, the German colony of "Templars" at Haifa. According to the account our author received on the spot, these poor people found their fatherland made too hot to hold them by the iron hand of Bismarck. To have free scope for their religious convictions, and in order to escape military service, they, taking their families with them, migrated from their homes in Saxony or Wurtemburg, and have finally settled in Haifa, where they form a very prosperous little colony of hard-working Teutons:—

J'ai été heureux d'avoir pu visiter quelques-unes des maisons de ces honnêtes Templiers. Elles sont toutes très simples, mais d'une grande propreté; . . . et dans le modeste salon on trouve toujours une petite bibliothèque, composée de livres de piété et des chefs-d'œuvre des poètes nationaux. Cette colonie deviendra certainement un centre de régénération pour les populations molles et enfantines de l'Orient.

Haifa in the hands of these Germans is already becoming a commercial centre, and the carriage-road made by them from the sea up to Nazareth has set a pattern which the Turkish governors might in the end find energy enough to copy.

SAMOA.*

DR. TURNER'S account of Samoa, its people, their habits, ideas, and beliefs, is (in spite of omissions) one of the books which comfort the anthropologist. Works like this remove from him the reproach of relying on untrustworthy evidence. This is a charge usually brought by writers who construct for themselves a theory of early man resting on no evidence at all. While such theorists represent early man as going in fear of his life every evening lest the sun may have set never to rise again, and talking in a strain of gushing poetry of which his grandchildren forget the meaning, Dr. Turner shows us what people in a somewhat backward state of culture actually think and do.

The natives of Samoa, or "The Navigator's Islands" situated about 3,000 miles from Sydney (13°-15° south latitude, 168°-173° west longitude), are by no means savages of a very low or degraded type. Even before the arrival of Europeans they had made considerable progress with rude stone tools in the art of carpentry; much labour and ingenuity is expended on their houses. It is an example of the defects in Dr. Turner's book that the word "pottery" does not even occur in his copious index. Now pottery gives us one of the best comparative standards of a young civilization: For example, Mr. Herbert Spencer thinks that the natives of Australia have fallen from a higher degree of culture. It is a satisfactory answer that not a single shard of native pottery has ever been found in the island, and that the descent from a potless civilization cannot have been long or steep. Naturally we want to know whether the Samoans, like the Fijians and the New Caledonians, are or have been potters. In his chapter on "Articles of Manufacture," however, Dr. Turner does not even mention pottery. This, as will be shown, is only an example of other deficiencies, which occur just where the evidence of a writer like Turner would be most important.

Why, then, do we praise the book? Because its positive merits outweigh its faults. Dr. Turner, to start with, has dwelt for more than forty years among the people he describes. No one can venture to say that he is a hasty student or a reporter of matters he does not understand. Again, his evidence (that of a thoroughly well-informed observer) coincides with the reports which other observers bring from every quarter of the globe, and which students collect from history. Here we find Samoans taking omens and auguries much as the Romans did. Here we mark each family abstaining from the flesh of its own sacred animal just as Egyptians did, just as Kurnai and Yakuts, Oraons and Bonis, people of Ashanti, and people of Vancouver's Island do. Finally, Dr. Turner is not a theorist. He has not written his book to support notions of Henotheism, nor Totemism, or hypotheses that Fetishism or the sense of the Infinite is the germ of religion. Dr. Turner gives a straightforward unvarnished account of the beliefs of a people whom he has known intimately for more than forty years. Had he studied recent controversies much, we fancy that he would have given more information on certain points. But, on the other hand, if he had read deeply in anthropological and "agriological" works, he might have become a partisan; and he appears to be quite impartial. We therefore accept Dr. Turner's contribution to knowledge with gratitude, though we indicate points where he might work out his picture in detail.

The Samoans are a people of light copper colour, belonging to the race most commonly found in Central and Eastern Polynesia. Like the New Zealanders, they have a cosmogony; mythical, indeed, yet by no means wanting in purely metaphysical conceptions. This cosmogony, like that of Hesiod, is stated in a series of semi-mythical, semi-allegorical genealogies. First came Nothing (like the Maori Night), then Fragrance, then Dust, then That which might be Perceived, then Earth, then High Rocks, Small Stones, and so forth. Though there is an effort after abstract thought in these terms, the thought instantly becomes mythical. The various stages or moments in the evolution of the Samoan's world are conceived of as personal, and capable of marriage and child-getting. Children are born to a mythical pair, and settle certain districts in Samoa. The divine genealogies, like those of English kings, or the records of Egypt, slope down into the human, and reach Malietoa Tɛlaiou, "proclaimed king in 1878." The mental muddle is most excellently illustrated when we read that "Space had a long-legged seat," or when the native memory falls back on a lower stratum of savage mythical fancy telling us how the cuttle-fish fought against fire, and how maggots (lizards in Australia) were developed into men. While the god Tangaloa is regarded by Dr. Turner as "unconditioned," he is so far "conditioned" as to have a daughter who can assume the form of a bird—a sort of snipe. This snipe was sent wandering over the waters to find a rest for her feet, and finally discovered Samoa. Tangaloa is, at least in some aspects, a kind of Zeus, or heaven-god; his daughters are thunder and lightning.

Though Tangaloa is a heaven-god, the heavens were not always treated with respect in Samoan myths. As in the myths of Cronus and Indra, as in China and New Zealand, the Samoans believe in a remote age when heaven lay passing heavy upon earth. Cronus separated the pair in Greece, Indra in India, Tutenganahau in New Zealand; the arrowroot and a similar plant did the feat in Samoa. In another isle Maui, with five comrades, separated heaven and earth; elsewhere, again, a serpent did what was necessary. In Samoa the original separation was insufficient, and "a man" (name unknown) had to raise the roof of the world. Yet another account attributes the deed to the god Tïtï'i. In Samoa the usual Jack-in-the-Bean-stalk stories of the heaven-climber occur, as in one Greek myth of Prometheus. The Samoan heaven-climber has a Pandora of his own. Like Maui in New Zealand, and the Red Indian Tcha-ka-betch, this hero trapped the sun, tamed him, and compelled him to run in his present orderly circuit. As in Bulgaria, the sun married a pretty girl of the daughters of men. The wedding stopped the custom of human sacrifices to the sun. The Samoans have their story of the woman in the moon. She was taken up there for impiety, like our man in the moon. The Pleiades are called "eyes of chiefs." The myth of fire-stealing is very like that current in New Zealand. The god Tafute permitted Tïtï'i to find fire in wood, whence it is extracted by friction. The story in Savage Island is more like that of Prometheus Purphoros. Many other myths have the Samoans. Some are animal-fables; for example, the fable of the hare and the tortoise is represented by the fowl and the turtle. Other stories account in the usual way for the characteristics of animals or plants, on the hypothesis that they were human before assuming their present forms. The Metamorphoses of Ovid have their parallels in the mythology of every savage race. Purely romantic myths also are common and are chanted in ballads. The most remarkable of these given by Dr. Turner contains the central incidents of the Jason saga. This myth is, perhaps, the most widely distributed of all stories which are neither attempts to account for natural phenomena nor parables with a moral purpose. The two latter classes of tales might conceivably be invented in separate centres, wherever the moral lesson had to be enforced or the physical phenomena to be explained. But the Jason story seems to be merely a novel with a certain series of romantic situations. The finding of the saga in North America, Samoa, Finland, Madagascar, and (with certain modifications) among Eskimos, Bushmen, Zulus, Japanese, and Samoyeds, as well as wherever the Aryan race has wandered, suggests one of the problems of mythology. Can the story have been transmitted, like an object of barter, from people to people in some very remote antiquity? The Samoan version of the saga will be found on pp. 102, 104. The mythologist must notice that while magic metamorphosis and similar processes are freely employed in myth, they are also believed to be common enough in everyday life. It is plain that the first myth-makers used incidents which we regard as monstrous, but which they thought as commonplace as duels, fraudulent attorneys, and concealed wills are in modern novels.

We have regretted the lacunæ in Dr. Turner's information. As an example of what we mean, take the account of Samoan religion, which fills the earlier part of his book. That religion is zoolatry, of a Totemistic character, with certain curious developments, which seem to need fuller explanation. The ordinary rule of Totemism is that each set of kindred revere and refuse to eat a certain plant or animal, while they do eat the plants and animals holy in the other stocks. They use the object, or a representation of it, as a badge, or crest, and do not marry women of the same crest and family name. Now the most patent and prevalent habit of Samoan religion is the abstinence of each family from a certain animal or plant. In that object (usually an animal) each family is said to believe its own god to be incarnate. Now the ordinary Totemist appears (so far as can be ascertained) merely to regard each individual of the species from which he claims descent as his kinsman, and therefore to be respected. Any one acquainted with Red Indian, or Australian, or Bechuana, or Ashanti habits will remember many examples. But, if Dr. Turner has rightly understood his Samoan flock, the kindred beasts are each incarnations of a special god. Mr. Tylor writes, in his too brief preface:—"The transition, so interesting in the history of religious ideas, from the spirit inhabiting an individual body to the deity presiding over all individuals of a kind, has nowhere been brought so clearly into view as in the account of the war-god Tongo, who was incarnate in the owl; so that when a dead owl was found the islanders wailed and mourned, beating their foreheads with stones after their manner; Tongo nevertheless was not dead, but continued to exist incarnate in other owls." Much the same features occur in Egyptian religion, at least as reported by Herodotus. The mourning on the death of a cat; the yearly sacrifice of a sheep by the sheep-stock in Thebes (compare the buzzard sacrifice by the Californian Galinameros) very closely resemble Samoan belief and custom as described by Dr. Turner. Are we to regard Samoan religion as a thoughtful advance on Totemism? Has the owl become from a clan totem a war-god incarnate in all owls? Would the next step be an approach to the Aztec war-god, with the attributes of a bird lingering about him—a Euhemerized bird-god, as explained by J. G. Müller? Would the last stage be the evolution of an anthropomorphic god, with the owl for his companion, as the owl was the companion of Pallas Athene? It is a pity that Mr. Tylor did not develop his hint further, and show us what he thinks about these things. Dr. Turner, too, leaves us in doubt as to the Totemism of the Samoans. Each family has its sacred animal-god, it is true; but is the animal or its representation used as a crest or badge? This appears to be hinted at (p. 191); "in their war-canoes they had some distinguishing badge of their district hoisted on a pole, a bird it might be, or a dog, or a bunch of leaves." Again, we want to know whether the families (as among Totemists) were "exogamous," whether it was forbidden to marry a woman whose family revered the same animal as the family of the man. We find in Samoa that, while some gods had but one animal incarnation, other gods, such as Tongo, had different incarnations in different families. Pua was a tree in one family, a land crab in another, an octopus in a third. Tongo appears in bat, mullet, and sting-ray, as well as in owl. Was Apollo in some unknown antiquity a mouse in one family (Smintheus), a wolf (Lyceius) in another, a dolphin (Delphinios) in a third, a raven in a fourth, and so on? This theory would readily account for the sacred animals of the Greek gods and for the animal gods of Egypt.

Dr. Turner's book, with its account of clan communism in Samoa, is as interesting to the economist as its devinettes are to the student of riddles, its gods to the mythologist, or its long lists of South Sea words to the philologist. The book is excellent, full of matter, and indispensable, despite lacunæ, which perhaps Dr. Turner will fill up, to the student of man and his institutions.

BURTON'S BOOK OF THE SWORD.*

THE first part of Captain Burton's Book of the Sword, which has for certain years been understood to be in preparation, is now visibly before us. Like a French historical work on fencing, of which we reviewed the first volume a couple of months ago, it leaves us in suspense before we are even in sight of the point where real swordsmanship begins. But, unlike that work, it is impossible to charge Captain Burton's with lack of substance or with unprofitable repetition of commonplace knowledge. Rather we are in danger of a surfeit from the bulk and variety of matter offered for our digestion in this goodly quarto. Not only we get full particulars of the sword and all weapons that have any family likeness to it, but there is an ever-present and luxuriant undergrowth, so to speak, of miscellaneous erudition and speculation. Military history, Oriental philology, comparative ethnology, prehistoric mythology, and we know not what else, crop out in the text and overflow into discursive and often pungent notes. With these matters we do not propose to meddle. Captain Burton in his "Foreword" (which the vulgar call preface: but foreword is anyhow better than pre-script, which we have seen) pointedly calls attention to his advanced views of Egyptology. But we shall not be tempted. It may be that most things in earth, including swords, came out of Egypt originally. So Captain Burton appears ready to assert against all comers, and, no doubt, some Egyptologist of a less advanced school, to say nothing of what he calls "the Aryan heresy," will be equally ready to break a lance with him. Awaiting that combat with equanimity, we are content to start from the undisputed facts afforded by the monumental evidence of the two earliest historical civilizations, the Egyptian and the Assyrian.

The forms of the sword may be reduced to three types; the straight-edged, the leaf-shaped, and the scimitar. A French duelling sword is the complete development of the first, a good Persian or Indian sabre of the last. Our Western military swords are a compromise between the two. The leaf-shape, familiar in the classical monuments of Greece, is represented in modern times only by a few eccentric patterns of short swords and sword-bayonets, and possibly, by no means certainly, by the yataghan. The common yataghan form of sword-bayonet, by the way, is much disparaged by Captain Burton, and we fully agree with him. Probably the yataghan is the most formidable of short hand-weapons; but at the end of a rifle, which it spoils for shooting and makes top-heavy for a pike, it is hopelessly out of place. It is tempting to see, with General Pitt-Rivers, the original type, developed in metal from the hint of a stone spear-head, in the symmetrical leaf-shape. Straighten out the edges and lengthen the point, and we have the broadsword, and are on the way to the rapier. Give the preference to one edge and incline the axis of the blade in its direction, and we have the doubly-curved yataghan shape, the Greek κοπίς. Lengthen this blade in proportion to its width, and transfer the cutting edge to the unbroken convex curvature which forms the back of the yataghan, and we have the Eastern sabre, preserving in the old Turkish scimitar, now rare, and in the common tulwar, with their broadening near the centre of percussion, a trace of the original model. This, we say, is tempting. But the historical evidence is none of the most encouraging to this or to any other simple theory of origin. On the Assyrian monuments we find a tapering pointed sword with straight edges. Bronze weapons of the same pattern, only longer, have been found in considerable number by Dr. Schliemann at Mycenæ. The like form occurs in Egyptian bronze daggers, and in several iron swords found in Etruscan tombs, to which Captain Burton justly calls particular attention. Egyptian monuments abound in a particular cutlass or hanger, shaped somewhat like a broad sickle, the name of which is written Khopsh by our author, and connected by him, after Meyrick (with doubtful warrant, we conceive), with the Greek κοπίς. The leaf-shaped bronze sword has also been found in Egypt, we are not told with what indication of date, or whether, in particular, under such circumstances as to exclude its being a Greek importation. Of the earlier history of the Eastern sabre there is not forthcoming, that we know of, any positive evidence whatever. Thus we have no proof that the leaf-shaped pattern was in fact earlier than the others, but rather a certain amount of presumption to the contrary.

Captain Burton adopts, though not with any marked dwelling upon it, the opinion that the sword had several independent origins. Of these not impossible, but still disputable sources, the boomerang is one, and the flattened club, or even the broad end of a paddle, is another. It is not difficult to exhibit a series of intermediate forms between the yataghan and the boomerang, or the sabre and the club. But this is not enough. Closely resembling forms may turn out not to be steps in the same process at all, but to have approached one another from widely different starting-points, the resemblance being due, perhaps, to similar external conditions in the later stages. Again, a form assumed to be transitional may really be modified by imitation of the very form which it is used to explain. There is nothing to show that the "wooden sabres" of some of the Pacific Islands, which are plausibly represented as clubs on the way to become swords, were not the work of men who had seen imported swords of metal. Similar doubts apply to the many curious varieties of boomerang-like weapons met with in Africa. We incline, on the whole, to think that the sword proper—"a metal blade intended for cutting, thrusting, or cut-and-thrust," as our author defines it—arose in some one way to begin with, probably, as General Pitt-Rivers maintains, by enlargement from a dagger which had itself grown out of a spear-head broken off short; or, it may be, from a roughly-shaped knife modelled on the older stone implements. The influence of such a type, once formed, would speedily be apparent in modifications of axes and other staff-weapons. And herein it is worth noting that some ancient bronze spear-heads are full as large as an average dagger. There is one such in the Tower. But all general conclusions from such materials must be doubtful.

As for the order of Captain Burton's present volume, it may be said to consist of a prehistoric and a historic part, divided by a chapter of technical explanations. The division comes about in this way. Having disposed of the stone, bronze, and early iron ages—or rather stages, for the so-called ages are not definite or exclusive periods—Captain Burton thinks it time to describe with some fulness the parts and properties of a sword, reproducing, by the way, some valuable work of the late Mr. Latham's from pamphlets not now easy to come at. Especially good is Mr. Latham's explanation of the cutting power given to the blade by curvature. One or two of the diagrams, however, might have been altered with advantage. The man lifting up a sabre for a vertical cut, and thereby exposing himself to a straight thrust, is simply absurd. No swordsman would ever cut like that. Mr. Waite has shown the fallacy of the common assumption that the cut is necessarily slower than the point; and some of the early Italian writers, we may add, had already observed that, inasmuch as the human hand is, mechanically speaking, at the end of a jointed rod (witness the anatomical term radius), the movement of the sword's point cannot be really straight in any case. Then follow historical chapters, of which the most interesting to our mind is that on Greek swords, containing as it does a full account of Dr. Schliemann's finds at Mycenæ, and bringing them into relation (as Dr. Schliemann did not) with Etruscan and other remains. Greek monuments and relics tell us very little of curved swords. Yet they were not only known, but preferred by some good judges for cavalry service. Captain Burton refers to Xenophon, De Re Eq. c. 12, s. 11, who says:—μίχαιραν μὲν μᾶλλον ἢ ξίφος ἐπαινοῖμεν ἐφ' ὑψηλοῦ γὰρ ὄντι τῷ ἱππεῖ κοπίδος μᾶλλον ἡ πληγὴ ἢ ξίφους ἀρκέσει. This looks as if the arm indifferently described as κοπίς or μάχαιρα must have been longer than the doubly-curved blade (a yataghan, in fact) figured on vases, mostly if not always in the hands of Amazons, giants, or barbarians, as General Pitt-Rivers has pointed out. Even about the Greek sword, for which the evidence is comparatively abundant, we still have much to learn; and, in passing on, we may call attention to Mr. W. Leaf's paper on Homeric arms in the current number of the Journal of the Hellenic Society as a good specimen of what may yet be done. Lindenschmit has left little new to be said of Roman arms and equipment for the present, and Captain Burton is tempted to fill out his Roman chapter with a little too much matter about the gladiators; whereby we come to learn, with some surprise, that he thinks there was not so very much harm in an exhibition of this kind, but also, and with more satisfaction, that he wholly condemns pigeon-shooting. We look forward with much curiosity to the continuation of the work, which is to deal with the sword in its full age—the age of true swordsmanship or fencing.

OLE BULL.*

IT was inevitable that the career of so strange and romantic a personage as Ole Bull should find only too many biographers. He was not at all averse to publicity, and during his lifetime he supplied material to at least three writers, all of them of more than common distinction, who published studies of his genius and character. Of these one, that by the poet Wergeland, was simply a eulogy. The other two, by the Danish novelist Meyer Goldschmidt and by the late Henrik Winter-Hjelm, were valuable so far as they went; but they contained errors and omissions that could not be corrected until the time came for examining documents. Since his death Ole Bull has continued to be fortunate in his biographers; for the selection from his letters which heads our list is prefaced by the Norwegian novelist Jonas Lie, the distinguished author of Livsslaven and Lodsen og hans Hustru, whose style is charming, and whose temperament is specially adapted to appreciate that of Ole Bull; while still later there has appeared the volume which is second on our list, and which is an American memoir, in English, by the widow of the great violinist. In the latter part of the life, no doubt, Mrs. Bull speaks with greater authority than Herr Lie; but she seems to borrow from his careful pages many of the incidents of Ole Bull's early days, and we are bound to confess that she sometimes spoils a good story that Herr Lie has told with grace and humour. Taken together, and in connexion with the letters, these publications give us an adequate impression of this very remarkable and picturesque man of genius.

The great men produced in Norway in the beginning of the present century were curiously vehement and ebullient in temperament. Herr Lie rather fantastically says that this little forgotten nation, which for four centuries had been communing with the stars and the sea and its own auroral legends, suddenly attracted the attention of Europe by throwing up a chain of active volcanoes. The phrase is not unfortunate, for in such men as Henrik Wergeland, Engebrecht Soot, and Ole Bull there was something volcanic which contrasted with the quiet flatness of all that Norway had done in the arts until their time. Their personality was so marked that a crowd of legends grew up about them in their own lifetime, and to this day it is difficult to sever the truth from the falsehood. Some musical critics may very likely tell us that Ole Bull's genius was overrated. It is asserted that he has left the science of music exactly where he found it, and that his marvellous tours de force have profited later executants not a whit. His famous flageolet-notes, his arpeggios, and all his dazzling and bizarre feats of technique belonged to himself, and died with him, as the wonders of vocal skill pass with the organ of the vocalist. It is hardly correct to think of him as a musician, in the newest sense of the word; he was rather a marvellous improvisatore, a poet who stirred the emotions of his audience by pouring out his heart into his violin. His personal qualities aided his genius; he was physically one of the most powerful and beautiful persons of his generation, never so much inspired as when he had an opportunity to remove a difficulty by the exercise of his will, loving to encounter the labours of Hercules that he might prove himself irresistible, and yet, with all this vigour and vehemence, as amiable and as winning as a child. One little point which greatly added to the majesty of his appearance was that he did not, as most violinists do, incline his head in playing, but stood singularly erect, with his chin free. All his spectators agree in noting this grace and dignity of pose, and some one has recorded that when he reached the highest notes he used to look "forty feet high."

Ole Bull was born on the 5th of February, 1810. Both his parents were musical, and one of his uncles was a fanatic for stringed instrumentation. The quartet evenings of Uncle Jens were closed to a child like Ole, but the latter would allow himself to be put to bed, and then, creeping out again, would hide for hours under the sofa for the pleasure of hearing the music. After a time Uncle Jens interceded, and an exception was made in the child's favour. When Ole was only three years old he began to try to play, and at five years old his uncle gave him a little lemon-coloured fiddle, on which he played well from the first, although he had received no teaching. The opening of his public career is told by Herr Lie rather better than by Mrs. Bull, but the story is radically the same in each case. The one good first violin in the town of Bergen was a man called Paulsen, who was in great request at Uncle Jens's parties. One evening when they rose from supper it was evident to all that the eminent Kammermusicus was hopelessly intoxicated. When he took his place in the quartet, the violin glided out of his hand, and he sank in a lethargy upon his chair. The first violin was utterly hors de combat. Uncle Jens called out to the child, "Now Ole, you must play for Paulsen! Quick, my boy, and you shall have a piece of sugar-candy." At the same moment he forced Paulsen's violin into the child's arms. It was a quartet by Krummer, and Ole Bull had heard it before. Although the great violin hurt his fingers and his neck, when he placed it on his shoulder, he attacked his part with spirit, and, though he was still too young to read the music, he remembered it, and played it with astonishing precision and grace. The result of this triumph was that he received a violin suitable to his size, and was henceforth an active member at all his uncle's musical parties.

His parents, in the face of his astounding talent, continued to wish him to become anything rather than a musician. When he was sent up to Christiania University in 1828, he was destined for the church, and his father had forced from him a promise that he would not practise the violin. This promise he tried very hard to keep, but in vain. One morning, after spending the greater part of the night in playing a quartet at the house of one of the performers, he learned that he had been plucked for Latin in his little-go examination. In despair, he rushed to the friend who had seduced him to take up his fiddle again, but this man merely said, "And do you suppose yourself fitted to be a parish priest in Finmark, or a missionary to the Lapps? We have something better for you than that." And he forthwith informed him that he had been nominated provisional director of the Philharmonic Society during the illness of the greatest musician Norway then possessed, Professor Waldemar Thrane. A month later Thrane was dead, and Ole Bull was made Director, at the age of seventeen. Two years after this he threw up his appointment, and went off to Germany, to study under Spohr. Later still, in 1831, he made his first appearance in Paris.

His adventures in France were of the most extraordinary kind. He could obtain no situation, and sank lower and lower into penury. The cholera was raging in Paris, and it was no suitable moment for a young foreign artist to make his way there. He was at the point of starvation when a very curious man stepped in, as the end out of the machine, and saved him in a very curious way. At the pension where he lived he met one morning a stranger, who was, he was told, a detective. Ole Bull said something, which this stranger overheard, and he entered into conversation with him. The young Norseman frankly told him the state of his affairs, and the detective took him to an estaminet close by.

"Listen," said the stranger; "I know you are in want; but follow my advice, you must try your luck at play." "But I have no money." "You must manage to get five francs; then go to-night between ten and eleven o'clock, not earlier, to Frascati's, in the Boulevard Montmartre. Mount the stairs, ring the bell, and give your hat boldly to the liveried servant in attendance; enter the hall, go straight to the table, put your five francs on the red, and let it remain there." The young man ran home, raised the five francs, and was on the spot at the appointed hour. He made his way to the green table, surrounded by ladies and gentlemen playing at trente et quarante. He placed his five francs on the red, but through his awkwardness it rolled over to the black and was lost. He stood as if struck by lightning, without a sou in his pocket. He came to himself on hearing, "Messieurs, faites vos jeux." He called "Cinq francs," but his foreign accent made it sound like "cent francs," and one hundred francs were shoved over to him as his winnings. He stands pale for a moment, unable to speak or move; then places his money on the red, and wins once again, and yet again, until, at last, eight hundred francs in gold lie in a heap before him. . . . Suddenly, from amid the crowd surrounding the table, a delicate hand, gleaming with diamonds, glided over the golden pile; but the iron hand of the Norwegian grasped the little white one. A woman's shriek was heard; several voices called out "A la porte! à la porte!" But a man near Ole Bull, in a calm clear voice that seemed to command all in the room, said, "Madame, laissez cet or là!" and to Bull, "Monsieur, prenez votre or, s'il vous plait."

His friend, in whom he recognized the mysterious stranger of the morning, proved to be no other than Vidocq, the head of the secret police in Paris. Mrs. Bull says that he never saw his benefactor again, but we understand Herr Lie to doubt this. At any rate the improvement in his circumstances was sufficient to take him out of Paris, but not until after he had engaged himself to marry his first wife, a sprightly young Frenchwoman. He gradually rose to a certain musical position, and his first great triumph in Parisian society was made under circumstances that proved how large a place the accidental always took in Ole Bull's career. A man who had a patent varnish for violins brought his invention to Ole Bull, and begged him to try it. He said that it gave ordinary instruments the sweet quality of a Cremona fiddle. Ole Bull tried it, and found that it really did improve the tone, and promised to use a violin prepared with it at a concert he had to give at the house of the Duke of Riario. There was a great deal of fashionable company collected at this concert, and the heat of the room melted the famous varnish, which was really a preparation of assafœtida. The smell which it exuded was so maddening that an ordinary man would have stopped and have excused himself; but Ole Bull merely closed his eyes, turned his face away, and played with an energy which became more frenzied the more intolerable the stink became. He enjoyed an overwhelming success; but Herr Jonas Lie goes on to say that, when the Duke rushed forward to seize his hand in congratulation, the appalling odour of assafœtida struck him in the face, and Ole Bull had to explain in what an agony he had been performing.

These books are full of good stories. It is difficult to know where to choose. When Ole Bull was once reduced almost to starvation at Bologna he was saved by the accident that Colbran was passing under the windows of the barracks in which he had a garret and heard him playing. This led to his famous performance before the Duke of Tuscany, when the Princess Poniatowsky and two other ladies gave him each a theme, and he wound all three together in an improvisation which threw the virtuosi of Italy into an ecstasy. After this his career was one long succession of triumphs; but it was not the less attended by quaint and romantic incidents at every turn. We should like to have space to tell how Liszt and Ole Bull held an offensive manager hanging over the street from a window until he made abject confession of his sins; how an American tried to cut the Duke of Devonshire's diamond out of Ole Bull's fiddle-bow with his bowie-knife, and how the Norwegian thrashed him, and then graciously accepted the bowie-knife as a memento; how, when he made his first appearance at the Grand Opéra in Paris, he snapped his A string in the midst of the finale of the Polacca Guerriera, and, with an instinct of despair, contrived to transpose the remainder of the piece, and finish on three strings—a feat which nobody present realized except Meyerbeer, whose voice rang out with applause. There is really no limit to the good stories which might be told of Ole Bull.

The letters in the Norwegian edition are almost all from Ole Bull to his first wife and from her to him. They were written in French, but are here published in Danish, which seems a pity, as they happened to exist in a form familiar to a European public. They are warmly affectionate in tone, and reflect the great violinist's hopes and fears and enthusiasms from day to day. They principally cover the period from 1836 to 1846. The American memoir contains technical appendices which will be very interesting to musicians, a chapter by Professor Crosby on the anatomy of the violinist, and a series of curious notes on the history of the violin by Ole Bull himself.

EARLY GERMAN AND FLEMISH PRINTS.*

THESE volumes, cataloguing the British Museum collection of early German and Flemish prints, have a wider interest than their title would seem to imply. Dr. Willshire is not an unknown or "unrecognized" authority; his Introduction to the Study of Ancient Prints, which has passed through two editions, has attained the standard of a text-book; and there are few iconophilists whose criticism on an early print of the Northern school, or on the date and origin of a mediæval playing-card, we would more willingly accept. We wish, therefore, we could speak in entire commendation of a Catalogue which on every page bears evidence of wide research, of extensive knowledge of these early works, and a thorough appreciation of their peculiar interest. Beginning with special incunabula, such as prints en manière criblée, and the earliest impressions from metal or from wood, the Catalogue leads onwards to the acknowledged work of Schongauer and of Meckenen. Interspersed in the text, and prefacing each several divisions, are notes or dissertations upon the processes by which particular prints were produced, upon their authorship or their history. Thus it is apparent that "A Descriptive Catalogue" is a title not sufficiently comprehensive, and one which does less than justice to the contents of these volumes. But, at the same time, while expressing this high opinion of the ability and qualifications of the author, we must express our regret that a complete and recognized system of indexing the treasures of the Print Room has not yet been established. It is for want of such system that a work like the present, which has taken years to mature, and for which no one is more competent than Dr. Willshire, loses much of its value. The volumes on Early German and Flemish Prints, like an earlier volume on Playing and other Cards in the British Museum, are not so much "general" as "class catalogues"—good, it may be, for description of particular prints, but insufficient as an index even of the collections to which they especially refer. It ought to be as easy to discover whether a print or drawing, known to exist from descriptions given elsewhere, is to be found in the Print Room, as in other departments it is to verify the occurrence of a coin or of a manuscript. Class catalogues meet a special want; these volumes on Early German and Flemish Prints are a contribution, and a valuable one, to the history of art, and will occupy their fitting place upon our shelves; but a general catalogue of the treasures of the Print Room is still urgently required; and, until this is complete—and its execution will be neither a simple nor an easy task—the real importance of this department cannot possibly be appreciated, or the collections be available as they ought to be for reference or for study.

It would be impossible within the prescribed limits of a review to refer, except in the most cursory manner, to the various interesting discussions to which Dr. Willshire's short introductory chapters give rise. Even a summary of the questions which are suggested by each several "Division" would fill more than our allotted space. The student must himself possess the book, and accept its guidance, though it is possible he may regret that the author has not in all cases expressed his conclusions with a sterner decision. He tells us in the introduction (p. 4) that

> In justice to himself he should ask the iconophilist to bear in mind that he has not intended to assume the possession of any "royal road" to knowledge, or to superciliously put aside the judgment of other men, often perhaps more qualified than he is himself to arrive at a legitimate conclusion on a debatable subject. But the nature of the work before him demanded some decisions from the labourer, and they have been necessarily adopted.

The charge which Dr. Willshire deprecates is the very last which we are disposed to bring. We think, on the contrary, that he has too often refrained from the "peremptory decision" which in these matters he is, beyond almost any one we know, justified in expressing. The proverbial non-existence of a "royal road" is as applicable to a knowledge of early prints as to every other branch of learning or research, but it would have been an advantage to the iconophilist, even while regarding a question as debatable, to be able to cast into one or other balance the conclusions to which a connoisseur, so well qualified by long observation and experience, has arrived. But the very fact of Dr. Willshire's avoidance of decision on some of the most interesting points which surround the study of early prints will convince the student that the problems connected with the introduction of the art of engraving are not all solved, and that there are, if not golden discoveries, yet many pleasant untrodden bypaths around the field into which volumes such as these invite him.

The origin of engraving is a question which has long exercised the minds of students. The steps which lead to a great discovery are, when we look back upon them, apparently so simple and so easy of ascent that our wonder is not that, at some special time and under the influence of some special intelligence, they should have been successfully trodden, but that they should ever have formed anything but a well-worn path. It is difficult for some of us in the present day to realize what interest there could be in life when type-printing was unknown, and the use of incised wood blocks or metal plates, for the purpose of repeating a design or drawing, was unthought of. We watch with something like impatience the gradual advancement of these sister arts, from their youthful days when, as described by Heinecken, "the woodcutter (Formschnieder) having designed the images of saints, found it easy to engrave historical pieces and entire sets of wood-engraving, and to add to them an explication engraved in the same manner in wood, whether for the instruction of youth, or to incite the people to devotion." It reads simply, yet in this we have the origin of our first printed books. The illustration and the explanatory legend, taken off mostly by friction from incised blocks of wood, is the process which led to the invention of typography. The successive steps to this end seem so obvious and natural that we may contentedly agree with Ottley in rejecting "the fancies and conjectures" of Heinecken, who would claim the sole merit of the great discovery for Gutenberg. We see how for his greater convenience the "Formschnieder," prompted by the frequent recurrence of some short word or termination or group of two or more letters, proceeded to cut them on the same shaft of wood or metal. The invention of single letters, strung on a thread to retain them in their place, quickly followed, and next a frame and screws to keep them in position. And yet all this was in its day a discovery quite as real as is the electric light in ours, and to those who have acquainted themselves with the history of the period, its ignorance, and its superstition, there is nothing strange or improbable in the story that when the celebrated printer Fust sold his Bibles in Paris as manuscript, the deception was not detected until his impeachment as a sorcerer compelled him to reveal his secret to save his life. The "art and mystery" of the engraver was approached by steps as slow and lingering, though apparently as easy, as were those of the printer, and, partly owing no doubt to the tardy invention of paper, many years elapsed from its first inception to the time when it had become a practical and recognized art. There is evidence that incised blocks were used for printing on silk and suchlike fabric towards the close of the twelfth century. "Playing cards" "Tarocci" were produced in Italy about the middle of the fourteenth. Prints en manière criblée and from wichi date from the earlier half of the fifteenth century. The earliest woodcut which bears a date is a "Hortus inclusus" of 1418, at Brussels (it is a print we know well, and though its inscription has been questioned, we do not hesitate to accept it); the second is the Buxheim St. Christopher of 1423, in the Spencer collection. The earliest copperplate engraving known with a date inscribed, 1446, is of German origin, one of seven subjects of a "Passion" series, absolutely unique, and now in the Museum at Berlin. It is represented by a photogravure as a frontispiece to Dr. Willshire's second volume; the reproduction of the "Mazarine" crucifixion, a print unquestionably of about the same time, 1440–50, forms the frontispiece to the first. But it is certain that these were not the first efforts of the nascent art. Dr. Willshire says:—"If we could see certain of the earliest predecessors of these prints, which have escaped us, they might be found less uncouth and Gothic than are their immediate successors, since it is probable that traces of the Byzantine characteristics of religious art would have pervaded them, instead of their being merely a craftsmanlike and vulgar translation of the principles of the schools of Flanders and Cologne." But these "earlier predecessors" would carry the art back a very little way. So also the evidence of superiority of design in some of the xylographs of the first edition of the Biblia Pauperum, while it supports the contention that they may have come from the very hand of Van Eyck himself, will only antedate the invention of engraving by a very few years; the woodcuts in the Légende de St. Gervais, if rightly attributed by M. Ruelens to the hand of Jan van Eyck, would hardly have been executed until after the death of Hubert in 1426. Thus the invention of engraving and the invention of printing, even if they did not seem to have proceeded pari passu, were sister arts, shading into each other by imperceptible degrees, and so closely allied that the one appears to us but the complement of the other.

Of engraving in its most intimate connexion with type-printing perhaps the most interesting examples described by Dr. Willshire are the work of an engraver, as yet anonymous and unrecognized, and only known to iconophilists by the title of "the Master of the Illustrations in Boccace." In our examination of his work we find ourselves transported into the workshop of no less eminent a person than Colard Mansion, the man who cast types on his own model for Caxton, and who instructed him in the art, while printing with and for him "The Recueyell" and the "Chess Book." The works of Boccatius were the most popular historical books of the fifteenth century. The account of the editions belongs rather to the history of printing; but there is one edition printed in 1476, of which a single example only is known, now in the collection of the Marquess of Lothian. This "Boccace," a folio of 289 leaves, has nine illustrations and a place left vacant for a tenth. It is the illustration which should accompany the sixth book which is wanting. It is partly for its rarity that this precious volume has acquired its reputation; but chiefly because it is not only the earliest book with engravings known to have been produced in the Netherlands, but as such it precedes the earliest printed book containing plates produced by Germany—namely, of the year 1479, or France in 1488, or Italy in 1477. Afterwards translated into English, it was printed by Lydgate 1527, with woodcut illustrations. To these, though far inferior to the metal-plate engravings from which they were copied, the student will probably devote more attention than to the "boke" itself, although it was "translated into Englissh by iohn ludgate, mōke of the monastery of Saint Edmūdes Bury, at the comaūdemēt of the worthy prynce humfrey duke of gloucestre. beginnynge at adam and endinge with iohn takē prisoner in fraunce by prynce Edwarde," a title whose naïve simplicity must surely have suggested that which Knickerbocker gave to his delightful History of New York "from the creation of the world to the end of the Dutch dynasty."

It must, however, be acknowledged that, viewed apart from the interest which surrounds the earliest dawn of this pleasant art, there is but little, either of excellence in form or skill in manipulation, with which to attract the gallery-haunting, picture-loving public. Nay, it is more than probable that even the more intelligent patrons of modern art, with their observation trained in later schools, would regard incunabula which the connoisseur cannot praise too fervently only with a kind of amused astonishment that they should be so esteemed. He would tell us—and we will treat his ignorance as tenderly as we trust he will respect what he thinks our infatuation—that finer and more effective evidences of the engraver's art are exhibited in a single year in this nineteenth century than all the Northern schools produced in the first fifty years of their existence; he would point to modern examples of wood and line engraving, more pure in quality of tone and in expression than anything which could then be compassed; and assure us that etching, that fashionable and facile art, in which even amateurs innocent of drawing may arrive at eminence, annually contributes to our portfolios charming effects in light and shade, which in actual worth, as well as in the continued pleasure they afford, surpass the whole school of early masters, known or "unrecognized"; and declare his conviction that every existing example of those "exceptional processes," empreintes en pâte or en manière criblée, though their very presence in a collection ensures almost reverence from the earnest iconophiliat, and their value, if they could be offered at Messrs. Sotheby's would exceed "a Jew's ransom," are, in point of real excellence, not to be compared with a fine portfolio of mezzotints after Sir Joshua. Yet to ourselves these slighted prints are ever infinitely precious, since in them we trace the tentative endeavours of an art whose earliest dawn coincided with an awakening of the human mind and an enlargement of its ideas, out of which have grown all the successes of to-day. All honour, then, to the Museum Trustees, and to the author of these volumes, in every endeavour they may make to enable the student to pursue his pleasant path with greater ease, and avail himself to a still greater extent of the treasures of the Print Room.

AN ITALIAN GRAMMAR.*

THIS is one of the best Italian grammars for general use which we have met with in English, if not the best of all. In the compass of about two hundred and fifty loosely printed pages it gives the student a clear and sufficiently full view of the Italian language. Most grammars err on the side of being too long. The learner's memory is burdened with a large amount of unnecessary matter, of matter which he will acquire naturally in the course of reading and conversation, but which only confuses him as a beginner. In such cases a good teacher has to correct the fault of the book by marking what is, and what is not, to be learned. Signor Perini appears to us to have succeeded in making his Grammar thorough and complete for all the purposes of the ordinary student, without doing too much. One point in it is to be especially commended. In most grammars the system commonly known as that of Ollendorf is used in the exercises given to the pupils. That is to say, first a series of sentences are given in Italian to be translated into English, and next a series of almost exactly similar sentences are given in English to be translated into Italian. So that when the pupil comes to the latter he has only to cast his eye back to the former in order to see how to finish his task. The value of the exercise is in this way greatly diminished. Signor Perini rightly confines his exercises to the translation of English into Italian, and they thus form a true test whether the pupil has mastered the preceding rules or not. As to the translation from Italian into English, the learner cannot too soon be given an easy book to read with the help of his dictionary and of explanations from his teacher. It is only at first that any explanations will be necessary. There is another excellent point about this Grammar. All students of Italian are aware that a chief difficulty of Italian pronunciation to a beginner lies in the right placing of the accent. In certain cases the accent is indicated, but in a very large number of cases it is not; and the student learns it only by hearing the word pronounced. But it constantly happens that, before hearing it spoken, he has already seen it printed, and has associated it with a false accentuation. In such cases, where there is a departure from the usual rule that in words where the accent is not indicated it falls on the penultimate syllable, Signor Perini marks its true place by printing one or more of the letters in the syllable to be accented in a type larger than the rest. This simple device makes any misunderstanding impossible. As to the arrangement of the different parts of the Grammar, each teacher will have his own methods; and the matter is not one of very great importance. Nevertheless, it seems more natural to take the verbs, or, at least, the regular verbs, all together, rather than, as Signor Perini does, to insert several chapters not bearing on the verbs at all between the first and the second conjugations. With regard to the modes of addressing people in Italian, Signor Perini recommends the use of "ella" and "elleno," rather than "lei" and "loro," though both are permissible. The latter, however, are surely more generally used at least among cultivated Italians. The Grammar may be safely recommended both as a school-book and to those who wish to teach themselves Italian. For the latter, indeed, it is certainly the best that we have seen.

DECISIVE BATTLES OF INDIA.*

IT is somewhat difficult to decide what is, and what is not, a "decisive battle." For how long after the event must its effects continue to allow of a battle being termed "decisive"? Professor Creasy, in his "fifteen decisive battles of the world," has included Zama and Waterloo. The former of these sealed the fate for all ages of a great people. But only thirty-six years elapsed after Waterloo before the Napoleonic dynasty was re-established in France, although the proscription for all time of that dynasty was the immediate and most important result of the conflict. In another sense, no general ever achieved more decisive results on the battle-field than Napoleon; yet, because those results were felt for only a few years, not one of Napoleon's battles, with the exception of Waterloo, is included in Creasy's list. We quite agree with Colonel Malleson that the importance of a battle is not to be judged by the number of the slain. Some of the most sanguinary conflicts on record—for instance, Eylau and Borodino—were singularly bootless of results, either military or political. On the other hand, only fifty Frenchmen fell in the fight at Kávéripák; yet the British gained by that victory a preponderance which they never after entirely lost. That combat settled for ever the pretensions of the French in Southern India. It has nevertheless been passed over with singular neglect, considering the importance of its issues, by such historians as Mill and Thornton, by Malcolm, and even by Macaulay. Colonel Malleson has perhaps defined with correctness what should be understood by the term "decisive battle"—one that "is decisive of the campaign, decisive as to the consequences, decisive as to the future permanent position of the combatants."

When we consider the gigantic Empire we have created for ourselves in India—the vast area our arms and diplomacy have opened out for our commerce, our missionaries, and for the career of the youth of our over-populated island—we are struck by the smallness of the means which have produced such great results. At no time, probably, have we ever had at once more than 60,000 British soldiers on the soil of India. But in the first instance the numbers, when we remember what they achieved, seem ludicrously inadequate. Fortunately for us the French under-estimated also the importance of the prize they desired to win, so that as against them the decisive battles of India were fought by battalions on either side and not by armies. At the battle of St. Thomé—a victory against natives only, but one which changed the fate of Southern India, and made European traders the masters—the French numbered but two hundred and thirty men. It was that battle which brought the French and English face to face in the Carnatic. The mention of the Carnatic reminds us that Colonel Malleson spells all proper names after the orthodox Indian fashion; but it is irritating to find words which have been Anglicized for decades altered for the sake of preserving a pedantic uniformity. Karnátak has replaced Carnatic, Trichinopoly is now Trichinápalli, Ferozeshah is converted into Fíruzshahar, and some names are so twisted that we can barely recognize them. To return, the contest in the Carnatic took almost at the outset the form of a duel between two men, both men of consummate genius, Clive and Dupleix. Never was genius left so much to shift for itself. In the fight which, as we have said, was the most important in its issues of all the struggles between British and French in Hindostan, the former numbered only 380 European soldiers with six guns, while the latter had 400 Europeans with nine guns. But though Kávéripák decided who were to be masters in Southern India, much remained yet to do, and that much was done when Plassey was won. "Plassey," writes Colonel Malleson, "was a very decisive battle." It was gained by 950 European infantry, of whom 700 were British, and 50 British sailors, with six very small guns and two small howitzers. The loss of the victors was seven Europeans killed and thirteen wounded. It is no wonder that French historians to this day write bitterly as they reflect on the myriad lives sacrificed in insensate and disastrous wars nearer home, when, had only one or two battalions more been sent out in response to the earnest entreaties of those in India who were in a position to know, the empire of the East might have been preserved to France. "As a victory Plassey was, in its consequences, perhaps the greatest ever gained." The effects of it are felt this day by more than two hundred and fifty millions of people. From the very morrow of the victory the English became virtual masters of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa. They became the greatest Mohammedan Power in the world.

> It was Plassey which necessitated the conquest and colonization of the Cape of Good Hope, of the Mauritius, the protectorship over Egypt; Plassey which gave the English middle classes the finest field for the development of their talent and industry the world has ever known; to the aristocracy unrivalled opportunities for the display of administrative power; to merchants and manufacturers customers whose enormous demands almost compensate for the hostile tariffs of rivals; . . . it was Plassey which, in its consequences, brought consolation to this little island for the loss of America; and which, whilst in those consequences it has concentrated upon it the envy of the other nations of Europe, has given to her children the sense of responsibility, of the necessity of maintaining a great position, the conviction of which underlies the thought of every true Englishman.

When the French were virtually disposed of, the business of subjugating Southern India had to begin well-nigh again. In the decay of the Mogul Empire an adventurer of commanding talents had usurped authority in the Hindú kingdom which had existed on the highland plateau overlooking the Carnatic towards the East and the sea-coast towards the West. By degrees this man, Hyder Ali, absorbed all the native States within his reach, and at length resolved on making a supreme effort to become master of all India south of the Krishna. It was not till the hard-fought victory of Porto Novo was won that the first check was given to the conquering career of Hyder Ali, and time secured to the English for the accumulation of their resources.'

After the invader had been forced to retire within the limits of his dominions, the English were brought face to face with the Maráthás. "The aggressive action of those hardy warriors had, even in the time of Auranzíb, shaken the Mogul Empire to its very basis. After the death of that sovereign they, too, began to dream of universal dominion. . . . Masters of the Imperial cities of Delhi and Agra, of the North-Western Provinces as far Aligarh, they at length beheld before them only two possible rivals—one of them, indeed, the Sikhs, almost too young to be seriously regarded as a rival—and the English, ruling from the mouths of the Ganges to Cawnpore, and possessors of Bombay and Madras." But for the fact that at the crisis of their destiny the Maráthas were deprived of their renowned leader, Madhají Sindia—by far the most remarkable man whom India produced in the last century—and for circumstances which kept a considerable portion of the Maráthá Confederacy from engaging in the struggle, it might have fared ill with the English. It was a fight for supremacy through the length and breadth of Hindostan. "For Southern and Western India the question was decided at Assaye; for Northern India at Laswárí."

The result of the successful issue of the Maráthá war was the extension of the English frontier almost to the Sutlej. Fortunate was it for us that we became neighbours of the Sikhs at a time when they were, through internal dissensions, unable to put forth their undivided strength against us. Ranjit Singh—the one man who, by virtue of his commanding ability and absolute influence with his people, might not improbably have met the English on equal terms, had just died, and his kingdom had become the prey of rival factions. When the inevitable war broke out the Sikh army, incompetently and treacherously led and miserably officered, succumbed to our better trained and disciplined battalions; but such was the fighting of those splendid soldiers that officers who had seen Albuera and Salamanca and Fuentes d'Onor declared that no battle in Spain was as fiercely contested as was Ferozeshah. "That battle shook the edifice of British dominion in India to its very basis, and impressed our native soldiers with the conviction that the English were not invincible." The Sikh defeat, however, virtually decided the campaign for the time being, for Sobraon was but the complement of Feroze-hah The result of these victories was that the English Government assumed a protectorate over the Punjab during the minority of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, and British officers were nominated with full authority to direct and control all matters in every department of the State.

But the peace was a patched-up peace. The Sikh people had only yielded for the time being. Now they bided their time and waited till an opportunity should arise for striking another blow—this time not for empire but for independence. On our side, with scarcely an exception, not one man in authority apprehended the situation. "The arrangements made with respect to the Punjab were so perfect, the contentment of the people was so assured, the reforms introduced by the English were so popular, that it was heresy to dream of Sikh disaffection. And in point of fact no one on the spot did dream of it." The awakening was a rough one. An outbreak occurred suddenly one day in the hottest season of the year—the time having been deliberately chosen—at Mooltan. The Controller of the Punjab, Sir Frederick Currie, made light of it. When, at another place, two days later, a second outbreak occurred, Currie was as far off as ever from arriving at a just conclusion. He contented himself with directing the Sikh troops at Lahore to co-operate against the malcontents with the British troops at that station. But the Sikhs refused to act. It was necessary therefore to begin operations against Mooltan with British troops only; but the siege was not undertaken till the beginning of autumn. Almost simultaneously with the opening of the besiegers' batteries that portion of the Sikh army which had till then ostensibly held aloof gave its adhesion to the national movement. Thereupon Lord Dalhousie, Governor-General of India, declared that, as the Sikh people wished for war, "they should have it with a vengeance." Lord Gough, the Commander-in-Chief, assumed command of the "army of the Punjab," as it was styled. Then followed the battles of Chillianwallah and Gujrat, which closed the era of Sikh independence. The story of Chillianwallah is admirably told by Colonel Malleson, as indeed is the story of each one of the battles in this book. "The judgment formed after a lapse of more than thirty years, when time and death have assuaged all the passions of the period, is that no British general ever fought a battle so badly as Lord Gough fought Chillianwallah. It was throughout a day of blunders." Fortunately, the Sikh commander was as little skilful as his antagonist. Lord Gough's generalship is severely dealt with by the author, but not unduly so. The Sikhs were just the kind of foes against whom manœuvres would tell more than direct blows. But Lord Gough was nothing if not a fighting general. In the hour of battle all ideas of strategy, of tactics, of the plan of the campaign, vanished from his mind. He had adopted an excellent plan—not his own—for fighting the battle; but when the moment came for putting it into practice the theory was altogether lost sight of. The Sikh leader wished to bring matters to a crisis, and "knowing the temperament of the British commander that the fire of artillery was the music which would make him dance, he despatched to the front a few light guns, and opened fire on the British position. The fire was distant and the effect innocuous, but the insult roused the hot Irish blood of the commander of the English army. It 'drew' him, in fact, precisely in the manner designed. . . . Wild with excitement, Lord Gough ordered his infantry to advance and charge the enemy's batteries." In the end, the battle so recklessly engaged was won, but "the victory was certainly of a Pyrrhean character." For the British retired from the field, to win which had cost them, in killed and wounded, 89 officers and 2,357 men; and they left behind them several standards, six guns, and all their dead. We have not space to refer to Gujrat, a battle which was the complement of Chillianwallah, as Sobraon had been that of Ferozeshah. The Punjab was now finally annexed. "Against the annexation," concludes Colonel Malleson, "I do not venture a single word. It must have come sooner or later, and it was better to take it after a fair fight than to steal it in the manner we adopted towards Oude some five years later. But for the guiltless boy, for the young Maharajah, of whose interests we were the guardian, surely some fitting provision should have been made. Granted that we did well to take his kingdom, by what right did we annex his private estates? This is a question in which the honour of the country is concerned. It behoves it also to demand whether a pension for one uncertain life is sufficient compensation for the loss of a great position and the forfeiture of inalienable private property."

We know of no book so well calculated as is the one we are noticing for giving the student a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the successive steps taken in conquering for ourselves the Empire of Hindostan. It is not simply the story of so many decisive battles. The causes which led to each war are set forth, and the connexion between successive wars is clearly shown. The author has consulted "as far as possible original documents, or the writings published and unpublished of contemporaries"; and, to judge by the list of such given, the labour of composing this excellent work must have been very considerable.

RECENT MUSIC.

THOSE who are admirers of M. Planquette's charming music, and we are sure their number is not small, will be glad to hear that Messrs. Metzler & Co. have published in sheet-music form most of the best songs in that composer's sparkling little opera Nell Gwynne, which bids fair to rival, if not to surpass, his other very successful work, Les Cloches de Corneville. M. Planquette's music, if not always comparable to that of the late M. Offenbach, is at any rate at times an admirable substitute for it; and, though occasionally somewhat commonplace in form, his work is generally influenced by the spirit of the great composer of opera-bouffe. If opera-bouffe is not to be a thing of the past, it is greatly due to M. Planquette's labours that it has survived; for, with the exception of his work, scarcely any of the later attempts in this style of opera can be considered deserving of success. Of the eight songs which Messrs. Metzler & Co. have sent us, it is scarcely necessary to do more than give their names, as the music is already so well known and appreciated. They are the following:—Nell Gwynne's three songs, "Only an Orange Girl," "First Love," and the rustic Rondo, "A work-a-day life's hard," all excellent in their several styles; "The Song of the Clock," "Illusions," and "The Trysting Tree"; the beautiful serenade, "Sweetheart, if thou be nigh," and "Once upon a time." Besides these songs, we have also "A Fantasia" upon the airs in the opera from the prolific pen of Mr. Sydney Smith, in which are introduced, in a very pleasing manner, nearly all the above-mentioned songs, as well as the stately "Pavanne" and the "Gipsy music." As a natural consequence also the opera has taken shape as dance music, and Mr. Charles Coote's Nell Gwynne Polka and Quadrille, and Liddell's Nell Gwynne Galop, Waltz, and Lancers will be welcome additions to the ball-room répertoire of the present season.

Messrs. Enoch & Sons have sent us a budget of songs, all of which are considerably above the average. "The Silent Keys," by Signor Ciro Pinsuti, to words by Mr. Hugh Conway, is a touching little song, which shows the hand of a talented artist, who, from very slender materials, has succeeded in producing an effective and highly-pleasing piece of work; and the same may be said of Mr. Joseph L. Roeckel's "Roses all the way," which, like all his other productions, is full of grace and beauty, and not hampered by an elaborate accompaniment. To some very pretty words by Miss Mark Lemon, entitled "Old Times," Mr. Milton Wellings has set some excellent music, and we feel certain that this song has only to be heard to achieve success, as it is a very charming specimen of its kind. Mr. Berthold Tours is so well known and admired as a scholarly composer that his name alone is sufficient to guarantee the value of a song from his pen; but we think that he has seldom produced a more pleasing and effective composition than "Unforgotten," a song which we have no doubt will command the success it deserves, and enhance his already well-earned reputation. "Jack of 'Ours,'" by Mr. Frederic N. Löhr, is dedicated to "the officers in the British Army," and is a not unsuccessful attempt at a military lyric very much in the same spirit as the many naval lyrics which have appeared of late. It is, perhaps, as well that the army should have its turn as well as the navy, and it is but fair that the military man should be allowed to assert as he does in this song:—

> Merrily, lads, so-ho! They may talk of a life at sea;
> But a life on land, with a sword in hand,
> Is the life, my lads, for me.

From the same publishers we have also two pieces of dance music, "The Old Look Waltz," by Mr. Georges Lamothe, and "Fairy Land Waltz," by Mr. R. E. Batho, both effective and good of their kind.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

EUROPEAN travellers in America have often noticed as a singular and somewhat depressing characteristic of the vast woodlands that occupy so large a part of the surface, even in the oldest and most extensively cultivated States, the rarity of song-birds. This may be ascribable in great part to the existence of enemies which in England and in great part of Europe have been exterminated, or so limited in number that to the great majority of their natural victims they are scarcely more familiar than to man himself. Comparatively little as they are heard and seen, nevertheless the wild birds of the Northern Atlantic States are numerous and various; and it is their very variety, the non-intervention of man in their constant mutual hostilities, that keeps down their number. American ornithologists have a wider scope, a much more extensive zoological as well as geographical range, than their rivals in Western Europe. If they have to go further afield for the common, they have no great difficulty in finding specimens even of the rarer kinds; may study at leisure the character, haunts, and habits of species, and even of genera, scarcely to be found nowadays save in the remotest nooks and corners of Western Europe. We have noticed more than one ornithological work profoundly interesting even to the ordinary reader, dealing exclusively with the birds of New England or the Northern seaboard. But Mr. Samuels's account of the Northern and Eastern Birds (1), the natives and visitants of the North-Eastern States and British provinces, is none the less welcome that it has had several excellent predecessors. It contains of course all the technical information that is interesting and fully intelligible only to professed students of natural history; but it gives also a mass of interesting and curious facts, of anecdote and observation, gathered from the author's own experience or from the works of others—naturalists, specialists, and sportsmen—equally valuable in a scientific aspect, and attractive to those who take up the volume in simple curiosity, or to amuse a leisure hour. The engravings and tinted illustrations exhibit a great variety of well-chosen examples, representative of every principal class of American birds in characteristic attitudes, the shape, size, and colour of their eggs; and add greatly to the interest, and yet more perhaps to the instructiveness, of the work.

Mr. Tryon's treatise on Conchology (2), of which the first volume only is before us, belongs to the class of technical scientific works, and should be of the greatest interest to the advanced naturalist. To say this is to say that it is not intended for the beginner or the general reader.

Dr. Wharton's Commentaries on Law (3) fills a place intermediate between the technical works, which only a professional student would care to attempt, and those general treatises on the principles and philosophy of law which are even more useful as part of a thorough general education than as the basis of professional training. His chapters on the History of American and English Law and on the Law of Nations afford, in fairly popular language, in a sufficiently readable style, and in reasonable bulk, just that general knowledge of the principles and origin of law, as a lawyer of the United States has to deal with it, which is indispensable to any thorough and intelligent appreciation of the common law of the States and of the Codes with which we believe most of the older States are now furnished. On one point especially Dr. Wharton's views possess a grave and direct political interest for English readers. He reviews at great length, with considerable care, and with the more historical fairness that his practical conclusion repudiates the reasonings and the position of his countrymen, the rules laid down for, as well as those established by, the Geneva Arbitration. That the case was decided upon principles which had never before been recognized by either of the contending parties, or indeed by the States from which the arbitrators were taken, that the contention of the American Government contradicted all American traditions, renounced all those neutral claims of which America had been the strongest asserter, and carried the pretensions of belligerency further than England, as the strongest of maritime belligerents, had ever pushed them, Dr. Wharton holds as strongly, argues as cogently, as Chief Justice Cockburn himself. That neither England nor the Union is bound in future either by the rules or the decision is a somewhat startling inference, but one for which the author has much to say, and important authority, English as well as American, to allege.

The Records of Living Officers of the United States Army (4) is a work which, as preserving the names and the claims of American officers, is of course profoundly interesting to the American services, and may form the groundwork of an annual or periodical handbook.

Mr. Bowker's little manual on Work and Wealth (5) is not an elementary economical treatise, but rather a practical application of familiar economical principles to a few of the more familiar phenomena of social, commercial, and industrial life; for example, the functions of banks, the use of money, the nature of rent, and the distinctions between agricultural and city rents, and other points on which misconception and confusion are apt to prevail, and liable nowadays to produce no little practical mischief in countries governed, like England, France, and America, by the votes of the proletariat.

By co-operative housekeeping (6) Mrs. Peirce means something more than that which has been so largely achieved in this country of late by Co-operative Stores of every kind; but this is the main, or at least the first, object she has in view, this she would have her neighbours attempt and achieve in the first instance.

A ponderous volume published by the State Board of Agriculture sets forth the resources industrial and social of South Carolina (7), the last of the Southern States which is likely to attract either capital or industry from without. A more interesting little handbook sets forth the industrial, sporting, and social attractions of Florida (8), the market-garden of the Union, perhaps at no distant period the semi-tropical orchard of the world. Florida can send ripe fruit and vegetables northward at the beginning of April. Her rapidly-spreading orange-groves promise a quiet, easy, and certain method of attaining fortune in the course of twenty years to those who can start with an adequate capital and wait for its return. Her climate, her soil, her rapidly-improving social condition, render her, to adventurers who lack the moral or physical hardihood demanded by sheep-farming, cattle-raising, or corn-growing on the great scale, as well as to those who are simply seeking a pleasant home and refuge from the severe winters of the North, the most attractive of the younger States; while her scenery, in its beauty and its utterly exceptional character, the simple hospitality of her people, and the growing facilities of travel, are certain to draw thither a constantly increasing stream of winter visitors.

Mr. Conkling has written a Guide to Mexico (9), which will be of use and interest to intending and to experienced travellers.

Mr. Deming's Byways of Nature and Life (10) is a collection of articles contributed to the New York Evening Post—articles whose style, substance, and variety testify to capacities which should achieve for its author a very considerable professional success. Few journalists, not many of the most successful correspondents, could write so well upon such a variety of topics. British elections and London fogs; the giant tides and "bores" of the Bay of Fundy; seal-hunting in the Arctic and deep-fishing in tropical seas; the sponge-fisheries of Bahama and the cod-fisheries of Newfoundland; subterranean waters and Mississippian navigation; the social condition and political troubles of the Southern States—are all treated in the same sensible, practical, readable style. Upon sport, and especially upon sea-fishing, Mr. Deming is most at home; but upon natural scenery and popular science, and even on politics, he is seldom at a loss.

Mr. Mead's account of Martin Luther (11) is, of course, one of the innumerable products of the late Tercentenary.

A treatise on historical teaching (12), by a number of historical professors, contains, as might be expected, interesting and instructive matter.

Miss Evans's Laura (13) and Miss Litchfield's Only. an Incident (14) are both above the average level of cheap American novels.

FRENCH LITERATURE

ADMIRAL JURIEN DE LA GRAVIERE is indefatigable in his studies of ancient military and naval affairs; and his Campagnes d'Alexandre (1), now presented to the reader in five neat and compact volumes (with a map in each, which is, we regret to say, a great deal better than anything to be found in English books of anything like the same price), is a very creditable and interesting monument of industry. The Admiral, as is known to his readers, has a happy, if somewhat garrulous, knack of comparing old things with new which adds considerably to the interest of his books. He compares Alexander's Punjab experiences with Chillianwallah, not, it need hardly be said, to the advantage of Lord Gough, but in no unfriendly spirit to Englishmen; he follows the voyage of Nearchus with abundant erudition, as well as with a careful eye to places, and nobody will be surprised to hear that he is fertile in parallels between Alexander and the First Napoleon. Perhaps more copious citation of chapter and verse from the original authorities might be desirable, but that is not the older French fashion. In that fashion the Admiral has produced a readable, instructive, and by no means unamusing book.

M. d'Avenel's book on Richelieu et la monarchie absolue (2) is somewhat oddly named. It is in reality a long, careful, and valuable summary of the political and economic condition of France at the moment when the great Cardinal changed its state and constitution. The King and his prerogatives, the chief officers of State, the various forms of popular or class representation which survived in the early days of the seventeenth century, the gradual exaltation of the monarchical principle, fill the first book. The second treats of the extremely complicated subject of the noblesse, its rights, functions, and titles, the customs which regulated its succession and property, its habits of living, its amusements, its language, &c. Finally, M. d'Avenel discusses the causes of its decadence. The third book passes to the civil service, and discusses it in the same minute way. The whole fills two stout volumes, and there are two more to come. So vast a mass of matter naturally defies criticism in detail. But where we have examined M. d'Avenel minutely he stands the test very well; he is evidently very well read in unpublished as well as published authorities, and he uses his reading with judgment and writes with clearness.

We have to notice two new parts of M. Vivien de St.-Martin's vast Gazetteer (3), which has reached the article "Jau-iers."

The first volume (nine hundred closely-printed and frequently illustrated pages of double columns) of the supplement of M. Wurtz's Chemical Dictionary (4), the body of which already forms five stout volumes, has appeared.

M. Richet's "Psychological and Physiological Fragments" (5), as the more modest sub-title of his book runs, consists of essays on subjects such as mesmerism, intoxication, alcoholic and other, demoniacal possession, and the like. They are purely materialist in tone, and not remarkably subtle in explanation; but they are not without merit as collections of facts with a kind of common-sense commentary.

Monseigneur Maret (though by the way one of his chief opponents holds, and we think rightly, that general usage is wrong in employing the term Monseigneur except in the vocative) has in his Vérité catholique (6) surveyed the teachers of the age, from Hegel to Büchner, and from Comte to M. Renan, of course from a strictly orthodox standpoint.

Very good things may be said of M. Mainard's capital little treatise on versification in M. Lemerre's school series (7). It costs but a franc and a half, and henceforward "Hadst thou not fifteen pence?" will be a sore question to a bad versifier in French. Varieties of rhymes and rhythms, a dictionary of syllabic pronunciation, notes on cæsuræ, and the like, duly occur, and there is the famous list of rhymes unrhymable, such as "fourche" and "sceptre,' and the like. One of these, by the way, in the present fancy of Frenchmen for Gallicizing foreign words, might be made to vanish from the list. There is no exact French equivalent for "scamper," and the naturalizing of it as a verb would at once supply the singleness of "pampre" with a consort. As thus:—

A travers ce beau pampre
Le faune agreste scampre.

But this is only a humble suggestion derived from the very extraordinary vocabulary of some modern French books.

We are glad to see that the Tentation (8), perhaps the most pocketable of all Flaubert's books, has made its appearance in M. Lemerre's Petite bibliothique littéraire.

Every one who has seen it and every one who has not ought to be glad to hear of the reimpression of M. Robida's charmingly extravagant and nonsensical Tour enchantée (9). It is, as we can testify from experiments duly made, equally welcome to small children who cannot read French and to large children who can.

Some of our readers may be surprised to find us reviewing Louvet's questionable "Chevalier" (10); indeed, M. Jouaust ingenuously confesses that he is rather surprised to find himself printing it. His excuse that his reprint is very dear (which it is) does not strike us as a triumph either of ethics or logic, and his tu quoque, addressed apparently to the Naturalists, though perfectly justified in fact, is not an excuse, for two blacks do not make a white. But it is true that Faublas is something of a classic, and, as Carlyle has it, a "symptom of much" in French history; it is also true that its sins against decency have been a little exaggerated, and it is most true of all (though M. Jouaust does not say so) that its intolerable deal of verbiage and sentimental rubbish to a halfpenny worth of obscenity make it a very tough morsel for amateurs of that kind of matter.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MOST people of a modest turn of mind will think that Mr. Buckland is very moderate in saying that "there are two different classes of people who know very little about India"(1). If by this he means only two, he is certainly complimenting us all very much, for it is the sad truth that there are many besides "your old Indian who knows only one Presidency," and "your real rural Englishman," the two ignorant persons instanced by Mr. Buckland, who have a plentiful lack of knowledge on this subject. There is consolation, however, in learning that this ignorance is not without excuse. Mr. Buckland says himself that India is not easy to know. The reader who is as anxious to correct his defects in this respect as he ought to be will find that he can do it very pleasantly with the help of this book. A great deal of what Mr. Buckland has to say about the organization of our administration in Bengal, for he scarcely touches on the other Presidencies, has already been said by Colonel Chesney, in his standard work on Indian Polity, but it will bear re-telling. There is more originality in the chapters on the "Social Life" of the country. The author gives a good deal of space to the unofficial part of the English community; and at the end there is a chapter on "Native Life" which shows clearly enough how hard it is for an Englishman to learn anything beyond the mere surface about the people he has to live among.

It can scarcely happen to any man who labours with pen and ink to enjoy better luck in one respect than has befallen Mr. Genung. His study of In Memoriam (2) makes a little volume such as rarely gladdens the heart of any author who publishes in England. In respect of printing, paper, and margin it is a credit to Messrs. Macmillan. Mr. Genung's study itself will be found useful, and esteemed accordingly, by people who have a guilty feeling that they do not in the least know what In Memoriam is all about, and who would like to be instructed. He describes the poem, divides it into a first, secondly, thirdly, and to conclude, reduces many of the stanzas to the plainest prose, and withal points out "those inquiries concerning God and man and unseen things which fulfil the deeper purposes of In Memoriam."

Every line of the Notes on Painters and Painting (3) made by Mr. McCraig, banker at Oban, is entitled to careful study. Like a true lover of the beautiful, he begins by bursting into verse. "Artists and poets," he says, about the middle of his poetical introduction:—

Artists and poets have a sense of right,
A keen sense of virtue and honour bright;
Artists and poets, with their feelings keen,
Distinguish the right and wrong in the scene.

Argal, they are helping forward the happy time coming when "life eternal shall still be the goal, The end and reward of the pious soul. And may this my song be, the morning star, To herald this glorious dawn afar." We share in Mr. McCraig's pious wish, though not with much confidence. His criticism, when he reaches it, with this "right butter woman's rank to market," is scarcely so superior as his lofty ideas about art lead the reader to expect. He finds the statue of Diogenes "a most striking one, and almost a perfect likeness of the late Mr. Potter, director of the City of Glasgow Bank." The statue of Pericles "is a perfect dandy—tall, slender, graceful, with a most delightful expression of face—the very image of a young linendraper from New York we met at the ball-room of the Grand Hotel, Nice, of the name of Richardson."

Joyful through Hope (4) is the history of a worthy young lady named Hope, who marries a clergyman with a poor living, and finds how hard it is to get along with three hundred a year when you have eight children and various other relations to look after. Hope, however, keeps a smiling face, and is even equal to making Irish stew without meat. To such a woman all things are possible. A better living comes, the wicked are converted, and Hope ends with her constitution still unimpaired.

Mr. Watt's History of a Lump of Iron (5) is a fair specimen of the science-made-easy style of book so common nowadays.

While Dr. Murray's great Dictionary is being completed a sale should be found for a new edition of Dr. Stormonth's Dictionary of the English Language (6), which is being revised and enlarged.

A great addition to our knowledge of the statistics of India is made by the publication of the second and third volumes of the Census of the Panjáb (7).

Our list of reprints includes a neat paper-bound edition of the Lays of Ancient Rome (8), and two very pretty volumes of the poetry of Mr. J. Brent (9). Mr. Grindon's Scripture Botany (10) belongs also to the class of reprints, as it is a collection of articles which have already appeared in newspapers or magazines. The author has carefully revised them, however. Mr. William Graham's Creed of Science (11) has reached its second edition; and so has Mr. Proctor's treatise on The Management and Treatment of the Horse (12). The reader of magazines and newspapers blessed with a long memory will recognize some old acquaintances in Mrs. Lynn Linton's "Essays on Women" (13). A complete edition of the works by the author of The Pilgrim and the Shrine (14) is being published by Messrs. Tinsley Brothers.

Mr. Charles Kent has torn handfuls out of Dickens's novels to make a collection of "Humour and Pathos" (15). This style of book has been judged and condemned long ago; but editors will always be found to make them, and it is only too probable that readers will long be found to encourage them.

Pontes (16) is the name given by its authors, S. A. D. and E. L., to a slim little school book intended to introduce the schoolboy in the gentlest possible manner to a knowledge of the Latin tongue.

Miss Yonge has subjected two of Shakspeare's plays, King Henry the Fifth and King Richard the Second (17), to the pruning required to fit them for reading in schools. Each play is supplied with an historical introduction and a summary.

Mr. Nichol's Tables of European History (18) has reached its third edition.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 Regent Street, London, W.
City Branch—15 Cornhill, E.C. Founded 1806.
REPORT of the DIRECTORS, presented at the 78th ANNUAL MEETING at the Office, on Wednesday, January 30, 1884.

The Directors have to report that the transactions of the Provident Life Office during the year 1883 have been highly satisfactory.
Proposals for new Assurances amounting to £670,080 were received. Policies for £575,520 were issued and taken up, yielding new annual Premiums amounting to £19,770, as against £18,211 for the previous year. These Assurances and new annual Premiums respectively represent the actual net amounts. No re-assurances were effected during the year.
The Proposals, declined and not completed, amounted to £107,560.
The Claims for the year were £152,253, being £29,415 more than the corresponding sum for 1882.
The annual Income is now £310,371, being an increase of £9,308.
During the year the sum of £19,020 was paid for the surrender of Policies. The values paid upon Bonus Policies ranged from 45 per cent.—the minimum surrender value—to as much as 93 per cent. of the Premiums received.
The total Funds of the Office on December 31 last were £2,433,284, being an increase of £94,197, a result very satisfactory considering the special extra payments required to be made on account of the recent division of Profits. The average interest realized was £4 8s. 6d. per cent., as against £4 4s. during 1882.
The large measure of public support received by the Provident Life Office—as shown in the still increasing amount of new business—is gratifying evidence that persons desirous of effecting Assurances are wisely alive to the advantages given by an Office which has all the experience to be gained from a successful existence of seventy-eight years, and which is ready to adapt its practice to the requirements of the present day.

THE SOCIALIST AGITATION.

This day, post 8vo. 6s.

PROPERTY and PROGRESS; or, Facts against Fallacies. A reprint of three Articles from the "Quarterly Review," containing a brief Enquiry into Contemporary Social Agitation in England. By W. H. MALLOCK.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

Medium 8vo. cloth, 12s.

GLOSSARY OF TERMS AND PHRASES.

Edited by Rev. H. PERCY SMITH, M.A.

Assisted by the Rev. Sir GEORGE W. COX, Bart., M.A., the Rev. Prof. TWISDEN, M.A., C. A. M. FENNELL, M.A., Colonel W. PATERSON, the Rev. C. P. MILNER, and others.

The SATURDAY REVIEW says: "There are on every page a great number of words which it is no shame for the best educated not to know, because they belong to technical, not literary, language. We believe, in short, that almost everything which can be reasonably expected to be found in a dictionary will be found here."

The SPECTATOR says: "The utility of the book is manifest; that it is done by competent hands, we do not doubt. The reputation of the writers is sufficient guarantee, and all our examination of the items has tended to confirm the belief. The scholarship in particular, so generally deficient in books of this kind, is exact."

The ACADEMY says: "An immense deal of trouble has been bestowed on its preparation, both in collecting information and in condensing it for use. In one sense it may almost be called an original work, and not a mere compilation."

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

NORFOLK BROADS and RIVERS; or, the Waterways, Lagoons, and Decoys of East Anglia. By C. C. DAVIES. Post 8vo. Illustrated with 12 Full-page Plates, 14s.

"An excellent modern account of the whole district, with sketches of its birds and fish, and of the many curious old fishermen and gunners who manage to gain a precarious livelihood in it. The book is well written and well illustrated."—Athenæum.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A LADY'S DRIVE FROM FLORENCE TO CHERBOURG."

SANTO, LUCIA, & CO. in AUSTRIA. By RILA HUNTER. Crown 8vo. with Frontispiece and Map, 5s.

"All those who came across, last year, the little volume in which Miss Hunter narrated her adventurous drive from Florence to Cherbourg, will not deprive themselves of reading what we might call this continuation.....The book is a genuine book; and we venture to guarantee that no one who takes it up will regret to have followed our recommendation."—Academy.

This day is published.

READINGS in RABELAIS. By WALTER BESANT. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"Mr. Besant's 'Readings in Rabelais' constitutes the best attempt that has been made, or is likely to be made, to render Rabelais accessible and palatable to the general reader. The selection is made with equal care and judgment, and the result is a book that is as pleasant to read as it is edifying in perusal. Those best acquainted with Rabelais can scarcely have suspected that the discharge of all the coarseness would leave a residuum so palatable and so fresh."—Athenæum.

This day is published.

LEIBNIZ. By JOHN THEODORE MERZ. Being the New Volume of "Blackwood's Philosophical Classics for English Readers." Crown 8vo. with Portrait, 3s. 6d.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "POST MORTEM."

SIMIOCRACY: a Fragment from Future History. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

"There is considerable power of ingenuity as well as humour shown in the working out of the author's fragments from future history. We have had many such fragments already, but we doubt if any contribution to this popular branch of literature is so effective."—John Bull.

THE APPARITION. Crown 8vo. with Frontispiece, 5s.

"It is a good and well-written ghost story.....The story is told with a certain quaint humour and point, and with some pleasant reminiscences of old-fashioned manners."—Daily News.

CHRONICLES of NEWGATE. By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS, H.M.'s Inspector of Prisons. New Edition, 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Illustrations, 16s.

"Major Griffiths's volumes will long continue to be the standard work on a painful subject, such as few men could have handled with so much good feeling and delicacy, and deserves to be read by all students of our modern sociology who are inclined to question whether the progress of society in mercy and nobility of sentiment is or is not a fact."—Athenæum.

NEW NOVEL BY MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED.

Next week, 2 vols.

ZERO:

A Story of Monte Carlo.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

INTRODUCED to SOCIETY. By HAMILTON AIDÉ, Author of "Rita" &c. 2 vols.

"The book is avowedly a 'society' story, and the vices of worldly life are not passed unnoted. But it is a story healthy in tone and intention. The style is pure, reflecting delicacy and refinement of sentiment and conception."—Daily News.

HENRY NIGHTINGALE: a Novel. By J. W. SHERER. 3 vols.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED, 11 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

THIRD AND CHEAPER EDITION, 1 vol. 6s.

THE BRANDRETHS. By the Right Hon. A. J. B. BERESFORD HOPE, M.P., Author of "Strictly Tied Up."

From the ATHENÆUM.

"'The Brandreths' is a pleasant book to read. It is an unusual treat to the reader to find himself in the company of a man of the world who is also a man of knowledge and culture, and who possesses the power of writing with ease and with point. Mr. Hope's pictures of society and his analyses of character are all excellent. The political sketches and allusions are made with a good deal of humour."

From the SPECTATOR.

"'The Brandreths' has all the charm of its predecessor. The great attraction of the novel is the easy, conversational, knowledgeable tone of it; the sketching from the life, and yet not so close to the life as to be malicious, men, women, periods, and events to all of which intelligent readers can fit a name. The political and social sketches will naturally excite the chief interest among readers who will be attracted by the author's name and experience."

From the ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"'The Brandreths' is a clever and entertaining book. It contains much clever and picturesque writing. There is considerable skill, also, in the delineation of character, and the dialogue is natural and easy, pointed and witty. Mr. Beresford Hope draws largely from his experience of political and social life; and as a society novel his book has all the superiority to ordinary fictions of this class which may be derived from familiarity with the scenes and the people described."

From the STANDARD.

"There are many sayings in this work—many wise, many witty, many tender, many noble sayings—that we should wish to cite to our readers; but doubtless their pleasure will be greater in finding them out for themselves. It is a well planned and ably written story. The book is full of clever epigrams."

"This is a very fresh, original, wholesome, clever, humorous, and yet serious story."—St. James's Gazette.

"A positively 'new thing in humour,' at the beginning of a novel, should impel the reader to go on steadily in search of more, and indeed a spare day will not be wasted in perusing the three volumes. The story is bright and amusing throughout. It is written with a clever woman's generous sympathy in manly ways of life, and with a sly perception, also, of the narrowness into which excitedly well-meaning ideas are apt to run. No one who knows what good writing is, no one who is original enough to enjoy originality, should miss the pleasure that this novel—which has plenty of true sentiment and genuine pathos in it as well as humour—will give."—Daily Telegraph.

THIRLBY HALL. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Heaps of Money" &c. 3 vols.

"'Thirlby Hall' is the pleasantest and, taken altogether, the best novel I have read for many a long day: not merely has the plot plenty of backbone and interest, but the style is charming, and the two or three exceptionally drawn characters. Lady Caroline is a creation of which Thackeray would not have been ashamed."—World.

"'Thirlby Hall,' in fact, good things. The book is to be heartily enjoyed and unreservedly recommended, if only for the sake of Lyons and the butler."—Standard.

THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

THE death of the Prince whose funeral takes place to-day has been a painful surprise to the country. That his health had always been delicate has been generally known; but constitutional weakness is often no obstacle to a long and useful life. The careful and regular habits which such weakness imposes frequently enable a man to live more and last longer than those who, because robust, are careless in their mode of living. Such weakness, too, passes away in some cases as men approach middle age; and few of the Prince's fellow-countrymen had any fears that his career would so soon be cut short. To the Queen and to the widowed Duchess we join all England in offering our respectful sympathy. The interest which the former has always taken in the welfare of her subjects, and the sympathy which she has shown for the sufferings of the lowliest among them, have won for her a place in their hearts wholly independent of the sincere loyalty which they feel towards the Crown. The bereavement, too, which befell her more than twenty years ago, the peculiar loneliness in which it left her, the revelations of her home life which she has from time to time laid before the world, have given her subjects an interest in her personal feelings which it seldom falls to the lot of sovereigns to gain. On the present sad occasion, as in all her sorrows, their condolence is heartfelt. The Duchess, short as her residence has been in England, has won from those who know her a personal regard which will enhance the regret which all must feel at her loss. Of Prince Leopold himself there is but one opinion held by those who knew him either in private or in public life. His knowledge, his intelligence, his interest in great subjects, his love of all that gives grace and charm to human life, his sympathy with the needs and sufferings of the poorest among his fellow-countrymen, are known to all our readers. On these subjects much has been written and spoken during the past week. There is one reflection, however, which the life and untimely death of the Prince especially force on our mind when the first personal tribute to his memory has been paid. This is the great public and political loss which the nation has sustained by his death.

The Duke of Albany was, in a remarkable sense, a link between the Throne and the people; and, had he lived, he would doubtless have become so in a greater and greater degree. It is a part of the good fortune of the English, as of the Germian, Monarchy that the reigning family comprises many members and branches. To this fact it is due, not only that the succession is always provided for, but that between the Crown and the mass of the people, there are a large number of members intimately related to the former, and sharing, to an extent impossible to the Sovereign, the interests and occupations of the latter. That some members devote themselves to professional soldiers, others professional sailors, and that others, like the Duke of Albany, should interest themselves in the political, literary, artistic, and social questions, qualifies a Monarchy like our own to keep constant touch of the people. At the present time it is especially fortunate that this should be the case. The changes which have been, and during the present generation, not in England alone, but in other European countries, have been all in the direction of democracy, and it is unreasonable to suppose that this movement would have been checked by the will of any individual or small class of individuals. But there is no small difference between a popular movement guided over by party politicians, and hostile to the main institutions of the country, and one sanctioned by those to whom it is accustomed to look as its natural heads. The old and deep-seated loyalty of the English people, which extends to all classes throughout the country, has remained unshaken by the political changes of the last half-century, and is not likely to be shaken by any changes which may be impending. But the Crown, which wisely remains, as a rule, neutral in the strife of political parties, gains greatly in stability and popularity by the fact that, outside the sphere of politics, members of the Royal Family have assumed an active leadership in all that tends to national progress. The part which Prince Leopold took was marked out, for him by the state of his health; but it was none the less useful because it did not assume a professional shape. He had already, before his death, won for himself a place as something much more than a nominal patron of the movements which he befriended. He was able to take a part in them, as intelligent and practical as it was influential. It is here that his loss will be most felt by the general public. The many duties both public and private, which fall to the lot of Royalty leave, as a rule, but little time for the pursuits in which the enforced leisure of the Duke of Albany was so wisely spent. His example, like that of the late Prince Consort, shows how important a part can be played in this country by those who are near to the Throne, without occupying it. The opportunities of usefulness which a position of this kind affords are such as fall to the lot of few; and it must be admitted that the Duke of Albany turned them to the best account. But he had reached an age, at the time of his death, at which men can only begin to be widely useful. Years of preparation are needed to fit a man for such a part. The world waits for repeated proofs of capacity before it gives the able aspirant to honour his due. But it may be said, with truth, that the Duke of Albany had already won for himself the reputation, not in a limited circle only but before the general public, of being one of the able men of his time. The part which he might have played in public life, had he attained to fuller years, is matter only for melancholy conjecture. But that a greater part than ever can now be played by those of his gifts and station seems to us clear. It cannot be said that this country is less loyal to the Monarchy now than in any past period of its history; and, at the same time, the whole movement of the nation, political and social, has tended to lower and level the barriers which once existed between the various classes which compose it. Each member of the Royal Family is now more conspicuous before the eyes of the whole nation than could formerly be the case; and the influence of one like the Duke of Albany can now find recognition in parts of the country where a century ago little more than the fact of his existence would have been generally known. The maxim noblesse oblige was one that guided his conduct, and nowhere more than among the mass of the English people does conduct founded on this maxim meet with due recognition. The jealousy of any kind of social superiority which infects the French populace is foreign to English habits of mind. The Monarchy in itself is not only tolerated, but popular; far more so than any other form of government which could be proposed in its place. It has been popular in the past, even at times when the occupant of the throne has personally found little favour with the people. During the last half-century its position has been greatly strengthened by the happy coincidence that, during a period when the powers of the people have been widely extended [illegible] has been worn by a lady more popular and more [illegible] than any Sovereign who has held it for nearly [illegible] centuries. The Monarchy and the people, during [illegible] when many persons, the reverse of alarmist, looked [illegible] apprehension on the future, have never been in antagonism to one another; and experience has shown that great political changes may take place, and that power may be transferred from one class to another, without in any way weakening the position of the Crown. Prince LEOPOLD thus found the way open and smooth for a career eminently suited to his tastes and his talents. With distinguished mental gifts admirably trained, with the desire to be useful and influential, and enjoying a popularity due alike to his personal qualities and to the relation in which he stood to the Throne, he would assuredly, had his life been prolonged, have done service to the country such as few can hope to render. In him talent, goodwill, and opportunity met together, and his death is a loss, not only to those nearest to him, but to the English people.

EGYPT.

THE Opposition having, in deference to Lord HARTINGTON'S request, abstained altogether during the earlier part of the week from pressing for information on the subject of the very alarming news from the Soudan, expectation could not but be concentrated on the promised statement of Thursday. The question, moreover, which the leader of the Opposition had arranged was so framed as to facilitate the Government's task to the uttermost. A certain confusion which has been observable in Ministerial ideas needed assistance of the kind; and such assistance could not have been better afforded than by the sevenfold division of the question—a division which adequately represented the desire for information of every one who is really acquainted with the subject and understands the political necessities of the moment. Probably few persons expected a perfectly full and frank disclosure in reply. It could hardly, however, have been anticipated that the impeninent attitude which Mr. GLADSTONE'S and Lord HARTINGTON'S speeches display would be maintained. The calculated bluster of Mr. GLADSTONE'S second speech will not carry off the confession of incompetence contained in his first and in Lord HARTINGTON'S. As to the Soudan in general, as to Egypt in general, the Government still has no policy at all. As to General GORDON (it is incredible, but it is the fact), Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord HARTINGTON say that he can come home if he likes and when he likes, and there's an end on't. In these two sentences the practical contents of three long speeches are faithfully summed up. As for Mr. GLADSTONE'S withering and scorching and crushing eloquence, these epithets have been used too frequently and too freely to produce much effect now. It would require eloquence greater than Mr. GLADSTONE'S to disguise the hopeless weakness of a speech which actually blamed Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE for want of patriotism in publishing to the world that situation of General GORDON which columns of the largest type in the most widely-circulated of newspapers have already made matter of universal knowledge. It would require eloquence greater still to conceal the real meaning of the attempt to disparage the truth of information which the Government and the public both know to be authentic. If the precedent of these constant Egyptian debates is, as Mr. GLADSTONE says, inconvenient, it is because the conduct of the Government is intolerable; and, if the discussion of their blunders is bad for the public welfare, how much more is the commission of those blunders?

But the reply to Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S patiently postponed inquiries whether at last the Government have hit upon a policy for Egypt, had it been real and not illusory, could not affect the judgment which may and must be passed upon the conduct of the Ministry. For the credit of human nature it may be hoped that the apparent equanimity with which certain of Mr. GLADSTONE'S supporters have received the news of the last week has been a feigned equanimity, and, to do the most prominent of them justice, they have for the most part taken the wise course of abstaining from all notice of the subject. The solemn farce of a Franchise Bill which no one wants or believes in, or regards with any interest whatever except as an engine of party purposes, has afforded them cover for the silence; and the national attention has been diverted to the sad fate of the Duke of ALBANY. But these are merely distracting and temporary influences; they have no real effect upon the situation; the Arabs of the Soudan are entirely insensible to them, and it is upon the Arabs of the Soudan, among other simple and elementary forces, that the course of events depends. Such forces, however, being facts, and the Government having made up its mind to have nothing to do with facts in its Egyptian policy, it ignores them altogether. The inexplicable Souakim expedition, which did not rescue the garrisons of Sinkat and Tokar, for the excellent reason that one had been massacred before it started, and the other had capitulated before it arrived; which did not defend Souakim, because Souakim was not attacked; but which did go forth seeking for adventures, and which did kill and wound from five to ten thousand Arabs, and lose in killed and wounded from four to six hundred Englishmen—according to public announcement accomplished its purpose last week. What it accomplished, except that the sending of it saved Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government, no one knows or can say. But that it did not accomplish the pacification of the triangle between Souakim, Berber, and Kassala is quite certain. The natives, it is said quaintly, are "much dis-"satisfied" at the withdrawal of the troops; and no wonder. For, although the said troops are not quite withdrawn, yet the irrepressible OSMAN DIGNA, oblivious of the fact that by the rules of war and for the convenience of Mr. GLADSTONE he ought to be crushed, has already reappeared and begun to harass the friendly tribes. The entire worthlessness of the purely Egyptian force which it was stated was to open the Berber route has been once more shown—if, indeed, the showing was needed—by the rout of General GORDON'S Egyptians at Khartoum. No doubt a proper force at Souakim can hold Souakim—that could have been done when OSMAN DIGNA'S power was at its strongest by the ships and crews of Sir WILLIAM HEWETT'S squadron. But that every other result, if there is any result, of the expedition will be lost by withdrawal or reduction of the force to a mere garrison, that the English blood spilt might in that case as well have been poured into the sea, is a positive and certain fact. No good effect has been produced in Egypt proper by this spasmodic series of operations, for the Egyptians do not believe that the English have won, and, seeing them return, will be confirmed in the idea that they have lost. No good worth mentioning has been done on the spot, for the road is not open, the garrisons were not rescued, and OSMAN DIGNA'S spirit is not subdued. No good, and worse than no good, has been done at Khartoum, for the tribes whom this action at a distance has failed to overawe can only be encouraged by its sudden, and to their view, as to that of all reasonable men, untimely and futile cessation.

But even the bungling and blundering at Souakim is less surprising than the inaction in reference to General GORDON, culminating in the shocking statements of Thursday. After long silence, repeated despatches have reached England from Khartoum during the past week. It is known that in a sortie from the city the Egyptian troops—partly, no doubt, owing to the treachery of their leaders, but more owing to their hopeless incapacity for fighting—were put to flight by a mere handful of Arab cavalry and camelry, and were then pursued and sabred at leisure, exactly after the fashion of the first battle of Teb, and not improbably after the fashion of the battle of Kashgil. The only Englishman in Khartoum whose tongue is not tied by official reticence sends repeated declarations of the necessity (and the expectation on the part of General GORDON) of English help. He is "daily expecting English troops"; he "evidently "believes English troops are on their way"; the "only "hope" of the town "is in English troops." And there are no English troops on their way, and the Government is entirely careless of General GORDON (who can, in Mr. GLADSTONE'S very words, "withdraw when he thinks "proper"), and Radical journalists write columns on columns about a trumpery Franchise Bill, and pass over the situation of Khartoum in silence. It is by no means necessary to have shared the foolish enthusiasm of some persons as to General GORDON'S mission; it is by no means necessary even to have regarded with approval that mission in itself, in order to feel and see the deep damnation which must rest on any Ministry which, after sending out a plenipotentiary, and after deliberately refusing the one method of action which he had to propose if likely to avoid the necessity of supporting him with troops, now refuses or neglects to send those troops. The whole policy of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government appears to be one of "to be"—of curious experimentalizing. They seem to reject the idea of furnishing General Gordon with the arm of flesh as a sort of unsportsmanlike device calculated to interfere with the interest of his unparalleled undertaking. The time-worn legend of the apoplectic sufferer on the steps of Burton finds itself curiously renewed in this instance. Yet the Government, putting the honour of England out of the question as irrelevant, owes something to General Gordon. Not wicked jibing Tories, but pure-minded Radicals, have said that, whether or not he saved Khartoum, he certainly saved, if only for a time, Mr. Gladstone's Ministry. It may perhaps be added that as gratitude, especially political gratitude, is for favours to come, their gratitude should certainly lead them to prevent his dying. If Khartoum were to follow Sinkat it might be difficult even for the present majority to vote that the result was not due to the vacillation of the Government. Yet up to the middle of the present week nothing, absolutely nothing, had been done; and nothing, it is now said, is to be done. No troops were on their way, the officers and the money which had been sent were stopped at Assouan, the retirement of General Graham's expedition to Souakim had left the coast route once more at the mercy of Osman Digna, the Mahdi had treated General Gordon's offers of Sultanship with contumely, the resistance of the up-country garrisons was reported as constantly diminishing, the worthlessness of the Khartoum garrison had been proved to demonstration. But, on the other hand, there was much prospect that Mr. Gladstone's majority would be staunch on the Franchise Bill, and Mr. Gladstone himself had good hope of the introduction before Easter of Sir William Harcourt's scheme for un-Torifying the Corporation of London. Therefore all was well. As for Egypt, it is, on Mr. Gladstone's written authority to the Workmen's Peace Association, "of the "greatest importance to remember that the covenants "under which this country has been acting in Egypt were "not made by the present Government." If this has any meaning at all, it means that the late Government compelled Mr. Gladstone to send General Graham wool-gathering to Tamanieb, and to summon him home without wool, that it forced Mr. Gladstone to make General Gordon Governor-General of the Soudan, and then to refuse him alike permission to settle the country without force and troops to settle it with force. For these are the matters of present importance, and to connect them with Dual Controls, or anything of that sort, is as sensible as to connect them with the original misconduct of Eve. There is much to be said, no doubt, on the whole subject of the relation of England to Egypt. But, in face of General Graham at Souakim, of General Gordon at Khartoum, and of Mr. Clifford Lloyd clearing the Egyptian prisons without leave asked of Khedive or Minister, the nature of that relation is for the time being unquestionable. England has for the moment taken Egypt as completely under her charge as she has taken any Crown Colony. It is the manner of this taking in charge that is the immediate subject of criticism, and it is safe to say that the series of alternate wilful inaction and blundering action which that manner displays is almost unparalleled in history.

MR. PELL'S RESOLUTION.

FOR the second or third time a Liberal Government has been defeated on the difficult question of readjustment in the incidence of local taxation. Sir Massey Lopes carried by a majority of a hundred against Mr. Gladstone's former Administration a motion to the effect that occupiers of real property ought to be relieved of the whole or part of their exclusive burdens. Since that time considerable subventions have been furnished in aid of rates by the transference of certain charges to the Treasury; but, at the same time, the demands on the ratepayer have been augmented, especially by the increase of the charge for elementary education. More than half of the rates is levied in towns; but rural contributors have been more sensitive and more clamorous for relief. Mr. Pell, who proposed and carried the latest Resolution on the subject, more especially represents the landed interest, including the tenant-farmers. Whatever may be the ultimate incidence of local taxation, the agricultural occupier bears the burden of increased rates in the first instance; and he contrasts his own liability with the comparative exemption of neighbours who may perhaps be richer than himself, though the sources of their income are less visible and tangible. Mr. Gladstone has sometimes vainly attempted to remove the dissatisfaction of the farmers by assuming that the rates were ultimately paid by the landlord, who could, as he assumed, in no case be entitled to favour or to justice. The county members, who in this matter represent the unanimous opinion of their constituents, have nevertheless persisted in their demand; and Mr. Pell has had the satisfaction of proving to the Government that in many instances even the ties of party allegiance are less stringent than the obligation of doing justice to a powerful class. Indignant ratepayers were not satisfied with the answers that subventions are, for some mysterious reason, inexpedient and objectionable.

Many plausible arguments are adduced to show that every district ought, as far as possible, to meet the outlay which attends the management of its own affairs. The abstract term of decentralization is at present constantly used by Liberal politicians; and many questionable commonplaces illustrate the supposed advantage of municipal experience as a preparation for political activity. Without entering into theoretical refinements, Mr. Pell and his supporters reply that real property pays more than its share of the rates, and that the inequality ought to be removed. If justice can only be done by subventions, they see no reason why State contribution should not be extended. The alternative remedy of taxing personalty has been found impracticable. Stock in trade was made liable to the Poor-rate by the original Act of Elizabeth, but it has never been actually taxed. A similar exemption of movable property has been created in spite of the plain words of an Act of Parliament in the case of the Land-tax, which was imposed equally on personalty and on real property. The financial reformers who from time to time demand that the tax shall be levied on the present value of land, ought in consistency to discover some method of reaching other forms of wealth. Subventions, as they are called, effect, as far as they extend, the object of approximate equality of burdens. Under the modern financial system every increase in the national expenditure is practically met by the Income-tax. It would be impossible as long as the secrecy of the returns is maintained to appropriate to local purposes a percentage of the Income-tax accruing within the district. A contribution from the public revenue produces the same result.

The discontented ratepayers can scarcely be expected to accept as satisfactory Ministerial assurances that local and general taxation cannot be readjusted until a novel scheme of provincial government has been approved by Parliament and established throughout the country. The farmers, even if they cared for the institution of local parliaments, are perfectly aware that their burdens would not be reduced by any conceivable system of administration. As long as they remain chargeable with expenses which, in their judgment, ought to be borne by the general community they will continue to demand relief. The more sagacious of their number probably foresee that rural municipalities are likely to spend money much more freely than Boards of Guardians, Highway Boards, or magistrates in Quarter Sessions. The modern nostrum of household suffrage as the basis of executive and legislative power tends in all cases to divorce taxation from representation. One of the advocates of the proposed measure lately announced, with much complacency, that it would provide farm-labourers with an education qualifying them afterwards to exercise a judgment in political affairs. Farmers and landlords may be excused for regarding with suspicious dislike the prospect of being taxed by those who will themselves contribute little or nothing to the local revenue. Subventions will be something definite and probably permanent, whether they are given according to existing precedents, or take the shape of an assignment to the local body of the house-tax or some other impost now levied by benefit of the Treasury. It is not difficult to understand the motives which induce Ministers to make pecuniary aid to ratepayers conditional on the newfangled provincial constitution. In this, as in other instances, they are anxious to devise changes which may tend to keep themselves in office; and, as it happens that no part of the community takes any interest in projects of decentralization, the Government invites agitation, and offers its possible promoters a bribe. It is doubtful whether the acceptance of a stone instead of bread would be afterwards rewarded by a subvention; and unless the boon can be reckoned in money, it will excite neither preliminary desire nor subsequent gratitude.

Sir Charles Dilke took occasion to explain for the information of the House and the country the ambitious scheme which is to be introduced when the Franchise Bill and the London Municipal Bill have been passed. The details of the measure were of course not fully stated; but its character may be generally understood. It would seem that rural and urban districts are to be organized on one uniform plan, with an elaborate machinery of District Boards and County Boards, possessing large attributes, which are not yet fully defined. The object and the probable effect of the new constitution will be, as in all other measures promoted by the present Government, to exclude the upper classes of the community from public life. Mr. RATHBONE, indeed, who is not in the habit of talking cant, approved of Sir CHARLES DILKE'S plan on the express ground that it would tend to an opposite result. As he justly remarked, it would be a misfortune that the leisurely and wealthy part of the rural community should abstain from taking part in local administration; but, by some strange process of reasoning, he had persuaded himself that popular suffrage would replace in power the very persons whom Sir CHARLES DILKE proposes to deprive of their position and their functions. The country gentlemen in their character of justices form a part of every Board of Guardians, and in Quarter Sessions they levy and expend the part of the county rate which is not appropriated by law. There is no reason to expect that the most competent among them will be elected by household suffrage; nor, indeed, is it likely that they will expose themselves to the annoyance of canvassing for votes. Mr. C. S. READ suggested that two-thirds of the County Board should be nominated by the Boards of Guardians, and that the remaining third should consist of justices chosen by their fellows. Such a body would be preferable to Sir CHARLES DILKE'S elected assembly; and the magistrates would, if Mr. READ'S plan were accepted, have no excessive power. It is found in practice that ex-officio Guardians are out-voted whenever there is a conflict of interests between owners and occupiers, and also when patronage has to be exercised. It may be admitted that any Board which may be formed must contain an elective element.

Even the fanatical admirers of the supremacy of numbers might hesitate to apply this principle to local taxation and administration. In the great American cities, and especially in New York, the owners of property and the respectable classes from time to time vainly protest against the control over their property which is vested in the lower part of the population, and especially in the Irish. Professing with suspicious persistence their devotion to universal suffrage in State affairs and in the government of the Union, they faintly suggest that those who pay the rates ought to have some voice in determining their amount and application. London may, perhaps, when its local taxation has under the new Municipality been multiplied threefold, sympathize with New York; and in some parts of the country Sir CHARLES DILKE'S constitution may have a similar operation. The Government follows at a distance the policy of restless innovation which found its most conspicuous illustration during the early years of the French Revolution. It is true that Mr. GLADSTONE has not yet renamed the calendar months, or altered weights and measures into a fanciful symmetry under an unfamiliar nomenclature; but he and his colleagues regard with dislike the ancient City dignities, and they are impatient to make counties conform to the model of corporate towns. They refuse relief to classes which complain of unjust taxation until the malcontents can be persuaded to ask for administrative changes which they at present regard with utter indifference. The Ministry have probably by this time discovered that the Ground Game Act and the Agricultural Holdings Act are regarded by the farmers as mere equivalents for the vote which some of them gave at the last General Election. Having now returned to their customary allegiance, they are not to be bought by promises of a Bill for establishing rural municipalities.

Mr. PELL is fully justified in proposing a censure on the Government on account of the refusal to give effect to the Resolution of the House of Commons. Mr. GLADSTONE'S answer to his first remonstrance was almost insulting in its transparent sophistry. When the House has resolved that immediate relief ought to be afforded to the ratepayers, it is idle to pretend that the redress of the grievance must be contingent on the progress of business and on the enactment of the County Government Bill. The same issue had been raised in the debate; and the vote of the House implied that the readjustment of local and general taxation ought to precede the measure on local administration. The Ministers are estopped by a factious proceeding of their own from disputing the conclusive force of a Resolution of the House of Commons. Last year, when an unscrupulous majority had condemned the Contagious Diseases Act, the Government, with full knowledge of the disastrous tendency of their policy, at once suspended the operation of the law. In that case a Resolution of the House was treated as if it had been a repeal of an Act of Parliament. There is no law which prevents the introduction of a Bill to increase the national subvention to the rates. It is perhaps not surprising that Mr. GLADSTONE should refuse to afford facilities for a discussion of his paradoxical conduct. He is probably not anxious to impose on Liberal county members the necessity of choosing between their constituents and their party. For any delay which may affect the business of the House Mr. GLADSTONE is responsible.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

IF the debate on the Franchise Bill was delayed or shortened by the time bestowed on Thursday upon the really important business of the nation, it can only be said, in a Scotticism familiar to readers of Sir WALTER, that there has been "mair tint" on a good many other occasions. How little there is to be said for the new invasion of the barbarians may be seen, better perhaps than in the debate, in Sir CHARLES DILKE'S extra-Parliamentary speech of Wednesday. Sir CHARLES DILKE is a very clever man; and, except when, as in answering Parliamentary questions, it is his business to be stupid, he rarely opens his mouth without saying at least something worth attention. Wednesday was one of the exceptions; and the fact ought in fairness to be charged to the subject, not to the speaker. When a man like Sir CHARLES DILKE can do nothing but fall back on the silly "other "side of the street" argument, it is pretty clear that his game is logically speaking hopeless. No one knows better than the PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD that this argument is as against his opponents a complete ignoratio elenchi. They do not say that the present system, or the system before 1867, or the system before 1832, gives or gave a vote to everybody who ought to have it, and withholds it from everybody who ought not. They do not say that either of these systems is or was free from anomaly. What they say is, that there is no such a thing as individual right to the franchise at all; that if the two indiscernibles whose existence LEIBNITZ denied, existed, the enfranchisement of the one would give the other no claim whatever; and that the whole end and object of the electoral system is simply to get a good working representation of the whole nation into St. Stephen's, not to get the whole nation itself boxed up periodically in deal stalls with a pencil and a voting-paper. When Sir CHARLES DILKE, or any one else, meets this argument, it may be admitted that there is something to be said for a Franchise Bill, but not before.

The all-pervading fallacy which has just been noticed was shown, as was to be expected, evidently enough in the debate itself. It may seem strange (if anything could be strange in politics) that a man like Mr. FORSTER should orate and perorate about the "continuation of an injustice" ignoring the previous and really important question whether any injustice exists. It may seem stranger that any one who has good reason to remember the Kilmainham Treaty should be sanguine about the "patriotism of states-"men," and certain that statesmen would not "postpone "the public interests to the behests of a small minority." But Mr. FORSTER, like all honest Radicals, without exception, is the slave of a certain number of commonplaces, and hugs his chains. This Radical may discard that commonplace, and that Radical may discard this; but the badge of the whole tribe is the passionate retention of those which are not discarded, and the refusal to let reason, experience, or anything else, interfere with them. Reason shows that the injustice of allowing A. to vote and not allowing B. is a figment of the brain; experience shows that the patriotism of statesmen is the rottenest of all rotten reeds that grow by the muddy river of self-interest. But Mr. FORSTER is quite content to disregard both. The comparison of such a speech as that of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH with such a speech as Mr. FORSTER'S brings out with startling clearness the difference between two orders of politicians. Sir MICHAEL, like all reasonable people, is perfectly prepared for a moderate and proportional extension of the franchise so as to keep up that representation of the whole people which, as has been said above, is the logical cause and end of the franchise system. But also, like all reasonable people who have no private ends to serve, he does not think it necessary to flood the constituencies, instead of refreshing them. The woful dearth of argument on the Government side could indeed hardly have been better illustrated than by the joy of the Government organs over the speech of Mr. Charles Russell. Mr. Charles Russell is a professional advocate, and excellent in his profession, and it must go hard with a professional advocate if he cannot find something in the nature of an argument to back his side with. But, if Mr. Charles Russell were to produce in Court such an argument as his battle-horse of Monday, it is to be feared that the presiding judge would scarcely feel it necessary to call on Mr. Charles Russell's learned friend on the other side for a reply. Mr. Russell has discovered that the present and proposed over-representation of Ireland is quite proportional and reasonable if the metropolis be left out of the question. That is to say, if the capital of England, with four millions or so of inhabitants, be for the sake of argument supposed not to exist, then the rest of England has about enough members. The gratitude which Mr. Russell's friends seem to feel towards him for this remarkable contention may certainly be shared by his foes. Or, again, let the speeches be examined of the member for Stoke and the member for Newcastle, the most extraordinary pair of yoke-fellows that Parliament has recently seen. To Mr. Broadhurst and to Mr. John Morley the proposed Reform Bill appears admirable and delightful, because it may possibly result in the disfranchisement of the Universities. It would be a pardonable weakness in Mr. Broadhurst to be jealous of institutions the benefits of which by his misfortune, not his fault, he has not experienced. But, though it is decreed that Universities more than other things shall find foes in their own households, it is somewhat surprising to find Mr. Morley in the same tale. Whether these two distinguished Radicals and oddly-conjoined partners are irritated by the accomplishments or by the Toryism of the Universities does not very clearly appear, but it seems, on the whole, to be their opinion that scholarship and Toryism are generally found together. This opinion there is no present occasion to combat; but what is most noteworthy is the ingenuous confession in these, as in most other speeches on the same side, that the Bill is welcome because it will or may swamp one form of political belief. No enemy who wished to expose the purely partisan character of the Bill could do so more effectually than these its defenders. To pass from such utterances to the speech by which Mr. Plunket extorted expressions of admiration from the supporters of the Bill is to pass at once from party to patriotism. It is tolerably certain that those who follow Mr. Plunket on the other side will pay him the yet higher compliment of omitting to answer his arguments.

No better general review of the weakness of the Government position could be given than was given by Sir Robert Peel in the lively and forcible speech which reminded the House of Commons of days in which it was not thought the chief requisite of a Parliament man that he should speak dully for one side and vote vigorously for the other. But Sir Robert, if only from the place he occupied in the order of speakers, could not enforce, as he could have done had he spoken later, one singular consideration which is suggested by the Government orations. Every Government speaker has announced his firm and cheerful intention to vote against Lord John Manners's Amendment, which deprecates enfranchisement without a clear understanding of its results in the shape of redistribution. Nearly all Government speakers, except members of the Government and Irish advocates, have taken occasion to express their more or less decided disapproval of the shape which, as foreshadowed by Mr. Gladstone's speech, redistribution is to take. That is to say, as is now usual with the partisans of the present Ministry, these gentlemen have argued for Lord John Manners and intend to vote against him. Mr. Forster, Mr. Sellar, and Mr. Grey added their voices in this sense to an already respectable number of utterances in the same sense last week. This may, indeed, or rather will have but little influence on the division; but it has all the influence in the world on the argument; and it must immensely strengthen the hands of the Upper House when it comes to deal with the Bill. It is on record that, while the Government is tied to no scheme of redistribution by the present measure, the scheme which its leader has suggested is thought unreasonable, dangerous, and unjust by its own most disinterested and therefore most important supporters. In such a case it is certainly the duty of those whom it concerns to see that the State takes no damage. It was the habit formerly of kings bankrupt in money to debase the coin, and it seems to be the habit of Ministers bankrupt in reputation to debase the franchise. Against the consequences of this some better security than Mr. Forster's patriotism of statesmen and Mr. Broadhurst's unselfishness of artisans may be reasonably asked for.

THE WEDNESDAY JACK-IN-THE-BOX.

With a respect for tradition not unworthy of the most important part of the mother of Parliaments, the House of Commons devoted last Wednesday to the Sunday Closing Bill of this Session. There is now no Session without its Sunday Closing Bill. These forerunners of the new slavery predicted by Mr. Herbert Spencer are become an established institution. They appear Session after Session, with some differences of detail, but an essential similarity. Sometimes we have the thin end of the wedge in the shape of a local Bill for Durham or Cornwall, and sometimes we have the wedge in its full dimensions. There is little variety in the history of these pious Bills. For some years past it has been their fate to appear, to be argued for and against in exactly the same terms. Mr. Stevenson's Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays Bill—the last as yet of an unfortunate race—is the whole wedge, and has run the usual course. Its proposer recommended it in the usual style. He took for granted that the object was good, and also that it could be obtained, and devoted his speech chiefly to insisting on the one vital fact that a great number of people wished for it. Then he was seconded by Mr. Burt, who repeated the same proposition. Then the stock arguments for and against were produced in due Parliamentary see-saw; and Sir W. Vernon Harcourt said for the tenth time that the thing should be so because the people wished it—or, rather, wherever the people wished it—and also casually pointed out that the Conservatives were very obstructive, and even rejoiced in their iniquity. Finally, Mr. Warton—a just man, and tenacious of his proposition—talked the Bill out, amid cries of "Divide!" "Divide!" "That job is done," said the wicked boatswain in Captain Marryat's story, when he had completely cut the throat of the last of the French prisoners. That job is done, the House of Commons may have thankfully said on Wednesday, when, having paid its due tribute to what Mr. Carlyle was in the habit of calling contemporary stupor, it went off hungry to dinner.

By far the most delightful thing about these debates is the use of statistics on both sides. Successive speakers made the most contradictory assertions about the same things, and supported them by figures of equal plausibility. Mr. Stevenson says that Sunday closing has promoted temperance in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland; but he does not think that the fall in the number of arrests is of much account. People can get drunk at home, only he is quite sure they do not. Mr. Burt, for his part, supports the movement because the diminution in charges for drunkenness on the Sunday convinces him that closing the public-houses does make people more temperate. Then comes Lord A. Percy, and shows, figures in hand, that the number of Scotchmen "run in" for being drunk on the Sabbath increased by six hundred and fifty-four between 1879 and 1882. Who shall decide when these doctors disagree? Yet it does appear to the mere outsider as if it would be perfectly possible to arrive at some sort of decision by a judicious use of statistics which are within the reach of everybody. There is no doubt whatever that the consumption of alcohol has diminished within the last few years. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows it, and so does the Income-tax payer. Now it must surely be possible, and even easy, for any one who has mastered the first four rules of arithmetic to find out whether the fall in the amount of strong drink consumed has been greatest where Sunday Closing Bills are in force. If it is so, that will not be enough by itself to make such measures acceptable; but the faddists are entitled to make the most of it. If, on the other hand, the increase in sobriety is greatest in England—which is possible—or even pretty equally divided among the three kingdoms—which is most probable—the necessity for Sunday Closing Bills may be considered as disproved. Nothing, however, would be more rash than to suppose that we should be rid of Sunday Closing Bills because they had been shown to be useless for their avowed purpose. As the column and a half of the Times filled with the list of petitions in favour of Mr. STEVENSON's measure shows, there is a strong feeling in support of this kind of legislation in the country. The value of the petitions is subject to a considerable discount. It is, to use a vulgar phrase, which must be odious to the soul of the temperance party, as easy as drink to secure signatures to petitions. A smart tout can make any number for himself; but even when they are genuine, they do not necessarily mean much. Thousands of workmen who get their pot of beer from the public on Sunday will sign to please the civil-spoken gentleman who asks them, and who may put a job in their way. Then our friend the bonâ fide traveller accounts for a good deal. A Sunday morning trip of four miles or so from London will explain why. There are scores of taverns at about that distance which are the head-quarters of a mob on that day of the week all the year round. Of course the mob drinks and shouts and swears. It has a female camp following which also drinks and shouts and swears, and staggers about with babies in arms very hot and draggletail. All this is an unmixed nuisance to all the neighbourhood except the publican. Moreover, it is by no means peculiar to London, but extends to every considerable town in England. The residents who heartily object to being invaded by a noisy rabble once a week are of course ready to sign petitions in favour of Sunday closing. They never stop to think that the measure which would rid them of those odious intruders would be a serious evil to thousands of honest and sober people.

These Bills are only one of the many forms of a kind of legislation which is terribly common in our time. To punish the many just as an experimont to see whether you cannot amend the few is the sign of an advanced and philanthropical law-maker in this generation. Because some 17,000 brutes become drunk and disorderly on a Sunday, it seems right to a large party now to impose disabilities on three or four millions who neither become drunk nor disorderly. It is the great misfortune of Parliament that it seems to have an ideal slum in Whitechapel before its eyes whenever it is called upon to legislate upon any matter which can be supposed to concern the poor. Members would save themselves from talking a great deal of nonsense, and from occasionally doing a good deal of mischief, if they would take the trouble to learn that slums and dwellers in slums form a small minority. The greater part of London and of other large towns is occupied by the "poor" who are not in rags and who do not pig ten in a room. These people may be wanting in refinement, they sing music-hall songs when they feel merry, and have many habits irritating to the nerves of better educated persons. At the same time they have a standard of respectability of their own. Whatever may be the case in the North, it is a well-known fact that in the South of England these people are drinkers of beer to a considerable, but not immoderate, extent. Mr. STEVENSON's Bill would impose a disability on the whole of them, because a few black sheep among them ruin themselves by indulgence as it would be equally in their power to do if his proposed measure became law. The details of these Bills are matters of comparatively little importance—if only for the reason that they could never be enforced in London. The really essential thing about them is that they are the most plausible among a host of measures now brought forward which would have the effect, supposing that they could be thoroughly carried out, of putting the weak and cowardly and indolent part of mankind on a level with their superiors. No legislation could possibly lead to a result which is contrary to the laws of nature; but it is quite within the bounds of probability that the attempt may have the effect of hampering the more deserving for the sake of the less. Quite apart from their folly as practical measures, the whole class of faddist Bills are morally detestable.

ITALY AND THE POPE.

THE report that the POPE had communicated to the Emperor of AUSTRIA his intention of leaving Rome appears to have been unfounded; but it is not denied that he referred to the subject in a formal address to the Cardinals. In the printed version of his speech the announcement is omitted, but the abrupt termination of the document indicates a significant erasure. It is not surprising that the POPE's equanimity should have been disturbed by a late proceeding of the Italian Parliament. During two or three years which have elapsed since the riotous interference with the removal of the remains of PIUS IX., the chronic antagonism of the two Courts on the opposite banks of the Tiber has not found open expression. It is impossible that, as long as he occupies the Vatican, the POPE should be on friendly terms with the King of ITALY; but in ordinary times they contrive to avoid an open rupture. One singular result of an anomalous arrangement is that Catholic princes are prevented from accepting King HUMBERT's hospitality. The Crown Prince of GERMANY was able as a Protestant both to visit the KING and to have a ceremonious interview with the POPE; but the anomaly seems to have been excused by the invincible ignorance of heretics. A short time since one of the Bavarian princes, with his wife, who is an Austrian Archduchess, excused themselves from fulfilling an engagement to visit the KING because they had been warned that they would not be afterwards received by the POPE. For the same reason the Emperor of AUSTRIA has down to the present time not returned King HUMBERT's visit to Vienna. Though LEO XIII. is believed to be a sensible man of the world, he may possibly derive satisfaction from the opportunity of proving that his social authority has survived his territorial sovereignty. On the other hand, his unfriendly demonstrations are from time to time encountered by more serious encroachments and rebuffs.

It appears that ecclesiastical property not absolutely appropriated by the State is, in consequence of modern legislation, invested in the Italian funds. The rule has recently been applied to the property of the Propaganda to the amount of 400,000*l*. The whole amount is in the nature of a trust fund, having been received from the contributions of the faithful, to be applied by the Congregation of the Propaganda to missionary purposes. The Italian Parliament, while it makes no claim to the possession of the capital sum, has, without the sanction of the POPE, converted the whole amount into Italian stock. If the operation was effected at the market price, the Congregation and those who have contributed to the funds in dispute suffer no immediate loss; but the commutation was, as the Parliament well knew, in the highest degree unpalatable to the Church authorities, who are probably not confident in the financial soundness of the Italian Government. They may also regard with reasonable solicitude the right of interference asserted by the State, and the facility with which at some future time funded property might be sequestered or confiscated. The Papal organs contend, with some plausibility, that the Congregation of the Propaganda is a trustee, not for any section of Italian subjects, but for the Catholic community throughout the world. There is a distinction between local endowments and subscriptions for exclusively ecclesiastical purposes. The Italian Parliament itself has hitherto abstained from meddling with the revenue which arises from the collection of Peter's pence. Unfortunately for the POPE, his protest, however reasonable, is useless against an adversary who has absolute control of the subject matter in dispute. The change which has taken place since the Holy See was deprived of its secular authority is forcibly illustrated by its present helplessness. No European Government will intervene on behalf of its Catholic subjects who may be interested in the affairs of the Propaganda. Indignant remonstrances, though they may be conveyed in the choicest ecclesiastical Latin, are useless when they are no longer backed by force.

The Roman Court was never credulous enough to believe Liberals and Protestants when they assured it that the spiritual power would derive fresh vigour from dissociation with temporal government. The POPE has lost more in his spiritual capacity since the occupation of his dominions by Italian troops than in many previous centuries. Much of the authority which he still retains is connected with the shadow of past royalty, which has hitherto been protected by treaties and by the survival of moribund traditions. If it is true that the POPE has thought of seeking another refuge, he will do well to take warning from recent experience. He is still master of the Vatican, and ambassadors are accredited to his Court. If he were unwise enough to leave Rome, he could evidently no longer live in Italy; and as an exile in a foreign country he would be a dependent and almost a private person. Even if it were for his own interest to seek a foreign asylum, he would regret the great relief which his departure would cause to his rival. The King of ITALY, who is still vexed by a divided supremacy in his own capital, would take care that the door was finally closed against the POPE's return. In his latest allocution, as in many similar declarations issued by himself and his predecessor, LEO XIII. demonstrates with force and pathos the loss which he has suffered by the abolition of his secular sovereignty, or, in the translator's odd version, of his principality. It seems impossible that even a Pope can still persuade himself that it is possible to recover his former dominions.

Any threat of leaving Rome would be addressed to deaf ears; nor would Catholic Governments be anxious to receive an embarrassing guest. The hospitality which LOUIS XIV. extended to JAMES II. at St. Germains would not now be repeated, even in favour of a dethroned king; and the STUARTS, though they were sometimes troublesome inmates, had no means of interfering in French politics. It is possible that Austria might receive the fugitive Pontiff. His presence would certainly not be welcome in Spain. The Catholic States of Southern Germany are a part of the Empire which is not especially favourable to ecclesiastical pretensions. French territory is of course inaccessible; and consequently on the whole continent of Europe there seems, if the Vatican is abandoned, to be no available residence except Austria. It is probably on this ground that busy newsmongers circulated the rumour of an indirect application to the Court of Vienna. If the proposal had really been made, though it might possibly have been accepted, it would not have been cordially received. There might formerly have been some competition among Catholic potentates for the opportunity of exercising the influence of a protector over Papal policy; but the Holy See has in the present day little means of promoting the interests of any favoured State. The alliance on which Austria principally relies is that of a Power which is essentially, though not exclusively, Protestant. It is not surprising that, on consideration of so many objections to any continental residence, amateur advisers should recommend to the POPE the choice of an insular refuge. It is assumed that the indiscriminate hospitality of the English Government and nation would not be withheld from the most unexpected guest.

If the island were at the disposal of the first comer, it cannot be disputed that Malta offers many attractions. The climate suits Italian constitutions; there are no resident princes to compete in dignity with the Head of the Church; and the native population is devoted to the Roman Catholic faith with primitive and almost pagan devotion. In no part of the world is the priesthood more numerous and more sympathetic with popular prejudice. If the POPE were compelled to leave Rome, and if he were at liberty to choose his residence, he would almost certainly settle at Malta under the protection of the most tolerant of Governments. If the contingency occurs, it may be hoped that no English Government will for a moment entertain any application of the kind. Though Malta is of small extent, it is a military and naval station of the first importance; and the civil and military representatives of the Crown ought to have no rivals in rank or power. It is not impossible that the defensibility of the great fortress might in some cases, and to a certain extent, depend on the loyalty of the population. For many years after the occupation of the island the inhabitants were strongly attached to the English Government; but, in consequence of the mistakes of well-meaning Colonial Ministers, there has since been some alienation. As it was impossible to employ the indigenous Arabic, the use of Italian instead of English was unwisely encouraged, with the result of increasing the influence of the priesthood. At a later time the establishment of an Anglican bishopric offended the clergy so far that they withdrew in great measure from social intercourse with the English officials and residents. If the POPE were resident in Malta, the priests would teach the population to regard him as their sovereign, and to prefer his interests to those of a schismatic Government. Experience has shown that little advantage is to be derived even from the sincere good will of the POPE. The Irish, who have lately complained of his interference in political affairs, would on plausible grounds repudiate his authority if they could represent him as a dependent on English hospitality.

A GOSSIP'S APOLOGY.

NO one, except perhaps Lord LONSDALE, is much to be congratulated on the result of the LONSDALE libel case. Mr. YATES, the editor of the World, has been sentenced to four months' imprisonment, and has also received the vials of the wrath of Lord COLERIDGE. No man can enjoy being scolded, and Mr. YATES may remember the negro who objected to preaching and flogging when inflicted simultaneously. The law's delays may do something for Mr. YATES, but his sentence will not put down the kind of journalism which he revived in England. Perhaps editors and ladies of the highest rank (who now write false slanders for a few shillings) will be a little more cautious, that is all. Lord COLERIDGE, again, can scarcely be felicitated on his speech, or lecture, or sermon, or address, or whatever the oration in which he pronounced sentence is to be called. If the eloquent PRESIDENT of the ROYAL ACADEMY had ever been obliged to utter doom on a malefactor in public, he might have spoken more or less in the style of Lord COLERIDGE. He might have remembered to talk about the Areopagitica and the free air of England. Happily, Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON has only to speak on pleasant occasions, when a little rhetoric and literary flourish are perfectly in keeping. They are not so well in keeping on occasions like that which Lord COLERIDGE has recently "improved."

If neither the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE nor Mr. YATES has been fortunate, what shall we say for the Pall Mall Gazette? That journal has been, as Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD says of the modern spirit, "on many thousand "lines." It gave up a somewhat acrid Socialism when Mr. GEORGE appeared in England, and started as a kind of society journal, minus society. Interviews with archbishops, with pedestrians, with sculptors of accidental notoriety, now adorn its columns. Perhaps, if archbishops and pedestrians like this kind of thing (and they seem to like it), no one has any right to throw stones at the Pall Mall Gazette. But a little grain of conscience makes that journal publish "A Plea for Tittle-Tattle." Lord COLERIDGE denounced the love of personalities which gives the World, he says, a large circulation, though somehow, the print at the same time only appeals to "a small minority of a privileged "class." If curiosity about "attenuated personalities" be a mean miserable passion, then to a mean miserable passion people who publish personalities are catering. The apology is that curiosity about personal details is neither miserable nor mean. This apology is not set forth with much heartiness or consistency. The writer declares that "served him right "is the popular verdict" on Mr. YATES, and that the public would like to hear "deep calling unto deep, HENRY to "EDMUND" (as Mr. ARNOLD puts it) from adjacent dungeons. Almost the next remark is that "every one must sympa- "thize with Mr. YATES in his solitary cell" (where, by the way, Mr. YATES is not yet). If every one says, "Serve "him right," why must every one sympathize with him?

The Pall Mall's own defence of its tattle is that neither foolish vanity nor abject curiosity impels people to want to know all about the "heroes of the hour." Is the curiosity abject or not which feeds on the Pall Mall's paragraphs as to Mr. LAWES drinking hot soup out of a jug, or concerning Mr. VERHEYDEN and his wife, who very wisely sent "our representative" about his business? Not caring personally whether Mr. WESTON has corns, as the Pall Mall cares, or whether Mr. LAWES absorbs soup without using a spoon, we confess that the inquisitiveness which does revel in such details appears to us undignified. We are not mollified even by a sketch of an image of the late Duke of ALBANY'S child, "The Royal Orphan." These things are matters of taste, and perhaps need no apology. It is not a sin or a crime to advertise one sculptor, and tell us how another drinks soup. But the action, whatever its ethical value, is not justified by the fact that people talk gossip in society. They do not, at least, talk it to make money. They do not make it a profession to wait on archbishops and plaintiffs and pedestrians. To do so, we repeat, is no crime. To print a sketch of a Royal Orphan is not wicked. But will any one say that it is conduct which at once recommends itself to a man of delicacy? "Delicacy, where "have I heard that word?" said the conscience-smitten LEO ADOLESCENS; "it was before I wrote in that infernal "paper." LEO did not refer in this profane way to the Pall Mall Gazette, which in those far-off years published no interviews nor Royal Orphans. And, as the Pall Mall Gazette thinks that ANSELM would have rejoiced to see its day, its own conscience ought to be like a sea at rest. Besides, there is always the plea of the man who kept the mongoose, and set it on to torture rats. "The "defendant alleged, as an excuse, that he was obliged "to give the rats to the animal in order to attract customers "to his shop." The Pall Mall also is "obliged to give "rats to the animal"—to that "great animal the public"—in order "to attract customers to its shop." That is the humour of it.

THE CINCINNATI RIOTS.

THIS week's telegrams from the United States report another sign of the undiminished vitality of one of the most typical of American institutions. An attempt to execute Lynch-law on a large scale has been made at Cincinnati. There is nothing particularly new in the story, except the extent of the disturbance. There have been abuses in the administration of justice, and they have produced some popular ill-feeling. Judges, lawyers, and juries have been suspected, more or less plausibly, of not doing their duty. It has become a general belief that criminals who happened to possess money were sure of impunity. We have no means of knowing, at present, how far this opinion is justified by the facts. The miscarriages of justice which are said to have aroused the indignation of the citizens of Cincinnati do not appear very gross when compared with the habitual practice of some European countries. A boy who confessed to having murdered his employer was only condemned for manslaughter, and an equally light sentence was passed on a negro who killed a whole family in order to sell their corpses to the doctors. If these are fair examples of the misdeeds of the Cincinnati law courts, they may be readily acquitted of doing worse than the judges and juries of Italy, Belgium, or France when it is in a humanitarian frame of mind. At the outside they have only been too lenient. Neither do cases of this sort give any evidence of corruption. The precocious office-boy and the negro who bettered the instruction of BURKE and HARE can scarcely have been persons in sufficiently affluent circumstances to give bribes. The people of Cincinnati were, however, justly of opinion that they should have been sent to the gallows. Probably there have been greater scandals than these; and at last an exceptionally bad murderer was allowed to escape his proper punishment. Then the patience of the more austere among the citizens came to an end. In the usual American way, they held an indignation meeting and passed resolutions. As a matter of course, this seemed tame to a portion of those present, and they proceeded, also in the usual American way, to lynch the offenders. That, at least, was their intention; but the force of police at the gaol was strong enough to make a fight, though not to suppress the riot at once. Then things followed their natural course. The mob was angered by an opposition which was not sufficiently strong to cow it, and grew very violent. Arms were procured, shots were fired, blood was spilt. The rioters were furious at the severe measures taken against the exercise of a traditional American privilege, and finally Cincinnati had to be occupied by a little army of militia, and two hundred or more persons killed and wounded before order was restored. The police were able to save the imprisoned murderers from murder at the hands of the populace, but Lynch-law was not wholly defeated. In the course of the disturbance the law courts, which were nowise responsible for the alleged miscarriages of justice committed in them, were burnt to the ground, and the interests of the whole community seriously damaged by the destruction of a number of important documents. By this wholesome clearance a heavy expense will be entailed on Cincinnati for the buildings which must be restored, and the offending lawyers will be supplied with abundance of remunerative work for some years to come. Such is the justice of the sovereign people when it sits as mob.

If the people of the United States are inclined to try and make the best of this ugly business, they can find quite enough in it to encourage them. It is certainly better to find a mob rioting in favour of the strict administration of the law rather than for the contrary motive. Then, too, the police, and, with the exception of one regiment, the militia, on whom the task of restoring order mainly fell, did their duty bravely, and were well supported by the law-abiding part of the citizens. Disorder of this sort does far less harm in the long run than the Jew-baiting which has been going on over half Europe during the last few years. But it is not to be believed that the citizens of the United States have lowered their standard to the level of Russia or Hungary. It will be left to the more unwise sort of their admirers in England to discover that lynching riots are admirable things in themselves. The Americans will be the last people in the world to approve the pretentious twaddle that street riots are "a "good sign of the healthy future of American demo-"cracy." Nothing is easier than to lead a crowd of angry men into violence in any part of the world and under any form of government. All that is required is a beginning, which may be a mere matter of accident, and the temporary absence of an armed force too strong to be resisted. Within the last few years we have seen street-fighting in Belgium, Italy, Russia, and at home in Lancashire. It is barely twelve months ago since the inhabitants of Hounslow rehearsed the Cincinnati disturbance on a small scale. What really is a proof of the healthy condition of society in the United States is that disturbances of any serious kind occur so seldom. Much of the country is thinly inhabited and newly settled. There has always been a section in which every man has had to trust mainly to his own courage to defend his life and property. The practice of carrying arms is indulged in to a dangerous extent. Adventurers and refugees from all the world find their way to the States, and yet, in the presence of all these elements and occasions for disorder, the State and Federal Governments are very ill armed. It may be asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the peace could not be kept for forty eight hours in many of the most civilized parts of Europe if the police and the army were as weak as they are in the United States.

The events at Cincinnati are none the less calculated to make the people of the United States reflect seriously on the dangers which are beginning to threaten them. It has hitherto been their accepted principle that the force of their government is due to the spontaneous loyalty of the citizens. They have never found it necessary to supply the authorities with the large armed power which is indispensable in Europe. The prosperity of their country has been so great and so rapid that they have been able to persuade themselves that they would always escape the evils common to other nations. They have been so little governed that they have been able to endure abuses in administration which appear intolerable when they are described. It has long been obvious that this is a condition of things which could not possibly endure. As the country fills up and the cities grow in size, the business of administration becomes complicated to a degree unknown in the early days of the Republic. Already the mass of the citizens who were long content to let what little government they had misbehave at discretion in small matters, because they were well aware of their power to have their own way if they chose to exert it, are beginning to find that this careless good humour cannot be safely shown any longer. The riots at Cincinnati should be sufficient evidence of the folly of allowing abuses to go on unchecked till they become an excuse for disorder, and it ought by this time also to be tolerably plain to everybody in the United States that their Governments are not properly armed to deal with the elements of anarchy now collected in the great cities. The Cincinnati riots would have been stopped at once if the municipal authorities could have disposed of a few hundred armed men on an emergency, for as far as we can judge from the details received up to the present, the disturbance was almost accidental. A dense city population is always capable of becoming a mob, and may be set in action by well-meaning people with the best intentions, but the most fatal results. It is a matter of common experience that the well-meaning people lose their influence as soon as the first shot is fired. With the necessity of arming their Governments the citizens of the United States will find that there is associated the duty of watching the administration vigilantly. The old days of easy tolerance are coming to an end for them, and the present and the next generation will be amply occupied on the work of internal reform. The task will be by no means difficult. The evils to be remedied lie mostly on the surface, and can be removed by the exercise of a little courage, some tact, and a good deal of patience. Neither is there any reason to doubt that the work will be done. In spite of follies and errors in detail, the States have hitherto been governed with remarkable good sense in essentials. Nothing is needed to secure the making of the necessary reforms except the general conviction of their necessity, and that should be produced by this last demonstration of the existence of dangerous elements in the great cities.

ETHICS OF PLAGIARISM.

THOUGH the Americans are less successful, if not less earnest, than we could wish in their supervision of Irish dynamitards, they have a lively detective force to watch over English errors. Our literary sins are at once found out and proclaimed on the housetop. Not long since an American critic discovered that an English novelist had borrowed a dab of "local colour" from some obscure and forgotten description of the Southern States. A hue-and-cry was raised, as if the unlucky author had stolen a whole plot, or had written a tale and attributed its authorship to some famous man of letters deceased. Now a much more curious example of plagiarism or coincidence has been "smelt out," as the Zulus say, and all the pack of literary beagles is in full cry after Mr. CHARLES READE. The "Master," as he has been enthusiastically styled by a distinguished contemporary, can on all occasions make his hand keep his head. Mr. READE is never slow to descend into the arena of controversy. Often challenged, he pitches his hat into the ring, and follows it with alacrity. Probably he has his sufficient reply. In the meanwhile, the charges urged against him afford material for a very pretty quarrel.

Mr. READE has published, in Harper's Magazine, a story of which we confess that we have only read the second number. The tale is called "The Picture." Some one is struck with a portrait, in the house of his uncle, where he is a visitor, and the story of the portrait is told by the Curé. We learn that the painting represents a Mlle. DE GROUCY, daughter of the Marquis DE GROUCY, and that this lady, about the time of the Revolution, married a peasant named FLAUBERT. This mésalliance was the result of advanced opinions, and much reading of ROUSSEAU. Naturally the family of Mlle. DE GROUCY cast her off, and the lady lived in the hut of her peasant lord. The peasant annoyed his noble wife by losing his money at cards; she irritated him by scolding; he struck her, and she stabbed him to death. The Curé happened to witness this distressing affair; and "the champion of all those parts lay on his own floor, "surrounded by the jugs, and mugs, and plates he had won "by conquering the other SAMSONS of the district, felled by "a woman's hand, armed with a bare bodkin." A jury was so moved by the patrician dignity of the widow FLAUBERT that she escaped with two years' seclusion in a religious house. Here she saw the error of her ways, but remained, after her release, in obscurity. Finally one CATHERINE, an old woman about the place, died, and the Curé then revealed that the faithful CATHERINE had been the widow FLAUBERT née DE GROUCY. The moral is that young ladies of rank should not read ROUSSEAU, should not marry peasants, and should be very careful with their bodkins.

Perhaps the narrative does not seem very striking or marvellous to the reader. It is not the kind of brilliant idea that an amateur really could not keep his hands off, if he found it in the possession of another. Yet this tale—the series of situations and the characters—has been wandering over the world like some ancient myth, found in the remotest lands. A correspondent of the Nation (the New York paper) had read this story in the Month, and also in LITTELL'S Living Age, in 1869. In LITTELL'S Living Age the story was said to be derived from "the "French." A good deal of conjectural ingenuity was displayed in the effort to show that the tale had originally been written by Lady GEORGIANA FULLERTON. These suggestions came from the cultured city of Michigan. But Boston is a great deal wiser than Michigan in literary matters. In the Nation for March 20 a Bostonian announces that the story in LITTELL'S Living Age (called "The Portrait in My Uncle's Dining-Room") "is a literal "translation from Mlle. de Malepeire, by Mme. REYBAUD "(Paris, 1856)." Next comes to judgment Miss C. J. MARSHALL, in the Academy. This lady recognizes in Mr. READE'S Mlle. DE GROUCY the Mlle. de Malepeire of Mme. REYBAUD. The tale was also brought out, it seems, in the St. James's Magazine for 1867, and has been detected there by an active agent who writes to the Boston Literary World. This one story, then, has many names—Where He Found Her, The Portrait in My Uncle's Dining-Room, Mlle. de Malepeire, and, if Mr. READE'S assailants do not grossly wrong him, The Picture.

"All the stories have been told already," according to Mr. HOWELLS, and the fate of this legend certainly suggests that new ideas and new plots are very rare. We must believe them to be so scarce that either great wits naturally jump to and annex the same set of ideas, or that there is a plentiful lack of international literary honesty. The ethics of plagiarism ought not to be very hard to fix. If we might set up as casuists, we would venture to propose three lenient rules which would clear many great men now falsely accused of plagiarism. In the first place, we would permit any great modern artist to recut and to set anew the literary gems of classic times and of the middle ages. Thus VIRGIL had a right to all he conveyed from HOMER and from APOLLONIUS, nor can LUCRETIUS be blamed for his adaptation of the beautiful passage in the Odyssey about the homes of the gods. PLAUTUS and TERENCE, in the same way, might blamelessly, as openly, adapt from MENANDER, or THEOCRITUS take the theme of the Adoniazusæ from SOPHRON. The Roman Comedians did not stamp themselves as plagiarists; they only took, quite consciously, a secondary rank. On this principle the LAUREATE'S unnumbered borrowings from VIRGIL, HOMER, DANTE, are all as fair as they are charming. England is richer, the ancients are not poorer, and the scholar wins a double delight in the pleasures of comparison and reminiscence.

Our second rule would be that all authors have an equal right to the stock situations which are the common store of humanity. HOMER was not the first to tell the tale of the Cyclops and of the wiles of CIRCE. The avaricious father, the cunning servant, the spendthrift son, the infants changed at nurse, the hero (rumoured to be drowned) who returns in perfect health, the sprained ankle, the infuriated bull, and so forth—every one may make them his own who cannot think of anything better. No one thinks the worse of Called Back because the idea has been used by XAVIER DE MONTÉPIN in Le Médecin des Folles, and, to a certain extent, by Lord LYTTON in the Strange Story. Any man who can make old situations as good as new has a perfect right, like MOLIÈRE, to take his own where he finds it, just as CHARLES DE BERNARD, in Un Homme Sérieux, makes us laugh again over an incident used in L'Ecole des Femmes. No man has any original copyright in or claim to the common property of humanity. We may find the oldest extant examples of certain dramatic situations in HESIOD or in the Rig Veda; but they are far older than these authorities, and have found their way wherever men amuse themselves with romances. Finally, we presume that an author has a right to borrow or buy an idea if he frankly acknowledges the transaction, as THACKERAY did in the case of The Bedford Row Conspiracy. Crime begins when an author, or rather an adapter, tries to hide his conveyance of another man's goods, and to claim something more than the merit of a skilled cobbler or translator.

Outside these limits, which seem wide enough, direct plagiarism begins. It may be asked whether a man can plagiarize from himself? SHERIDAN LE FANU, the greatest of purely "sensational" English novelists, repeated in various essays the main idea of Uncle Silas. Apparently he was trying to work his notions up to the highest perfection, which in Uncle Silas he found at last, to the shuddering delight of his readers. M. FORTUNÉ DU BOISGOBEY, that fertile novelist, has certainly stolen from his own Epingle Rose a truc which he uses in his new and thrilling Margot la Balafrée. The man who loses his way in Paris, and helps a stranger to carry a chair which is found to contain a dead body, opens the plot in the story of the Restoration as in the story of to-day. To make a mystery hinge on somnambulism is as old as The Spectre of Tappington, and who knows how much older? Mr. WILKIE COLLINS employs the truc in The Moonstone, and M. FORTUNÉ DU BOISGOBEY in L'Affaire Matapan. It is difficult, however, to avoid the suspicion that M. BOISGOBEY ploughed with Mr. JAMES PAYN'S heifer in the diving-bell passages of L'Affaire Matapan and Une Affaire Mystérieuse. Mr. PAYN'S Perfect Treasure, where the romance of the diving-bell is well worked, is earlier than either of these books by M. DU BOISGOBEY. But the crime would be at best a peccadillo compared with boldly driving off a whole story, plot, characters, and all, out of the French across into the American marches. Mr. READE'S novel differs from that of Mme. REYBAUD in details. For example, in both stories come the incidents of letting the husband's soup cool, and heating his sabots with ashes. But Mr. READE's lady stabs her husband with a bodkin, after he has struck her, while Mme. REYBAUD's girl slays her lord in bed, and therefore, perhaps, is the more deeply stained culprit of the pair. What the explanation of the resemblance may be we shall doubtless learn in good time.

LUNATICS AND THE LAW.

IT would not be of the slightest use to open a formal attack upon the Lunacy Laws, except at a moment when the public happened to be strongly excited by the opportune discovery of some case of gross violation of personal liberty. But the existing state of the law is so bad that no occasion of calling attention to it ought to be altogether passed by, and just now there is such an occasion. There has been a slight revival of interest in the subject owing to the observations of the judge in the WELDON case, and to the appearance of some articles in two evening papers. It is not an interest that promises to have any solid result, but it is only by making the most of these momentary stirrings of the public conscience that things can ever be altered for the better. Nothing can be simpler, one would say, than the principles on which a Lunacy Law ought to be based. There are two dangers to be guarded against, the consignment to an asylum of a man who is sane, and the detention of a man who has become sane; and the arrangements at present in force make no real provision against either of them. Any one may be handed over to the proprietor of a licensed madhouse, on production of an order signed ordinarily perhaps by a near relation or intimate friend, but in case of need by an entire stranger, if only he has seen the alleged lunatic within a month from the date of the order. The defenders of the present law plead that it is necessary to allow the order to be signed by any one under the sun, because without this liberty there would be no way of dealing with urgent cases. A man may go mad when he is away from all his friends, staying perhaps, as Dr. FORBES WINSLOW puts it, at a lodging-house, the landlord of which knows nothing about him. In this event, it is contended, the landlord of the lodging-house is the right person, and the only person, to sign the order. Otherwise time would be lost in hunting up some relation or friend, and murder or suicide might take place before one could be found. The order of admission must be accompanied by two medical certificates, and it might be thought that, since no restrictions have been placed on the issue of the order, some test of qualification, or at the least of official character, would be demanded from the doctor. There is nothing of the kind. No special knowledge of mental disorder is required. Any two doctors will do, so long as they are doctors and have the requisite certificates to show. The only other condition that they must satisfy is that they are not professionally connected with one another or with the proprietor of the asylum to whom the order is addressed. But they may be connected in all manner of ways with the person by whom the order is signed. He may have bribed them to give certificates in which the facts of the case are either exaggerated or invented, and so long as they keep their own counsel he and they are perfectly safe. He was alarmed by symptoms of madness on the part of the alleged lunatic, and he called in two doctors who decided that it was not safe to leave him any longer at large. Where is the weak point in this plea? Nowhere except in the consciences of the man who signed the order and of the doctors who gave the certificates. They may know that order and certificates alike owe their being to purely mercenary considerations, but they may safely defy any one else to prove it against them. Dr. FORBES WINSLOW says that when the order is signed by a stranger the Commissioners in Lunacy inquire most carefully into the circumstances. But the danger of false imprisonment probably arises much more often in cases where the order is signed by the nearest relation. It is not even necessary to credit this relation with the intention of shutting up a sane person. There is a great deal of eccentricity which does not amount to lunacy, and a great deal of lunacy which does not justify the consignment of the patient to a madhouse. He will give less trouble and be better cared for in an asylum than he can possibly be out of one—this is how the relation puts the case to himself—so to an asylum he must go. If a man is at all eccentric, things can probably be told of him which, [illegible] may easily be mistaken for madness even by doctors, when these doctors have no experience in the treatment of mad cases.

All this would not matter if the asylum to which a lunatic is sent were kept by public authority, and not by a private proprietor. In that case the mischief would be over so soon as the doors had opened to receive the patient. The superintendent and the doctors would all be public officers, and they would have no interest whatever in keeping a patient who was not mad, or one who, having been mad, was mad no longer. Even if the doctors of private asylums were public officers, things would be better than they are. Whatever the proprietor might make out of his patients while they remained with him, the date of their departure would be fixed by an independent authority. But the proprietor or one of the proprietors is himself the doctor. If a patient is profitable, it rests wholly with the man who profits by him to determine whether he is fit to leave. Dr. FORBES WINSLOW says that "all the "proprietors and superintendents of asylums in England "are actuated by one motive—the welfare of their patients "and their restoration to a sound state of mind and "body." Dr. WINSLOW's ready belief in his profession is touching. It is the one flock upon earth in which there are no black sheep. But this miraculous strength of faith is not commonly to be attained. For ourselves we cannot get rid of the conviction that among the proprietors of lunatic asylums, as among mankind generally, there are some—it may be many—who are all that Dr. WINSLOW describes; some who care for nothing but money, though they are not prepared to resort to actual crime in order to make it; and a few who do not stick even at actual crime when it is the shortest road to wealth. Mr. WINGFIELD, in the curious experiences which he has lately described in the St. James's Gazette—experiences gained by disguising himself and going as a keeper in a private madhouse—mentions a case of a keeper who made 3,000*l.* by helping a patient to escape, and then invested it in setting up an asylum. Is he likely to be actuated by one motive—the welfare of his patients? There is no need to assume that many people are detained in madhouses after they become sane. The question rather is how many people have remained mad when, by better treatment, they might have recovered. The answer ordinarily made to these charges is that, even if the possibility of their being true be conceded—and we have seen that Dr. WINSLOW is not willing to go even so far as this—the intervention of the Commissioners puts everything right. That the Commissioners do all they can to put everything right there is no doubt; but the duty which the law assigns them is altogether beyond their power of performance. It is not by a sudden act of observation that the mental state of a suspected lunatic can be determined. To do this requires close and constant watching—watching, in fact, that can be given by the doctor in charge of the case, and by no one else. Thus we come round to the same point. The one man who can pronounce a supposed lunatic sane is the man whose interest it is to keep him a lunatic.

We have said nothing about the ill-usage from which lunatics in private asylums occasionally suffer, though Mr. WINGFIELD makes some unpleasing revelations upon this point. But the prevention of cruelty on the part of keepers is a difficulty common to all asylums, public and private; so that it is best kept out of the controversy between them. We have simply drawn attention to the main point in which the present law is faulty, the laxity with which it consigns men to private asylums when there may be no real evidence that they are proper subjects for such treatment. This laxity might be amended by allowing no one to be admitted into a private asylum except upon the order of a qualified doctor appointed by and responsible to the Government. Perhaps, when Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT has pulled down the Corporation of London, and set every town and village in the kingdom by the ears on the question whether it shall or shall not have public-houses, he will spare a moment for the consideration of what, as the law stands, may easily be a sentence of perpetual and causeless imprisonment.

FOX-HUNTING ON DARTMOOR.

HUNTING the wild red-deer on Exmoor has become the fashion of late—too much the fashion perhaps, to make it a very sporting affair; but a fine September spent with the stag-hounds is a delightful way of seeing and enjoying that beautiful country. One of the greatest charms of hunting is, that you are led by the chase into sundry and out-of-the-way places, sometimes of great beauty, which would be seen except by the few who live hard by, with whom familiarity may have bred contempt. To know a large tract of country as well as a hunting-man knows his country, to know every path, every stream, every ford, every lane, every gate, to say nothing of all the intricacies of the woodlands, is of itself a joy exclusively given to him. If hunting falls before the scythe of the Destroyer, this knowledge, amongst the rest, will be lost; the red-deer and the wild fox will be as the wild cat, the tree martin, the eagle, and the peregrine falcon, beautiful animals gone from us for ever—extinguished in the name of humanity. It would be a curious study in comparative psychology to speculate whether a fox would prefer life with hunting to no life at all; as a man doubtless prefers life with the gout to obliteration. As the wild red-deer is to Exmoor, so is the wild fox, the old aboriginal large grey fox, to Dartmoor. And if you want to know Dartmoor as it ought to be known, scorning guide-books and antiquarian researches into Druidical remains which the freaks of nature have bountifully supplied for the dilettanti, you must hunt this fox. You must not refrain from following after him; and where he goes you must go, even into the bogs. Getting into a bog on horseback is a curious sensation that no man who has any respect for science ought to neglect. We have given up limiting ourselves to five senses, and a sixth has been authoritatively announced. If a philosopher could be induced to hunt the fox on Dartmoor, he would experience an entirely new sensation, utterly unlike any other, when he rode his horse into a bog, which he would be bound to connect with a seventh. It is an old tradition, and a well-known fact, that no man or horse was ever hurt in a bog, though it must be allowed that it requires an educated taste, as in the case of Wagner's music and some curious old wines, to like it. It is the necessity for a good education that makes hunting on Dartmoor, very fortunately, not so popular as it might be. But to the past master, the man who has come out in honours, what hunting can be compared to it? It is true that you may take a very high degree in Leicestershire and find yourself at the bottom of the class, if a bog may be made classical, at the university of Dartmoor; and this, no doubt, carries with it its vexations. To lead the field with the Quorn, and have to follow a roughish-looking moorman, albeit very well mounted, with the Dartmoor hounds is humiliating. But everybody knows that humility is a very good thing, and it is not less so in fox-hunting than in any other walk, or gallop, in life. To run one of these great grey foxes from the large coverts at Stowford Cleave, on the Erme, near Ivybridge, across the moor to the still larger coverts at Benjay Tor, on the Dart, near Holne Chase, ten miles off, is the perfection of hunting to a really hunting-man who is not a common rider to hounds. The vice of the present day and of the present system is that large, unmanageable fields have reduced hunting-men to mere riders, and woodcraft is like to become a lost art. There has been a revival of hunting in this "so-called" nineteenth century, as there have been other revivals; and hunting has its formalists as well as other more solemn institutions. The vestments are gay and lively; the tall hat, the neat tie, the scarlet coat, the white leather breeches, the top-boots, and the spurs, with every buckle and button in the right place, make a cheerful sight on Dartmoor with a pack of hounds, and set off the scenery with great effect. But the formalism or etiquette of the modern field is a damper to hunting. Not to know the names of the hounds, not to know their tongues, not to know their different merits in drawing or in chase, with the huntsman as a high-priest of the mysteries, is a misery which civilization has happily as yet spared Dartmoor. Sir Francis Grant once said to Count d'Orsay, "That was a fine run." "Run!" said D'Orsay, "it was an epic poem." Such is a run from Stowford Cleave to Benjay Tor. The first stave is sung by Susan. She has already signalled to the huntsman by a feather that the fox is there, and the fox's delicate ear has caught a warning sound. He has moved at once from his kennel, and soon Susan proclaims him on foot, doubling her tongue in a high-pitched key, like the utterance of a wild cry of delight. He has heard Susan's tongue before, and Sontag's, her dam's, too, for that matter, a season or two ago, and although you may call it music, he thinks it Billingsgate, and puts her down as a common scold; no company for him. He will get out of hearing as quickly as possible, and being of a rather decided character, as all good foxes are, will not wait to be tally-ho'd and screamed at by the vulgar, but goes away at once. The meets at Ivybridge on great occasions sometimes number three hundred. But there are laggards amongst them, and if the fox breaks quickly, they are not all up. The moorman, on his small lean thoroughbred-looking mare, with power in the right place, leads the way down what he is pleased to call a path, perpendicular, embossed with boulders, through a dense copse, into a ravine, at the bottom of which is a foaming river. He knows the crossing-place, and you must condescend to follow; not only that, you must descend at the same pace as he does which is no condescension at all. In any other country this would look like a break-neck piece of business, but on Dartmoor it is only a common-place everyday transaction, and nobody ever breaks his neck. This is a Dartmoor cleave, coombe, or valley, cleft by the waters, and it is very beautiful. The stream is too large to be called a brook, but the trees nevertheless meet over it, and the dense mass of copse defies the fisherman. The moorman must be followed on the other side, for he knows the way out, and you must get to the moor as quickly as possible. He will tell you that there is not a moment to spare, and not to be in a hurry, which is very good advice, though it sounds ambiguous. He means that you must be as quick as you can be, but you must not hurry your horse; for if you impart your hurry to him and set his heart beating, he will not "show you the run." As for the moorman, he goes on at a perpetual easy, deliberate gallop. The hounds are ahead he knows well, but he cannot afford to hustle his mare, and once on the moor he will get to their sterns somehow. He cares not who passes him, he has only one object in view, and that is to see the run, which, if a good moor-run, will demand all his skill and horsemanship, added to the staying blood of his mare. It is hopeless to attempt crossing the few enclosures between the covert and the moor. The moorman scuttles up an unpromising unsportsmanlike-looking lane, and you had better put your pride in your pocket and do the same. Suddenly you emerge on the moor, and you have before you what looks like a boundless piece of fine turf, short furze, and heather, backed, it is true, by dark-looking hills, with tors on their tops, and a suspicion of granite rocks scattered about; but where you are is ground fit for a racecourse. You are on high land; and, if you are so foolish as to look behind you, Plymouth Sound, with the ships at anchor, the Channel, and a lovely country, rich with meadow, woods, rivers, and pleasant-looking mansions, lies several hundred feet below. Thanks to the moorman, you find yourself on pretty good terms with the hounds, the high enclosures having hindered them a little; but now they are racing as hounds on Dartmoor only do race, with a straight-running fox before them, and under them the old primeval turf which has never known the plough and a soil on which the gentle dews of heaven never cease to drop. This seems an exceedingly pleasant hunting country, and nothing can be easier than riding to hounds. It is still rising ground, but it does not look very steep, and now would be the time to ride at the tail of the pack; but you have been warned to keep your eye on the moorman, and you see him going on the same easy gallop as before, with his mare's ears pricked forward harkening to the hounds. It is exactly the pace she can keep up for ever. The moorman kindly throws away his advice on young Ambition, who gallops past him on a hack. "Gently, young fellow," he says in his own broadest Devonshire, "you'll beat your horse." "Oh! I'll take my guinea out of him," says Ambition, who has that sum to pay for his hack. "You've a-took nineteen and sixpence out of him already," says the moorman, which proves only too true, for in another furlong the poor hack hopelessly stops for good, and young Ambition has to get back to his mess at Plymouth, where he tells his brother officers what a beastly country Dartmoor is. You are not long in getting over this fine ground and reaching the black-looking tors. The ground has been gradually rising, and most of the three hundred who had somehow got to the moor have tailed off. The scenery is very wild, and the enclosures are out of sight, except in the distance where the sun is smiling upon them. There is sound footing round the tors, but the high table-land is hopeless bog, from which trickle the streams that scoop out the deep coombes, and joining their forces form into rivers. Where the ground is sound it is studded with granite boulders, and between tor and tor there is a steep bit of rocky riding with a brook in a bed of rocks at the bottom. The hounds are going at their best pace, and you must ride down over these rocks at your best pace, for down this hill, or precipice if you like, is the chance you have to get on better terms with the pack. The moorman knows the best crossing-place to which he has ridden rather faster than before, but still with none of that fatal hurry, down over rocks which would make a stranger's hair stand on end. But facing the hill opposite is a far more serious thing, and to ride up a hill properly so that your horse, who must be a stout one, can gallop when at the top is the art in riding over Dartmoor to hounds. Many a horse will do the first hill gallantly, and perhaps the second; but the third is the stopper, and when you have got to the top of that and find that your horse can gallop, you may put him down as a Dartmoor hunter, and you may be sure he comes of a long line of sires of the best staying families in England. You may be very proud of your horse, but the moorman will ask you "Can a'continny?" which being interpreted means, Can he continue to gallop for ever? If he cannot, his mane and his tail and all his other beauties are held in contempt. Having successfully followed the moorman up this first hill at exactly the right pace, no faster and no slower, you find yourself by no means too near the hounds, who are running over the bogs on your left faster than you ever saw hounds run before, and you have now to encounter the greatest difficulties that Dartmoor presents. Well may the Quorn man say, "This is no country for me." Nevertheless, it demands the finest horsemanship at your disposal, and the word fine here means "refined," for care of your horse and nursing his powers are indispensable requisites. No stranger can go here; you must know every inch of the country, or you must follow some one who does. There are three sorts of bog—the impassable, the just passable, and the sound, though deep—indistinguishable except by personal experience. This the moorman has; it has been the business of his life, and he has been in all of them. His mare is going her usual pace, which you now seem to think rather fast, with her ears pricked forward as before listening to the hounds. He takes a very decided line, and soon gets on the jobber's path on which drovers have driven their cattle for centuries, as sound ground in the midst of the bogs. He keeps the hounds well in sight and hearing by virtue of this path, but suddenly leaving it he rides down a boggy precipice with the inevitable granite, improving his pace a little, to the River Awne. It is the Awne in Dartmoor, but the Avon "in along." It is a bad river to cross, but he knows the best place, and half cheats the opposite hill by riding up a little coombe with a stream in it. The hounds have crossed about a quarter of a mile above, the worst of Dartmoor has been passed, and you are on the best galloping ground on its borders. The hounds are still going a terrific pace, and you must ride all you know. Your horse has just done his second hill, and the third is to come. You are on high land, and away on your right you can see the valleys and thick woodlands leading down to the Dart; beyond, the rich land, with Teignmouth and the Teign in the extreme distance. Before you, some way off the moor, lie Holne Chase and Buckland-on-the-Moor, two of the most lovely places in Devon, opposite one another, with the great Dart between:—

Oh! river Dart! Oh! river Dart!
Every year thou claim'st a heart.

You are not on a racecourse after all; there are small, deep coombes to cross, and as the hounds are going straight for Holne Moor the moorman thinks Benjay Tor is his point (never, as a rule, ride to points), and he rides for the crossing place over the brook which runs through that most lovely of all lovely fox coverts, Skaye, the deepest gorge of granite and the densest thicket of copse and gorse to be found anywhere, impenetrable even to the moorman. But the fox has heard Susan's tongue there, and he likes Benjay Tor better. Now comes the third hill down and up, steep, rocky, and trying, and the moorman is on Holne Moor, with the heather up to his mare's knees and the blackcock flying about. This heather holds scent well, and the pace of the hounds is as good as ever, better it could not be, but it is high land, and there is a slope down to Benjay Tor with sound ground under the heather. If there is anything left in your horse, you can improve your pace, in the faith that no fox is such a fool as to scorn Benjay Tor. There you find yourself well up with the hounds, though you have never ridden a severer run in your life, but not the three hundred. A select few straggle up, and we look very pretty with our red coats, off our horses, standing on the top of the tor. It is a rule with the moorman to get off his horse whenever there is nothing doing, to ease her spine, as he calls it. There speaks the good horseman. The fox has gone in, too deep in the granite for any terrier to fret him. It is a fox's "holt," and he gets air through the cracks in the rock. In his present state he could not breathe in an "earth," hence the distinction. It would take a population of miners to get him out; and the huntsman, who is up, grumbles, for he wanted his blood. You secretly rejoice that he has saved that beautiful brush of his, with the long white tag at the end; and that his intelligent mask, with his bright eyes dimmed, is not dangling at the whip's saddle. You stand on the top of Benjay Tor, which is the granite crown of a high cliff hanging over the Dart, with a corresponding cliff, Sharpy Tor, on the opposite side. It is all dense copse and granite stretching down the steep banks of the Dart as it flows to Holne Cot, Holne Chase, and Buckland-on-the-Moor, "brawling," as the poet says, as it goes. Looking up stream it is the same; but further up you see Dart Meet, where the two Darts, East and West, separate or join (as you like it); and in the background Dartmoor again appears—shall we say frowns?—looking black at you, with fine rugged tors, Bellever Tor the chief, on his forehead. It is the finest spot in Devonshire, and, according to the moorman, the finest spot in the world. His mare looks as if another five miles or so of galloping would be a pleasure to her; but he says a cheery "Good-bye!" and goes off into the heart of the moor at a slow hound-trot, which often takes him twenty-five miles to covert with ease. He "knows by" a path with a good sandy bottom through the bogs to his snug home in a deep valley on the western side of the moor. You have seen Dartmoor, and you have had a lesson in riding. The last stave of the epic was sung by the moorman when he cried his "Whoo-hoop!" at Benjay Tor, in a scream that awakened all the echoes of all the hills.

A NEW DEFOE.

WE have received from Messrs. Bickers & Son, of Leicester Square, a circular letter and a specimen title-page, having reference to a proposed new edition of Defoe. The circular contains a statement that, "as [the publishers'] desire is to make this edition as complete as possible, they will be glad to hear from any one possessing letters or other matter attributed to or known to be by Defoe." We very gladly give currency and publicity to this request, and we hope it may be widely answered. But there happens to be a good deal to be said on the matter of a complete edition (and, for the matter of that, of any new edition) of Defoe; and, for reasons which will appear in the sequel, it is of very great importance that the attention, both of Messrs. Bickers and of any one who is likely to take an interest in their projected publication, should be called to it.

The circular to which we have referred speaks of "an uniform edition of Defoe's complete works in twenty volumes." The title-page of the printed specimen speaks of "the novels and miscellaneous works of Daniel Defoe, with a biographical memoir of the author, literary prefaces to the various pieces, illustrative notes, &c., including all contained in the edition attributed to the late Sir Walter Scott, with considerable additions. In twenty volumes." Now, in the first place, there is a great difference between the "complete" works and the works described in the title; and, in the second, that title is not in all respects satisfactory. To begin with, no edition in the type and size represented by the specimen before us (both, let it be said, comely enough) can by any possibility be "complete" in twenty volumes. The Review, the topographical works, and others have never been reprinted in any collections; and no collection has, even with these exceptions, and with the further exception of doubtful and periodical matter, contained anything like a complete set of what is known, still less of what is suspected, to be Defoe's. It seems pretty certain, therefore, that, if the proposed reprint is to be in twenty volumes, it will not be complete. The "attributed" collection spoken of, which is with more correctness to be attributed to Sir G. C. Lewis, fills twenty by itself, and omits very much. Again, we do not observe that either in the circular or in the specimen any responsible editor is spoken of. It is certain that without such an editor no edition of a satisfactory kind can possibly be produced, and that the familiar plan of the orange-peel in St. James's Street will not succeed in selecting him. With no desire to disparage Professor Minto's valuable monograph in the series of English Men of Letters, which was composed with a different object, it may be said that there is at present no detailed Life of Defoe which is worthy to be put at the head of a complete edition of his works as representing the sifting, comparison, and completion of Wilson, Chalmers, Chadwick, Lee, &c. The literary prefaces to the various pieces, if they are old, will not represent the existing state of knowledge and criticism; and if they are new will require a "hand" of something above merely hack character. The illustrative notes are still more in this case, and indeed may be said to be almost entirely à faire. They are moreover very much wanted, for Defoe is chokeful of allusions to matters which have quite dropped out of the knowledge of the present generation. Lastly, literary knowledge and skill of the highest kind would not be thrown away in the attempt to select from Mr. Lee's two volumes of hypothetical works, and from the vast mass of other available material, what ought, and to reject what ought not, to appear in a complete edition. Without real editing Messrs. Bickers, even if they do not content themselves with what Mr. Carlyle somewhere calls a mere "formless agglomeration," will only add one more to the existing collections of Defoe which alternately disappoint the student by what they do not contain and irritate him by what they do. With such an editor, and with his name properly announced as a guarantee of the work, their book can only gain in popularity with the general reader, and will acquire its only chance of being really satisfactory to students. Indeed, except to students and to lovers of English literature, it is scarcely possible to understand what the attraction of a new collection of Defoe can be at all. We therefore write these lines and those which follow in the hope both of dissuading Messrs. Bickers from an incomplete and unedited, and of persuading them to a complete and properly edited, edition of this one of the most peculiar, if not one of the greatest, of English writers. Very likely they have such an edition in view, and have not fully stated their intention. In that case we shall be most happy to learn it.

There are at present, to the best of our knowledge, four collections of Defoe's work obtainable at the booksellers', though two of them only are kept in print. The one-volume edition of Messrs. Nimmo need not be further referred to, because, though its contents were selected with a great deal of judgment, and its double columns and large pages are roomy, still its limitation to a single volume prevents it from being more than a cleverly arranged sample. Then there is the edition already referred to attributed to Scott, but which was not fully brought out till after Scott's death, though it included and reproduced some work of his on the novels. This is the fullest, but it is anything but full. The best of all, as far as it goes, is that brought out in three large double-columned volumes, and part of a fourth by Mr. Hazlitt, some forty years ago. But it broke off in the middle, and its size, print, and arrangement are uninviting, not to mention that it is not easily obtainable. It contains, however, work missing in the others. Lastly, there is the well-known seven-volume collection in Bohn's Library which has all the novels except the third part of Robinson Crusoe, but not very much else, while it includes the dull, dirty, and certainly spurious, Mother Ross. But any one who should think that a complete collection of Defoe is to be secured even by the process of combining these four and excluding duplicates would be wofully deceived. Let no one even think that by getting together the separate printed books not included in them, but to be hunted out at the booksellers' by consulting Lowndes, Hazlitt, or Lee, he can do that trick. In the first place, it is believed that no complete copy of the Review, the forerunner of the Steele and Addison daily essay, and the ancestor of every newspaper in England, that is not a mere newsletter, exists except in the collection of the late Mr. James Crossley. This collection has not, we believe, been dispersed yet; but, unless Messrs. Bickers have secured the Review, or unless they are taking measures to do so, their book can be nothing like complete. Again, Mr. Crossley was credited with possessing the unique and unpublished Complete Gentleman. In an interview with him at Manchester, six years ago, he informed a visitor who had a special interest in the subject that he possessed other works of Defoe which no commentator had mentioned, or at least which were unique, but which he could not get at because his books were higgledy-piggledy in a house into which he had lately moved. Then the various books edited rather than written by Defoe present very considerable interest, and would need careful editing. And, lastly, as has been said, no little judgment and a great deal of labour must be required to sift Mr. Lee's contribution of "Foeiana." The opinion entertained by many students of those contributions is not altogether favourable, and it was gathered from the above referred to conversation with Mr. Crossley that he (who was incomparably the best authority living on Defoe) thought as they do. But still the matter requires sorting and testing. Lastly, one at least of Defoe's unquestioned works will need a certain amount of hardihood on the part of the editor in ushering it even in the track of one of his predecessors to the notice of a modern and squeamish public. Yet it is one of the most characteristic of the whole. Altogether, the work is not a light work, and we are unable to understand any reason that Messrs. Bickers can have for keeping back the name of the editor, if they have selected a competent one.

We speak plainly on this subject, because damage, at least temporarily irreparable, may be done by silence. There is unfortunately but a scanty demand nowadays for library editions of any but a very few English classics. Books of the kind go heavily off, and one edition is nearly certain to make another hopeless as a commercial speculation for many years. We do not think we are betraying any confidence when we say that the reprint, unedited and uncorrected, which Messrs. Bickers themselves have just finished of Scott's Swift, prevented another publisher from entrusting to one of the most competent editors now living a completely recast and adequate presentation of the whole work of the author of Gulliver. Messrs. Bickers, as we have great pleasure in recognizing, bring out their books in a mechanical style which leaves little or nothing to desire, and it is all the more certain that even the most "amorphous" Defoe in twenty volumes that they may choose to issue will close the market to another in all probability for more years than most of us have to live. Therefore, it is but the plain duty of every one acquainted with the facts, and having a love for English literature, to request them to furnish some more explicit guarantee of the completeness and the adequacy of the new Defoe than they have yet done. There are authors in whose case insufficiency or eccentricity of editing matters very little. If people play tricks with Chaucer, we can fall back on Tyrwhitt; if they make foolish comments on Ben Jonson, we can make ourselves fairly happy with the familiar grumbles of Gifford; if the sacrilegious hand of the modernizer and abridger is laid on Burton, or Sidney, or Mallory, there are plenty of older editions venal at the stall. But to get together a complete original Defoe, if it is physically possible at all (and but for the probable sale of Mr. Crossley's books it would not be so), would take years of time, pockets full of money, and an infinity of trouble. Much —very much—of him is for the ordinary modern reader in want of comment, luminous if brief; much is doubtful, not a little that goes by his name is pretty certainly spurious. A fresh attempt, therefore, at a complete edition (for more than one of the existing collections meant to be complete, but could not) is a really serious matter. If it is to be understood that no arbitrary limits will be set to it; and that it will be entrusted to a competent editor, with carte blanche to edit the work of his predecessors as well as the text (the edition mentioned on the title-page is anything but a model of text-editing), it will be a great pleasure to all Englishmen who love literature to help it on in every way they can. But if one more botched bookseller's collection is to be added to the botches already existing, we are constrained to say that such Englishmen, without whose countenance it is hardly likely to be what it otherwise might easily be, satisfactory to its publishers as well as to its readers, will probably turn a cold shoulder to it, and will not be wrong in doing so.

TWICE-PAID BILLS.

THE London School Board are at present paying more than half a million a year to teachers; and, in addition to this sum, ten thousand a year is paid to various persons who instruct and inspect the teaching staff. We shall fully examine the conditions under which this amazing arrangement is worked. The London teachers are supposed to be very highly qualified indeed, and they certainly ought to know their trade if length of training and liberal salary count for anything. The average teacher serves an apprenticeship of five years, during which time he is under the supervision of a certificated master. He learns to manage classes of children with dexterity and effect, and he picks up a good deal of book-work. At the end of each year he must pass an examination; and, after he has got through five of such ordeals in succession, he competes for a scholarship, which takes him to a Normal College. While he is in college he is free from the drudgery of teaching, and all his time is devoted to study, excepting one fortnight per year, which he spends in a model school, under the eye of a comparatively skilful superintendent. At the end of the first year of training he is examined again; and at the end of the second year he is required to give a specimen of his ability as a teacher before a Government Inspector. If he is inept or stupid, his career ends then and there; if he comes through the test with credit, he is sent out to take his place in a school. But it must not be imagined that he blossoms into a certificated master immediately after his college time is over. The certificate is withheld for two years, and even the cost of the young teacher's maintenance at the training-school is kept back until he has shown that he is fit for the rough daily labour of an ordinary elementary school. Another Inspector requires him to give a series of lessons; and, if the performance is good, a parchment certificate is granted, and the sum of 100*l.* is sent to the college in which the successful man was trained. So, before any one can qualify as a teacher, he must pass through a probation of nine years, and he receives his testamur when he is about twenty-two years old.

Now, in addition to this rather long spell of practice, the London School Board require a master to serve at least three years in a subordinate position, for no head teachership is granted to candidates under twenty-five years of age. We may therefore take it that every one of the Board's schoolmasters has been employed in instructing children and in passing examinations for at least twelve years. After this severe drilling, the typical teacher becomes what scientific persons call a specialized product. All his faculties have been directed to one end. He may be coarse, or inartistic, or ignorant of the world and of books; but he is nearly always surpassingly clever in imparting whatever knowledge he happens to possess. If the best man from Cambridge or Oxford in any given year were set to work in an elementary school beside an ordinary assistant-master who had just come from college, the class taught by the University scholar would lag far behind the one taught by his half-educated neighbour. The University man knows much, but can teach little; the trained workman does not know much, but he can set forth all his knowledge with lucidity and tact.

A vast corps of these drilled specialists are in the service of the Board; and it might be thought that they should be able to manage the work of teaching children of the poorer class up to the limits marked by the Code. The salaries paid by the Board are sufficient to tempt the best men in the country; and at this date there are actually 544 teachers employed in Board Schools who have spent twelve years (over and above the nine years' probation) in elementary school work. If these teachers are not competent, they should be.

Now the Board, after offering good prices for head-masters, fancy prices for head-mistresses, and fair salaries for assistants, proceed to assume that the staff which they have gathered by outbidding all competitors is totally inefficient, and the public are saddled with the cost of a set of secondary tutors whose duty it is to teach the teachers. A man may have spent thirty years in acquiring skill, knowledge, and experience, yet as soon as he enters the service of the Board he finds himself under the supervision of a whole army of very highly-paid officials who never leave him at peace for more than a few months at a time. First of all there are eight School Inspectors employed by the Board. These gentlemen draw 450*l.* per annum apiece, with 50*l.* travelling expenses. Let us see the effects of their work. As soon as the Government Inspector has left a school the new year's labour begins. Each standard must pass over a certain amount of ground which is definitely stated in the Code, and a full twelve months is allowed in order that each new grade may be mastered. If Thomas Smith is examined in long division, compound addition, and compound subtraction in April 1884, he will be required to pass in compound multiplication, compound division, and "weights and measures" in April 1885. But six months before the highly-paid Government Inspector imposes his test, the highly-paid Board Inspector enters the school, and proceeds to set an examination precisely similar to that which is to be met at the end of the year. For three or four days—perhaps for a week—the school is kept at fever pitch. The Inspector makes an elaborate report on discipline, organization, registers, premises, books and material, Scripture, music, drawing, home lessons, object lessons, staff, reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, history, science subjects, tone, and all the rest, and he finishes up by composing a terse summary, on which the reputation of the teacher depends. His report is duly printed, and the teacher receives a smart rebuke if any shortcomings are manifest. Then the final six months of the school year are devoted to preparing for the advent of the great man from Whitehall. But the children are strenuously wound up to satisfy the Board Inspector; the best of them cover the year's work easily in six months, and the weaker of them are thrust forward with a vigour that is painful to witness. The consequence is that for six months the sharp youngsters go wearily over and over the same stale ground that is familiar to them as their own limbs; while the dull ones are ground and ground until they can get through the examination along with their more fortunate comrades. It follows that the ratepayers' money is fruitlessly expended during a great part of each year. We must treat knowledge which is bought by the public as we should treat any other commodity for which that public pays. Now, if more than half of the children attending the schools can cover the Government standard easily in six months, then for the other six months of the year we are paying for the instruction of children who are practically learning nothing whatever. If the children cannot cover the standard in six months, what earthly good is obtained by sending a Board Inspector to worry them before the time is ripe? The dilemma is an awkward one; and we should very much like to see which horn would be chosen by those who have created it. Either the children are cruelly hurried or inadequately taught. Either the Government require too little or the Board exact too much. We incline to the latter solution. It is most scandalously unfair that the people should first of all be required to pay through Imperial taxation the heavy salaries of Government Inspectors, and that then, in addition, they should pay through local taxation the heavy salaries of a duplicate set of secondary Inspectors. If the Government Inspectors are inefficient, why are they suffered to retain office? If they are useful and efficient, why should their work be repeated by other men?

When we pursue our investigations further we find still more reason for surprise, and even alarm. Her Majesty's Inspector reports on the teaching of singing, and withholds a portion of the grant if the subject is not well taught; the Board Inspector also reports on the singing of each school. But this is not enough; and thus the Board bring in a third hand by appointing an Inspector of Music, whose duty it is to ignore the other two critics, and make a report for himself. Again, the Board has in its service two thousand teachers who are certificated to teach drawing, and each of these persons receives 5*l.* a year on account of the qualification which he has gained by examination. But, not content with handing out 10,000*l.* a year for the teaching of drawing, the Board appoint an Instructor to teach the certificated persons to whom the 10,000*l.* are paid. The Drawing Instructor very naturally writes the most harrowing accounts of the want of artistic merit which characterizes the drawings done in school. He exalts his office, and appears to think that there can be no salvation for us until the blight of bad freehand is removed. Very good. But if the teachers cannot teach, why pay them 10,000*l.* for teaching? If they can teach, why appoint an expensive official to supply an imaginary want? Again, the infant schoolmistresses engaged by the Board have all passed through at least twelve years' training, and they certainly ought to be excellent hands at their work, for their average salaries reach 132*l.* a year. Yet the Board appoint an Instructor to teach these very costly teachers their duty. When this Instructor enters a school, her proceedings must produce effects something like those of an earthquake. She writes, "I accept no excuse. The heaviest of tables and chairs encumbering the floor must be removed somehow. I require all the children to be out on the floor." This imperial mode of proceeding may have salutary effects on the authority and the imagination of the head teacher, whose domain is thus ruthlessly invaded; but an ordinary thinker finds it hard to see what the benefit of it is. If a lady is worth 132*l.* a year to the ratepayers, why should another receive 300*l.* a year for teaching such an expensive servant her business? If the lady teacher is not worth 132*l.* a year, why was she engaged to burden the public? It is the old dilemma. The same kind of inexplicable folly marks the movements of the Board in other directions. Two sets of Inspectors report on the needlework; nevertheless there are four Special Instructors and Inspectors, whose operations tend to reduce the badgered schoolmistresses to lunacy. The duplicate Inspectors report on the subject of drill, and a special grant is paid if the Government are satisfied with the teaching; but the Board engage a Drill Inspector at a high salary, and this gentleman teaches drill to men who are paid for knowing drill. The crowning absurdity appeared after one of the Board members had made a visit to Sweden. The travelled enthusiast returned, and at once proposed to import a muscular lady who should develop the thews of our female population. A female gymnast was engaged at 200*l.* a year; and all the girls in the London Board Schools are now being taught to jump and contort themselves in a scientific manner. Some of the teachers in the "starveling" schools declared that they were afraid to put their forlorn little damsels through the furthermost gymnastic refinements; the bones might cut through the skin, said these unambitious mistresses. But the starvelings are taught to hop and straddle all the same, and it is to be hoped that the exercise does them good.

It would be wearisome to run over the list of Inspectors and Instructors. Suffice it for the present to say that the Board has created a new official caste. Each of the specialists thinks his own subject supreme in importance; each of them "puts on the screw"; each of them writes his little sarcasms, picks out his favourites, and reproves those who fail to satisfy him. The result is that no sooner is one Inspector out of a school than another comes in; and Sir Edmund Currie, one of the most shrewd and kindly men who ever served the public, declares that "the teachers are worried and inspected out of their senses." With this fine idiomatic extract we leave the public to consider the situation.

PRINCE BISMARCK AND THE PRUSSIAN MINISTRY.

THE rumours that Prince Bismarck intends to withdraw from all connexion with the Prussian Ministry, while still remaining Imperial Chancellor, have gained such weight and consistency that it is difficult any longer to doubt that they are substantially correct. The Prince has returned to Berlin much stronger than he left it, and his speeches in the Reichstag have certainly shown no decline in intellectual vigour; yet in one of them he found it necessary to tell his hearers that the only condition on which his health could remain permanently good was that he should bid adieu to the duties he had hitherto performed, and the way in which the rumours have been treated by the semi-official press clearly shows that he himself is anxious to resign. Indeed, it seems probable that nothing but the Royal sanction is now wanting, and this may be given at any moment.

If it has become absolutely necessary to relieve him of a part of the burden he has hitherto borne with such unwearying courage and resolution, it is clear that it is better that he should withdraw from Prussian than from Imperial politics; and why he desires to do so altogether, instead of retaining his position in the Foreign Office as he did in 1873, when, in consequence of his ill health, Count Roon presided over the Ministry, is fully explained by an article in the Berlin Political News, which gains weight from the way in which it is cited by the North German Gazette. The latter paper, which is believed to enjoy more of the Chancellor's confidence than any other, declines responsibility for the article it is true, but in a dainty, bashful way that reminds one of the coyness of a young lady who very much wishes to be pressed to sing, and stands in strange contrast with its usually bold and defiant tone. If Prince Bismarck remains in the Ministry, it is argued, however strictly he may confine himself to the duties of his office, every important measure introduced by the Administration will be attributed to him. According to the whole system of government in Prussia the head of each office is practically independent, and responsible only to the King; and so, in the period above referred to, the Prince could, in fact, exercise only a small and indirect influence on the internal policy of the country, and yet he has always been considered the real author of the ecclesiastical legislation of the time. Every one must see the force of this reasoning. The great statesman has established such a reputation that, however conscientiously he might restrict himself to his own field, it would be impossible to persuade the outside world that he was not the ruling and directing spirit of every Government in which he held a place, and all who are acquainted with the effects of overwork know that worry and a sense of responsibility are far more injurious than the mere amount of mental labour done. It is therefore clear that, if Prince Bismarck requires rest, he is acting wisely in quitting the Prussian Ministry altogether.

Nor are we by any means sure that he is not furthering the true interests of his country in doing so. He will, of course, leave a great blank in the administration of the kingdom; his loss will be felt in every office that he resigns. Many measures will be delayed, and others will be submitted to Parliament in a less perfect form than if they had been fashioned by his hand. The King, too—and this will probably weigh more heavily than any other consideration with the man who has served him so long and so well—the King, too, may find it difficult to accustom himself to the new voice and manner in which the proposals of his Ministers are placed before him. But it has long been clear that a greater separation must be made between the administration of Prussia and that of the Empire. It was an incalculable advantage to Germany that during the period of transition so many of the most important offices in both could be left in the hands of a single statesman, and that thus all danger of friction between the Central Power and the most important of the States subject to it was evaded. But no nation can expect to be governed by a succession of men of genius, and even among men of true political genius there are few with Prince Bismarck's capacity for hard and continuous work. The mere routine business of the offices he has filled would have been enough to reduce even an intellect of more than ordinary strength to the condition of a mere machine, and to deprive it of all initiative power. The wonder is not that he now desires to be freed from the stress of work, but that he has borne it so long. Yet his splendid prestige and large experience enabled him to entrust much to subordinates that even the most gifted of his successors will be obliged to do himself.

A division of the two administrations has therefore become inevitable; and it will involve many modifications, if not in the form, at least in the practice, of the two Governments. Difficulties which no one can foresee are almost certain to arise; if there were no unquestioned authority at hand to decide them and to establish precedents, they might easily lead to irritation or even to a conflict. We are only quoting Prince Bismarck when we say that nowhere is the esprit de corps stronger than in Germany, where a member of one branch of the Civil Service thinks he is doing a good action if he secures a petty advantage for his own office, even though it may be to the detriment of the whole State. A serious contest between the Imperial and the Prussian Governments is therefore by no means impossible, and a greater danger to the Empire could hardly be conceived. At present, if the rumours we have spoken of prove to be correct, the appeal may be made to the Imperial Chancellor, whose opinion no one in the higher ranks of the Government service will think of disputing, however unofficially it may be given.

From the first establishment of the North German Confederation, all earnest students of contemporary history have been asking themselves how the Constitution whose foundations were then laid would work when the master mind that created it, and the hand in which it proved so powerful an instrument, were no longer there to direct it. Even in his opinion it was not the best of Constitutions, but only the best attainable at the time, and to them it appeared that it was only his genius that covered its defects. Hitherto they have had to comfort themselves with the hope that a nation which had once enjoyed the advantages of unity would not readily allow local prejudice or party rancour to tear it asunder again. To all who desire to see Germany remain what she is, a great, peaceful, and Conservative Power, it would on this account be a source of satisfaction to know that one important part of the changes which time cannot but bring would be carried out under the eyes of the greatest statesman man of modern times. Deeply, therefore, as we should deplore the retirement of Prince Bismarck from the Prussian Ministry, if we looked upon it only as a sign of his failing health, we cannot, under existing circumstances, regard it with regret.

TWO PICTURE EXHIBITIONS.

TWO important exhibitions of pictures were opened to the public on Monday. The Society of British Artists have gathered a large number of works—eight hundred in all—in their rooms in Suffolk Street; and Mr. Wallis has opened the French Gallery in Pall Mall, with a small number of oil paintings, all, or nearly all, by foreign artists. The one hundred and sixty-three works in Pall Mall are each and all worth looking at, though of course all are not equally pleasing. Of the far larger gathering in Suffolk Street, however unwilling we may be to acknowledge it, the strict critic would find it very hard to pick out one hundred and sixty-three pictures worth looking at twice. Of course the artist who considers the strict critic as a roaring lion, or words to that effect, and imagines that he seeks with pleasure for objects for abuse, will accuse us of partiality and all sorts of malignity; but the truth is that at Suffolk Street there are not one hundred and sixty good pictures, not one hundred, not sixty, nor anything like it. Indeed, if we say there are six, we must think a moment lest we exaggerate. At the same time, it cannot be said that the exhibition is deplorably bad, and, as we shall see, one picture rises to a very high level. The average character of the work is, on the whole, much higher than it used to be. There are fewer pictures like the scene (337), on the Terrace at Haddon, where the artist, desiring to depict a lady with a broken heart, has represented her with a broken neck. But there are numerous examples of trivial interest, of bad drawing, of tawdry taste, of inharmonious colour, of flatness, and hardness, and ignorance—in short, it is but too true that if a round half-dozen were taken out, there would be nothing left—nothing, that is, worth looking at twice.

If it is not invidious, let us select half a dozen from the whole exhibition. Among them there is one work difficult to class with anything else here. Mr. Arthur Hill's "The Shell" (491) entirely eclipses the other pictures, as well by its actual brilliancy as by its other remarkable qualities. Mr. Hill has long been known as an artist who strives after eminence in a department of high art but little cultivated in this country. His studies of the nude have generally taken the form of life-size pictures painted from models of dark complexion, only a shade or two lighter than those in which Mr. Long delights. We took occasion last autumn to give qualified praise to "A Dancer" exhibited in this Gallery. To "The Shell" it is possible to give unqualified praise. In fact it seems likely to prove one of the best pictures of the year in any gallery. It is small, not more than ten inches by twenty-four, so differing from former studies by Mr. Hill. Moreover, it represents a nymph of the most dazzlingly fair complexion. Further, and this is in itself a remarkable evidence of progress, the face, which in Mr. Hill's former works was generally commonplace, not to say plain, is here of exceeding loveliness. The nymph lies extended on the sea-shore, and listens to the sound in a shell which she holds close to her ear.

A long space, and almost as long an interval in merit, separates "The Shell" from the picture which seems to come next in order. This is Mr. Bernard Evans's water-colour, No. 634, to which some lines of poetry on April showers are appended. It is a fine, broad, well-gradated, forcible view, with a splendidly-lighted sky. Two other works by the same artist hang close by, but we turn again and again from them to the "April Shower." A very bad third, as racing men say, is perhaps to be found in Mr. R. J. Gordon's "Fair Florist" (246), a very pretty lady arranging flowers in a vase. Another study from the same head is in the first room, "Lauretta" (95), but is inferior, being very rough in execution. Next after the "Fair Florist" we may place "A Haymaker," by Mr. F. Brown, which is an English version of what various French artists have already done. The girl is homely, but not uncomely; and the execution of the painting may be considered superior to the design. Two more pictures will make up our half-dozen. They are one of Mr. A. de Bránski's three landscapes, "Shabod" (273), a fine effect of sunset colour; and one of Mr. Haynes King's four figure subjects, "A Stitch in Time" (50), which, in spite of a vulgar title, is a very sweet, harmonious, and pleasant little work. All this artist's pictures are more or less pleasing; but that on which evidently he has bestowed most thought and labour—a cottage interior, called "News from the Colonies" (326)—though harmonious in colour, is hopelessly stiff.

Not up to the mark, but decidedly showing some promise, we may mention a few of the other pictures in the order of the Catalogue. The portrait of "Miss Craik" (13), by Mr. Gadsby—a child with a variety of dolls—is spotty and rough, yet marked with a certain cleverness, which is more apparent in portraits of two other young ladies of the same family and name (208), where, however, the effect is marred by one child being better finished than the other. A nice little study, but too obviously a study, "Idleness" (44), by Mr. Morton, may be admired for the excellence of the drapery and the general high finish. "A Souvenir of Rembrandt" (107), by Mr. J. W. Wilson, is broad and powerful—the portrait of an elderly man in a big hat—but the title suggests comparisons fatal to the picture. "Azaleas" (122), by Mrs. Holliday, is a very highly finished flower-piece, hardly amounting in importance to a picture, but very decorative. Similarly good are "Apples" (218), by Mr. Livens, which deserve mention for sober colour and a look of reality. There are several other pieces depending on fruit and flowers for their effect, and some of "still life," such as Miss Hayllar's "School Hamper" (572), and Miss B. W. Spiers's—or is it "Mr." B. W. Spiers's?—"Curiosities of Literature," a heap of old books marvellously painted. "Coming Events" (153) is the silly title of Mr. Canty's girl feeding ducks, a picture with some depth and feeling. "Maiden Widowed" (158), by Miss Pulvermacher, is clever and solid, but from a model unpleasantly plain. Mr. Burr's "Politician" (199) is a man in red at a window, with nothing to relieve the redness. The picture, otherwise not uninteresting, is extremely inharmonious. A head in a wig, somewhat unnecessarily called "The Vicar of Bray" (230), by Miss Seymour Lucas, is cleverly painted and shows promise. "Returning Health" (241), by Mr. Maw Egley, defies criticism as a picture, but may be admired for a microscopic finish and smoothness which reminds us of Mieris. Several of the Royal Academy school studies of village inns which competed for the last prizes are here. Mr. Holyoake's "On the Road to the Meet" (445) is perhaps the best of them.

To do full justice to the French Gallery is manifestly impossible, as it would involve a mention of every picture exhibited. It must suffice to indicate the chief features of the exhibition. Most people will be inclined to place first the "Portrait" (136), understood to be that of the artist's wife, by F. A. Kaulbach, the well-known "nephew of his uncle." As this picture and three others (139, 170, and 171) in the Gallery attest, Herr Kaulbach is not so unworthy of his nepotism as the personage respecting whom the words were spoken originally. The lady, with an expression sweet and gracious, yet modest and self-possessed, is represented at full length, and has a magnificent Dalmatian hound by her side, represented much as Vandyke represented dogs on so many occasions. In fact, the whole picture recalls rather Vandyke than Reynolds, but it is perfectly original, and we only institute comparisons for the benefit of those who cannot see the picture. Of a very different character is the wonderful Servian peasant scene (64), by Herr Joanowitz, a pupil, it is reported, of Professor Karl Müller, of Vienna. An old soldier in a picturesque costume fences with a boy, while a younger soldier seated behind guides the boy's hand. Behind are several smiling spectators, including a charming group of women. The painting is at once solid and refined, and the colour so rich as to remind one insensibly of M. Meissonier's "La Rixe." This is believed to be only the second picture of Herr Joanowitz, his first having been purchased by the Servian Government. We have just mentioned M. Meissonier. A picture, very small as usual, by him is on the wall, "A Halberdier" (19), which does not call for further remark, except that it is in every way up to the standard he has always set himself for spirit, colour, and high finish. Two curious little pictures hang on either side of Herr Joanowitz's splendid work. They represent Roman carnival scenes (60, 68). The finish is high; but the most remarkable thing in them is the airiness and crispness of the treatment. Near them are two of the most interesting works in the Gallery, Herr Seiler's "A Wilful Youth" (61) and "Nach dem Diner" (69). A third picture by him is on the sofa, and bears the not very appropriate title of "Wearisome and Wearied" (163). It represents a number of bookworms of the last century enjoying themselves thoroughly in ransacking an old-fashioned library. Every face and every book has its own character; yet, though every detail is made out with the utmost fidelity, there is a breadth and absence of spottiness in the general effect truly marvellous. It would, perhaps, be unpatriotic or unkind to say that no English artist can excel this young painter in a style peculiarly suited, one might have thought, to the English capacity. Mr. Green, perhaps, comes nearest to it. M. de Blaas disappoints us in "The World and the Cloister" (54); a nun, a lady in fashionable clothes, and an odiously over-dressed French child; a mere picture of properties, but of course consummately painted. "Five Bars Rest" (56), by M. Andriotti, should be examined, as should "A Difficult Passage" (50), by Herr Poetzelberger, in which the violinist sits, bow in hand, examining the score. The finish is very high in both pictures. M. Laugée's "Pour la Soupe" (93) is of the usual type of his work, and a good example. The central feature of the wall opposite the door is "La Ruine d'une Famille" (102), by Herr Echtler, an artist who has already received medals and prizes for it on the Continent. The rough French village drinking-shop, the gamblers, the despairing wife and children, the conspirators behind the partition, the accessories of every kind, the cold light breaking in, all produce a powerful, if painful, effect. "The Dole" (109), by M. Aviat, represents two friars and a pretty girl, and is bright and charming. There is fine tone in Troyon's "Man is Born to Trouble" (141); and we must not overlook "African Camp Followers" (45), by the late Eugene Fromentin, an artist whose works are becoming very rare. The landscapes this year are not very numerous, but there are several by Herr Heffner, including one of amazing depth and colour, an after sunset scene (24). The cattle pieces of Herr van Marcke (17, 35) are of his usual high quality, but we prefer the smaller. The English eye does not readily accommodate itself to foreign cattle. Herr Wahlberg's "Near Beaulieu," will be admired for its fine hazy effect. In the upper room, though we have not nearly exhausted the lower one, there are three or four fine pictures. Besides the Kaulbachs already mentioned, there is Herr Leibl's curious "In Church" (166), a piece of highly-finished work in the pre-Raphaelite style; it is difficult to enjoy, yet impossible not to admire, in the old sense of that verb, and seems literally an amazing example of conscientious, if uninteresting, toil. The folds of the very plain young woman's apron must have cost the artist weeks of labour. The whole picture is said to have occupied no less than four years. "An Egyptian Interior" (169) was left very nearly finished by the late C. Bargue, and is a fine specimen of the rare work of a lamented artist.

NEO-CHRISTIANITY.

IT is a curious irony of fate which has made the eldest son of the late Dr. Arnold, one of the most devout and in his way orthodox of Christian enthusiasts, the founder and apostle of "Neo-Christian" schemes, from which every trace of historical Christianity is carefully eliminated. No doubt Dr. Arnold was considered in his day a very "Liberal Churchman," and was looked on with suspicion—not without some reason—alike by High Churchmen and Evangelicals. But he differed toto cœlo from the Broad Churchmen of a later day who, as the Times phrased it, "only escaped by the skin of their teeth," when prosecuted in the ecclesiastical courts, and for whose theology in Essays and Reviews the term Neo-Christianity was first coined, if we remember rightly, by Mr. Frederic Harrison. And he would have had still less sympathy, had he dreamt of its existence, with the new phase of religionism invented by his son, to which the same name is more appropriately applied in a criticism, at once instructive and amusing, by Mr. Traill in the Contemporary Review. Those who knew him best have expressed their conviction that, were he living now, he would be an Evangelical; it may at all events be affirmed with tolerable confidence that he would not become "a Neo-Christian." The term, as we have already intimated, has a more direct application to Literature and Dogma than to the Essays and Reviews. The writers designated by a divine who has since become a bishop, the Septem Contra Christum, did not at all events profess to be propounding a new Gospel, but only to be clearing the old one of certain superstitious or superfluous accretions, which impeded its acceptance by educated scholars of the present age. What residuum would have remained when the "verifying faculty" they appealed to had had its perfect work, may indeed fairly be questioned, but some of them at all events—one especially who has long been known as a zealous and hard-working bishop—thought that a great deal would remain untouched, and the question of their consistency or their orthodoxy need not further detain us here. Mr. Matthew Arnold on the other hand does virtually claim, as his critic points out, to be "the founder of a new religion," and though the elements of his theological system—if the term may be misapplied to a theology which expressly excludes the idea of a personal God—are scattered through all his later works, the most complete and coherent summary of them is to be found in Literature and Dogma, which is evidently "designed to lay the foundations of a new creed," and has accordingly been recently issued in a cheaper form for popular use; much we presume as Strauss "turned to the Gentiles" in the revised edition of his Leben Jesu fur das deutsche Volk bearbeitet. At the same time if the new Evangel be in fact—as it clearly is—"another Gospel," it claims to be "not another," but rather "a legitimate development of popular Christianity"; a claim which Mr. Traill thinks might be sufficiently disposed of by submitting it to the arbitrament of Messrs. Moody and Sankey or Mr. Spurgeon. To be sure there are versions of Gospel teaching not unacceptable to very orthodox Christians, which we are afraid would not commend themselves to "the Rev. Esau Hittall," but in the present instance the test would hardly be an unfair one. However our chief concern is to examine not so much the pretensions of Neo-Christianity to be regarded as a form of Christian doctrine as its claim to be accounted, in any intelligible sense of the word, a religion at all. There is no need to approach the question from a dogmatic standpoint, and Mr. Traill, whatever may be his own religious opinions, has in fact approached it from a purely sceptical or external point of view. There is as little of "sectarian" bias in his criticism, as in the author he criticizes, and he appears indeed to have first consulted him in the hope of finding matter for agreement rather than for difference. He thinks "that Mr. Arnold's attempt to establish a modus vivendi between Christianity and modern thought must command the sympathy of every one who shares the very general inability"—which he apparently shares himself—"to see how Western communities are to live 'either with or without' it." The assumed difficulty may not seem to every one so insoluble, but at all events those who strongly feel it cannot be charged with an unfriendly animus towards a writer who has set himself with singular, if not very successful, ingenuity to solve it.

In the first place then it is important to ascertain what are the fundamental doctrines of this new religion, and in what respects it differs from the old one. Mr. Arnold, to do him justice, is never an obscure writer, and he leaves his readers in no doubt on these points. Neo-Christianity "contains two, and only two, essential and eternal truths—namely, its assertion of the claims of righteousness as the only way of peace for man, and its indication of Christ as the model of righteousness appointed for man's imitation." We should ourselves have inclined to say that the second doctrine was "a pious opinion" adopted by Mr. Arnold himself rather than an "essential" article of the new creed, and an opinion likely very soon to drop out of it, supposing per impossibile it ever attained the dimensions of a popular religion. However we will take Mr. Traill's statement as it stands, and give him the benefit of the doubt. As to what are the exploded articles of the old historical creed there is no room for any difference of opinion. They are "such as the belief in miracles, in prophecy, in a materialistic (?) future state, in the Trinity, and even in the personality of the Supreme Being." The word "materialistic" might have been left out, for all future life disappears from the system with a Personal God; and we do not know why Mr. Traill omits the Incarnation from the list of leading doctrines to be got rid of. It is expressly dismissed—in a phrase of polished but cynical irreverence we do not care to quote here—in Literature and Dogma, as a pretty but impossible Aberglaube, absolutely fatal to the reception of any creed of which it forms an integral portion. The "verifying faculty" by which these superstitious adjuncts are securely discriminated from the essential verities of the Christianity of the future is "culture," which "enables the reader to feel what the Bible writers are about, to read between the lines, to discern where he ought to press with his whole weight, and where he ought to press lightly." And the Bible thus verified and interpreted will become the one and sole adequate guide and inspirer of human life, the one rule of "conduct" whereby alone man may attain to his highest happiness. Now it is surely only natural to inquire in the first place whether those free-thinking mechanics, for whose special behoof Mr. Arnold has prepared his revised version of the Scriptures, will be likely to accept this remarkable scheme of hermeneutics. They have already ex hypothesi rejected the Bible as a record of divine revelation in the sense—apart from minor points in dispute among Christians—generally placed upon it by orthodox believers. Will they be ready to receive it back at Mr. Arnold's hands, as a volume not "of dogmatic metaphysics"—i.e. as not containing revealed doctrines—but of "poetry and eloquence thrown out at an object of consciousness not fully grasped, which inspired emotion"? Will they e.g. be ready to admit that when St. Paul speaks of "God manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory," he did not mean to make any dogmatic or "scientific" statement about the Incarnation or the Ascension, but merely to "throw out" language at "objects of consciousness not fully grasped"; or that the Scripture writers generally, "when they say most distinctly 'This is so,' merely mean, 'This is a matter about which we feel very strongly, and we therefore relieve our minds by formulating precise statements about it which, however, you are not to take literally'"? It would be easy to fill, not this article but the whole number of the Saturday Review, with extracts from both the Old Testament and the New exceedingly hard to reconcile by any method of "free handling" with such an hypothesis. But the question is really a vital one to Mr. Arnold's scheme, because—unlike Strauss, who said plainly, "We have a religion, but we are not Christians"—he is never tired of reminding us that he aims not simply at "the construction of a religion," but of a religion "founded and largely relying upon the same sacred writings as the older form, and insisting to the full as much upon their supreme spiritual efficacy and eternal value." It is even a natural or necessary inference from many things he has said that he would consider his new religion more than compatible with the continued use of the Anglican Prayer-book. This then is one serious difficulty about the Neo-Christian creed.

But this objection, serious as it is, does not go to the root of the matter. Before asking whether the proposed religion of the future has any claim to be regarded as a Christian or Scriptural one, there is a previous and still more fundamental question to be settled. Is it a religion at all? A religion, as Mr. Arnold himself fully admits, means more than a mere system of morality, and is indeed, as he implies, an essential condition for securing the observance of the moral law. It is a religion therefore, not simply a moral code, which he has undertaken to provide; and he holds the great distinction between the two to consist in its being not a mere moral code, but "morality touched with emotion." Now of course all religious morality is "touched with emotion," but Mr. Arnold is too good a logician to identify this statement—by what logic manuals call "the simple conversion of A"—with the very hazardous proposition that all morality touched with emotion is religious, which however his argument requires. It surely makes some difference what the "emotion" is. "No morality could be more profoundly touched with emotion than that of a child who strives to be 'good,' in order to earn the gold watch or the pony-ride which has been promised as the reward of its infantile virtue." We need not reopen the question as to the claim of this Neo-Christian scheme to be "a return to the faith once delivered to the Saints," nor will we stay to inquire whether the "emotion" it relies upon has anything in common with that "which touched the morality of the Fathers and the Saints, of St. Jerome and St. Augustine, of St. Francis and St. Teresa." That question indeed answers itself, for their "emotion" was avowedly "the love of God," which is excluded by the force of terms in a religion which repudiates a personal God altogether. It is hardly possible to love or to worship "the eternal something, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness." And moreover one main purpose of introducing the new religion is to satisfy the minds of those who find the existence of a personal God "unverifiable" or untrue. Mr. Arnold is supposed by his critic—and the passage is in strict though not verbal, accordance with his teaching—to address them thus:—

"I see," he says to them, "that your great difficulty relates to the very existence of a personal God. You do not deny the existence of such a Being, but you hold that it is not verifiable or verified; and I agree with you. It is so; and at present it cannot be verified; and that which cannot be verified is a form no sure and satisfying basis for a religion. To re-settle your religion on such a basis, you require some verifiable conception; and I will tell you where to find one. You will find it in our common human consciousness of an 'Eternal Power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness.' There you have your substitute—your verifiable substitute for the supposed personal God, who enjoins certain conduct upon you. And since your personal God rewards right conduct as well as enjoins it, and I have, therefore, also to meet this requirement of a religious faith, I refer you to the equally verifiable truth, that 'to righteousness belongs happiness.' For the name of God, then, wherever it occurs in your creed, substitute 'The Power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness,' and for 'heaven,' substitute 'The happiness which belongs to righteousness,' and there is your religion. What more can you want?"

Certainly the perplexed inquirer might well reply, "What less could I have?" He might fairly enough ask whether the two new dogmas are any more "verifiable" than those they are designed to replace. And he might further ask wherein consists the supreme importance of this "righteousness," and in what sense it is true to say that "happiness belongs" to it? Is the great doctrine, the articulus stantis vel cadentis Ecclesiæ Neo-Christianæ, to be interpreted in an egotistic or an "altruistic" sense? Mr. Arnold seems to oscillate between the two replies, but it may be questioned if either of them is "verifiable." He speaks sometimes as though the promised happiness consisted in "the consciousness that we are co-operating with and not resisting the great external forces which are directing the destinies of mankind," but that is only another version of the Gospel of Humanity so assiduously preached by Mr. Frederic Harrison and the priesthood of the Comtist Church generally, who however disclaim all profession of Christianity, old or new. We have often explained our reasons for thinking their enterprise a hopeless, though a perfectly honest one, and need not repeat them here. But if Mr. Arnold elects the other alternative, and interprets the happiness which belongs to righteousness to mean individual happiness—that godliness has the promise of this life, whatever becomes of the next—the verification, to say the least, is not made easier. We may well ask, with his critic, whether "any one can seriously believe that our sceptical workingman, finding a roll of 100*l.* notes after being six months out of work, with a wife and eight children dependent on him, half his furniture pawned, and a distress hanging over the remainder," will be restrained from theft by the new "emotion" suggested to him in place of his discarded belief in "popular Christianity"? He might not improbably object that "the only power not himself of which he has any experience he names 'misfortune,' that it has the air of being 'eternal,' and that what it seems to 'make for' is starvation." And if his Neo-Christian teacher still insists that "to righteousness belongs happiness," and that, if he will only try, he "will find it is so," he is but too likely to reply, "I have tried, and I find it is not so. I have been righteous for thirty years, and I never had a stroke of luck in my life until to-day." One cannot but fear that the "sweet reasonableness" of pocketing the roll of altruistic banknotes would triumph over the austerer "emotion" and "eternal power," which "make," but make in vain, "for" the righteous happiness of restoring it to its owner. The plain fact is that, even if we consent for argument's sake to swallow wholesale the difficulties, philosophical and theological, of Mr. Arnold's fundamental postulates—and they are a pretty good mouthful—a practical difficulty remains behind, which is likely to prove still more fatal to the success of his Neo-Christian scheme. As Mr. Traill puts the case, "it is essentially a religion for the cultivated and comfortable, . . an article de luxe suitable only for consumption by them and their like." In other words, if we may venture to throw the conclusion into a somewhat Hibernian formula, it is a religion admirably adapted for those, and those alone, who are so situated as to find that they do not want one.

THE PRIVATE SECRETARY—MR. BRANDRAM'S RECITAL.

AT the Prince's Theatre the ill-fated Breaking a Butterfly has been succeeded by an adaptation, by Mr. C. H. Hawtrey, of Von Moser's Der Bibliothekar, called The Private Secretary, a farcical comedy of the most pronounced type. In plays of this kind, ingenious situations and surprises that cunningly lie in ambush are the chief and most necessary attractions, construction being quite a secondary matter; the all-important aim is to present a series of humorous and unsuspected incidents, which inevitably lead to complications, and which should possess a certain coherent relationship. Where the initial motif is ill-devised and weak, the whole tissue of imbroglio to which it gives birth becomes weakened and strained, and the result is a gradually accelerating degeneracy to the fall of the curtain. It cannot be said that the ludicrous scenes of the last three acts of The Private Secretary are naturally evolved from what precedes them; they have no stable base for development in the first act. They are highly diverting and skilfully contrived; but they are deficient in that air of consistency which in farce is the substitute for uncompromising adherence to nature and probability. Many of the drollest situations are clearly foreseen; they excite laughter, not because they surprise by their unexpected incongruity, but because they are so admirably realized by the actors. Deprived of the stimulus of such excellent impersonations as Mr. Beerbohm-Tree's Rev. Robert Spalding, Mr. Carton's Douglas Cattermole, and the Mr. Cattermole of Mr. W. J. Hill, the vital element of the piece would be found to be even weaker than it is now felt to be.

The original source of the confusion that turns a country house into a species of Bedlam for the enactment of the wildest extravagances lies in the difficulties of Harry Marsland, who, to escape their pressure, persuades his friend Douglas Cattermole to vacate his chambers in town and assume the character of the Rev. Robert Spalding at the seat of his uncle Marsland. In the meanwhile the real Simon Pure, who has accepted the post of private secretary to Mr. Marsland, is left by the two friends in possession of the chambers, in ignorance of the deception, so that Douglas Cattermole has to sustain the dual part of clergyman and private secretary. At the outset we learn that Douglas has a rich uncle who has just returned from India, and who will have nothing to do with him until, as he expresses it, he has "sown his wild oats," which operation Douglas assures his friend Harry he has no liking for. He does not object to taking the parson's place on his friend's suggestion that it might be a step towards satisfying his uncle's prejudice and might at the same time relieve his embarrassment. When, however, he is recognized in the last scene, his uncle is easily convinced as to his performances, though there is nothing but the escapade mentioned to justify his persuasion. This inconsistency, however, is slight in comparison with other instances. Nothing but perverse blindness and conscious ignoring on the part of all concerned of the obvious matter-of-fact state of affairs prevents the disclosure of the imposition. Every one plays the part of Mr. Wilful Won't-See, and Douglas Cattermole has an easy time of it. It is not so with the veritable secretary, the Rev. Robert Spalding, who suffers continual martyrdom from the moment when he is left in charge of young Cattermole's chambers to his appearance in the country. He suffers unspeakable indignity at the hands of old Cattermole, who takes him to be his nephew, and is disgusted by his blue ribbon, huge goloshes, pale famished face, and general asceticism. He has writs served on him, and is assaulted by one of Douglas Cattermole's creditors, and when the curtain falls on the first act Mr. Gibson, the creditor, is seen ejecting water from a syphon bottle on the unhappy parson, who, utterly crushed and limp from the unequal fight, has sunk under his open umbrella. The admirable get-up of Mr. Beerbohm-Tree, and the thorough harmony of his acting, result in what is not only a happy conception, but one that is realized with remarkable thoroughness. Mr. W. J. Hill is, in his own peculiar style, excessively droll, and in the interview with his supposed nephew—the most comic scene in the play—he was perfectly irresistible in the incongruous association of his irate tones and radiant bonhomie, the contrast of his sudden passion and the astonishment of the bewildered parson. From this point there is much stout romping round tables and chairs, scenes of intricacy when the different characters meet in many rooms, and make strange acquaintance; the parson is pushed under a table while Harry Marsland and young Cattermole make love to the young ladies of the house; he is then confined to a chest, from which he issues, exhausted by his sufferings, only to frighten the household, to be taken for a burglar, and to suffer in divers ways incredible affronts.

Mr. G. W. Anson endows the part of a Bond Street tailor with a little too much vigour, though with humorous distinction; the Harry Marsland of Mr. Reeves Smith, while naturally brisk and pleasant, is marred by occasional faulty articulation, owing to over-rapidity of speech. Mr. Carton's Douglas Cattermole is thoroughly well studied, and is interpreted with all the nature and consistency possible. There is not indeed in any of these parts much opportunity of displaying the actor's art; Mr. A. Beaumont, who impersonates an M. F. H., is not seen at his best, and the young ladies, who are excellently represented by Miss Lucy Buckstone and Miss Tilbury, are not very prominent. Mrs. Stephens plays with considerable humour the spiritualist, Miss Ashford, and Mrs. Leigh Murray represents the housekeeper, Mrs. Stead. The Private Secretary is preceded by a version of Ferrier's Chez l'Avocat, entitled "6*s.* 8*d.*," written by Mr. Beerbohm-Tree. The dialogue is very bright and animated, and is rendered with abundant spirit by the adapter and Mrs. Beerbohm-Tree.

The death, last Tuesday, of Miss Marie Litton (Mrs. W. Wybrow-Robertson) deprives the stage of an actress of individual power and peculiar charm, and whose success in the higher departments of dramatic art was as well demonstrated as her continual progression in excellence. At the Royal Aquarium Miss Litton's revivals of old comedies must be in every one's recollection, so completely were the spirit and flavour of the old drama transferred. In As You Like It the Rosalind of Miss Litton will long be remembered as peculiarly distinct, with a quality of fascination that admirably represented the Shakspearian character, and which must be considered among the most happy assumptions of this part that the modern stage has known. In the management of theatres Miss Litton's experience began at the Court in 1871, when her tenure was rendered memorable by the production of The Happy Land and Brighton; subsequently she appeared at the Haymarket in The Wicked World, and at the St. James's, the Princess's, and other houses in many and diverse parts, one of her last appearances being in Moths at the Olympic in 1882. Highly gifted by nature, with a rich and cultivated voice, and mobile, expressive features Miss Litton possessed the organization of an artist, combined with the developed fruits of constant and conscientious study. The winning grace, the admirable humour, and urbane style of her Rosalind, its delicate insight and charming idyllism, are well-remembered qualities of an excellent impersonation.

In the notice of Nita's First last week the name of Mr. Perceval Clark was inadvertently printed Mr. Perceval Slark.

Mr. Brandram recited at Willis's Rooms on Tuesday, for the first time, The Cricket on the Hearth, this being his final appearance in London previous to his projected tour in America in the autumn. His rendering of the humour and pathos of Dickens's familiar story made this as excellent as any of the preceding recitals. The unfaltering fluency with which the many complex descriptive passages and animated dialogue were given, while affording a remarkable instance of Mr. Brandram's power of memory, was even less striking than his admirable discrimination and the rich and varied intonation of his voice. The characters were dramatized with much power; the carrier and his wife, Caleb Plummer and his blind daughter, in particular, were presented with happy and spontaneous art. Scarcely less notable was the realization of the melodramatic situations, where the carrier discovers Dot's apparent infidelity, and where he takes his gun and stalks to the door with the intention of killing his guest. In the opening scene the reciter showed with wonderful power how the voice may endow with fresh vitality language in itself eloquent with life, and become the soul of speech. The dead pieces of the carrier's interior, the fireside, the quaint old clock, and, indeed, every little touch in the elaborate description, were vivified by Mr. Brandram as with individual presence, and with but slight aid from gesture; the voice of the speaker being artistically regarded as the legitimate vehicle of expression, and gesticulation merely as an auxiliary. The Cricket on the Hearth, as rendered on this occasion, is an important addition to Mr. Brandram's repertory of readings.

MESMERISM AND PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

THE different methods of science and superstition, or of common-sense and mysticism, in making a so-called "research" have been well illustrated lately by two lectures given at the Royal and London Institutions respectively by prominent Cambridge teachers. It would, indeed, have been well if the audience which listened to the Professor of Moral Philosophy discoursing naively at the London Institution on the results of Psychical Research, had given itself a few weeks afterwards the wholesome corrective of hearing and digesting the remarks of Mr. Langley on "The Physiological Aspects of Mesmerism." It was insisted on not long ago in these columns that the modern apostle of the occult, or, as he is more widely known, the Spiritualist or Psychic, clings always to mesmerism as the stronghold of his belief when he feels all other points of defence to be weak and yielding. For among the many phenomena which he dubs mesmeric, without any mark of relationship between them except that impressed upon them by his own mind, there do exist some which are facts indeed and are not to be referred, with the most distinctive events of popular mesmerism, to wilful imposture and prearranged trickery. The Spiritualist is always eager to make friends with the Mammon of Materialism. It has been already amply shown that the substratum of fact in mesmerism is paralleled by well-known spontaneous occurrences in certain human subjects, quite apart from any method of making "passes" or so-called "electro-biology." Somnambulism, trance, catalepsy, and other abnormal states take place as examples of nervous disease, and what scientific men have denominated hypnotism covers everything called "mesmeric" which presents any case whatever for serious study. The somewhat morbid subjects of these hypnotic states, be their condition natural or induced, may of course be expected to fall into the hands of the charlatan and the mystery-monger more readily than into those of the physiologist or the doctor, and in these circumstances they furnish the only really plausible excuse for any importance that may be attached to the operations of the Psychical Researchers of the present day.

We should scarcely have reverted to this subject were it not for the fact that Professor Sidgwick's high reputation as a writer on moral philosophy lends a factitious importance to his utterances on subjects with which he is apparently far less competent to deal. The weight of personal names is great with the promoters and devotees of the psychical cultus, as is evidenced by the oft-repeated quotations we hear of certain well-known "authorities," and the constantly republished lists in the Spiritualistic organs of "Eminent persons who have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic." Professor Sidgwick, in the strange statements and inferences contained in his lecture, has shown how easy it is when once the firm ground of fact is left behind to mount the most giddy heights of fancy with an apparently firm step; and it is not too much to say that he stands convicted of ignoring the very fundamental requirements of scientific research. It is enough for our present purpose to point these remarks by criticizing only his wondrous and really arrogant contention that the Psychical Research Society has definitely ascertained certain facts hitherto unrecognized or ignored by "science" through all time, and the monstrous conclusion that he calmly draws from these so-called facts, that there can be special and definite communications between mind and mind apart from all intervention of the senses. The Psychical Society, he says, has established, by a line of research strictly experimental, that such communication or "thought-transference" can take place both when the persons experimented on are in a normal condition and in the abnormal state called mesmeric or hypnotic. To the unprejudiced observer, aware of the undoubted trickery existing in connexion with mesmerism, these two branches of inquiry seem much the same; but, by ignoring this aspect of the question for the moment, and thus avoiding any possible confusion in the mind of those ignorant of mesmerism, we may meet Mr. Sidgwick on his own ground, and consider only the case of what he denominates thought-transference in the normal state, or, as it is often called, "thought-reading without bodily contact," which is indeed, as he says, the special work of the Society. It is at once obvious that, considering all that we know of the mind is its expression by means of the senses, it is binding on any one who contends that the senses can be dispensed with in mental communication to show without shadow of doubt that every possible avenue of sensory intervention is completely blocked. Demonstration of this must be made without leaving any gaps to be filled up by appeal to the good faith of an individual; and, if such demonstration were forthcoming, no body of scientific men would refuse to entertain or investigate the questions they now most justifiably ignore. All would allow that the evidence of the impossibility of fraudulent collusion between the Professor's subjects—one of whom is alleged to have drawn, without any sensory communication, a donkey's head whose chosen counterpart was among the expectant audience—must be quite irrefragable before any person of ordinary common-sense could infer that there was anything else in the performance than an obvious trick by means of prearranged signals. And, until it can be shown that such an event has taken place in conditions where the mysterious draughtsman can neither see, hear, nor feel by any possibility, so long must the scientific man be content and willing to be called muddle-headed by Professor Sidgwick for maintaining that an alleged fact, which is in apparent contradiction to the whole sum of human knowledge, and is, moreover, perfectly explicable by the well-known and confessedly effective agency of fraud, is not worthy of any serious consideration. It is Professor Sidgwick's very imperfect appreciation of the difference between a fact and an inference, and his ambiguous use of the former word, that gives the only colour to his startlingly absurd parallel between nature and a bag of white and black balls, and is the only excuse for his inability to understand those who maintain a difference between what contradicts and what merely adds to experience. The Professor innocently argued that, if he pulled 999 white balls out of a bag, there would be no contradiction to this experience if the thousandth ball was black; implying by his comparison of the white balls with the ordinary experience of nature, and the black ball with the result of Psychical Research, that a scientific man would necessarily have concluded that all the balls in the bag were white. Such a conclusion would, of course, have been come to by no scientific man; and in this argument, which if perfectly ingenuous is certainly pointless, Mr. Sidgwick fails entirely to see that the contention of the scientific man with regard to the "psychical" facts is that they are not facts, that the black ball is indeed white, and appears black to the Psychical Researcher only because of the element of fraud in its composition, which baffles his biassed and trustful methods of inquiry. To this attitude of common-sense or science on the matter, and the challenge to reproduce the alleged facts under conditions exclusive of possible fraud, the Spiritualist has nothing to reply but the plaintive admission that "attempts to repeat these facts may very easily fail, the phenomenon being of a delicate nature, and the capacity for exhibiting them rare, transient, fitful, and easily disturbed." Is it not quite clear, then, that, until conditions exclusive of all acknowledged agencies be established, these "phenomena" must not be regarded as facts at all?

No fact, of course, can be in contradiction to other facts; but, when an alleged fact upsets conclusions drawn by the inductive method from an unlimited array of established facts, it is more than likely that it exists only in the mind of a prejudiced or careless observer, and is really a faulty inference from unsound data.

Mere allegations, destitute of proof, cannot be entertained by scientific inquirers. It is manifestly disingenuous to urge, as some Psychics do, that their "facts" are disallowed by science because they are distasteful and out of accord with its conclusions. The Royal Society, for instance, would refuse, and often has refused, to entertain a disquisition consisting of inferences resting on mere allegations, even though the conclusions it contained were in no way startling or even apparently out of harmony with established knowledge; and, on the other hand, were the required demonstration forthcoming, no paper would be rejected on account of its conclusions alone. In the early days of the Royal Society Sir Kenelm Digby essayed to demonstrate the virtues of certain so-called "sympathetic" remedies before that body, and to show that a spider could not escape when placed within a circle formed by the powdered horn of a rhinoceros. But the imprisoned spider escaped at once, the conditions not being favourable for the magical effects of the horn; and the Royal Society knew Sir Kenelm no more. If the Psychical Researchers could prevail upon the agencies they invoke to so arrange their conditions as to permit an expert, be he anatomist or conjurer, to block up all the avenues to the senses of the subject to be experimented on as a thought-reader, then doubtless there would be no lack of observers to witness the performance. But the existence of "phenomena" must be at first demonstrated by other means, before "delicacy," "evanescence," and gratuitous necessity for special conditions can even plausibly be urged in support of their existence.

It would, indeed, seem obvious that this line of criticism of the methods of the Psychics is unanswerable, and that, continuing as they do to confound fact and fiction, and to ignore the demonstrated conclusions of the past on the flimsy evidence of simple statements, their work should be considered vain and their doctrines worthy of no regard. It is only the doubtless well-meaning but, we must reluctantly say, ignorant advocacy of these ill-attested marvels by men of otherwise undisputed eminence that prevents the modern ghost-seers, and clairvoyants, and believers in haunted houses from dying a natural death, and makes it necessary that their otherwise inevitable fate of quietly stewing in their own juice should from time to time be disturbed. And, after all, these Psychics are not the only people who show this wonderful incapacity of appreciating the real nature of a fact. In a less grotesque form this fallacy meets us at every turn; and a salient example is at once furnished by some of the arguments used in the late famous altercation in the law courts regarding the existence of the sculptor's ghost. Learned judges undertook to lay down the important difference between a fact and an inference, and the "fact" of Brown, Jones, and Robinson having seen the sculptor at work on his statues was contrasted with the "inference" drawn by Royal Academicians, that certain work was not done by the sculptor in question. Now, quite independently of the practical issue of the matter, it is obvious that this statement of the case was logically misdirecting, whether the verdict be considered correct or not, and would have been equally so had the evidence of the experts been given in the plaintiff's favour. What was virtually put before the jury was, on the one hand, the inference that the artistic merit of the statues was due to Mr. Belt, because certain persons had seen him scraping a clay model; and, on the other, the inference of experts, from a variety of evidence, that certain artistic results were not attained by the work of Mr. Belt. The question here really turned on the comparative value of expert and non-expert inferences on a given subject; for it was not denied that at some stage or other the clay had been touched by the hand of the plaintiff. But the jury were in effect told that the evidence of witnesses to this latter performance was almost if not quite equivalent to the demonstration of the fact that the finished statue was the work of Mr. Belt alone.

It is the jealous and rigid investigation of facts which forms the most important characteristic of modern as opposed to ancient modes of thought; and when we remember that some of the greatest intellects of past ages, including the most learned judges, were imbued with the then universally prevailing belief in the possibility of witchcraft and sorcery, we may look more leniently on some of our prominent modern Psychics than we might otherwise be inclined to do. From this point of view, and regarding them as strangely preserved descendants from other times, we are not logically bound, as otherwise we should be, to take up a challenge thrown down by Professor Sidgwick in a lecture he gave at the inauguration of the now two-year-old Psychical Society; and "accuse the investigators of lying or cheating, or of a blindness and forgetfulness incompatible with any intellectual condition except absolute idiocy." We need call these gentlemen neither fools nor knaves; but, though they contend that in two years they have overthrown both physics and physiology by proving that tables can move themselves, and that men can hear and see without ears or eyes, we can regard them historically as interesting survivals from other mental systems. And though they move amongst us now, and talk in scientific dialect, they appear like intellectual mummies galvanized into a kind of pseudo-vitality by coming into chance contact with the electric currents of modern thought. Professor Sidgwick has himself amusingly said that "scientific credulity has been so long in growing, and has so many and so strong roots, that we shall only kill it, if we are able to kill it at all, as regards any of these questions, by burying it alive under a heap of facts. We must keep pegging away, and not wrangle too much with incredulous outsiders about the conclusiveness of any one experiment, but trust to the mass of evidence for conviction." Apart from Mr. Sidgwick's very obvious and self-condemning neglect here of the fact that the strength of a chain depends on its weakest link, as is shown by his preference of quantity to quality of evidence, and the implied admission of the flimsiness of his own arguments, can we not protest that the belief in witchcraft, which has had its day and ceased to be, was supported by a mass of evidence far greater than any that the modern Psychical Researcher can ever hope in this day to collect? Might not, as Sir Walter Scott says, in his Letters on Demonology, the believer in witchcraft say to the sceptic of those older days, "Will you dispute the existence of a crime against which our own statute-book and the code of all civilized countries have attested by laws upon which hundreds and thousands have been convicted, many or even most of whom have by their judicial confessions acknowledged their guilt and the justice of their punishment? It is a strange scepticism, they might add, which rejects the evidence of Scripture, of human legislation, and of the accused persons themselves." Do we not hear in these words, mutatis mutandis, the identical arguments of the Psychics of our own day?

It is refreshing to turn from the unconscious sophistries of men whose powers in other directions should encourage us to look for utterances more worthy of them, to the clear and instructive exposition of what is known as mesmerism, by Mr. Langley, in his lecture above referred to. He emphasized in an interesting manner the scientific contention that the basis of fact which has been so unfortunately mixed up with clairvoyance and other trickery can be experimentally illustrated and explained by our present knowledge of nerve-action. Parallel instances occur and can be induced in the lower animals; and the lecturer showed the results of hypnotism to his audience by experiments on a frog and an alligator. Although no great advance in the study of hypnotic phenomena has been made since the writings of Dr. Braid on this subject appeared in 1841, yet it was shown by Mr. Langley that the more profound study of the action of the nervous system, and especially of what is called pre-eminently reflex action, or action without consciousness, has thrown a considerable light on the subject, and has enabled physiologists to state its explanation in more intelligible and accurate terms than before. The conclusion is perfectly clear from all that is known on the subject of spontaneous and artificial somnambulism, or hypnotism, that there is no connecting bridge whatever between these phenomena and what is popularly known as the "clairvoyant" stage of so-called mesmerism. It is convenient, of course, for the believers in the occult to maintain such a connexion, and to regard the latter as a mere extension or development of the former, so as to bolster up their gratuitous theory of some special power in the person who is called the mesmerizer. But the bright light of accurate investigation shows this favourite alliance to be a myth; and the last shred of the covering garment of truth is torn from the unsightly figure of modern psychical research.

CONCERTS.

THE ballad concert at St. James's Hall on Wednesday was of that miscellaneous character which, even in these advanced days, is sometimes regarded as essential to popularity. The general public undoubtedly love ballads, particularly those that are contemporary, and that set forth with sickly and unheroic sentiment the ways of the bold British sailor, which must invariably prove to be strange to that popular hero as well as to the admirers of Dibdin. The reception given on this occasion to dull and commonplace songs, indifferently sung, clearly reveals the existence of a large class of people whose taste has been wholly uninfluenced by such concerts as the Monday Popular. An extremely friendly audience showed itself desirous of re-hearing every song, good, bad, or indifferent, and recalled all the executants with amiable impartiality and most uncritical unanimity. This would be but a venial matter if the general execution had presented a dead surface of mediocrity; but it was an ill recognition of the beautiful voice and artistic style of Mme. Antoinette Sterling, the admirable quality of Mr. Barrington Foote's singing, and that of one or two others, to confound them with much that was meretricious in one flood of noisy applause. The inconsistency of such a proceeding—not to speak of its humorous incongruity in such a concert-room—was only worthy of a susceptible people to whom for the first time the missionaries of music were addressing themselves, and of whom discernment was not to be expected. The musical foreigner, who is always with us, must have imagined himself in some ultima Thule of the provinces, instead of in a hall consecrated to music and enriched with innumerable and splendid associations. It is to be hoped he will charitably correct this natural view, and consider the phenomenon as a fresh eccentric phase of our inscrutable social existence.

The programme was sufficiently diversified to illustrate very forcibly the extreme range of modern songs. The higher quality of composition was represented by Blumenthal's "Far away, where angels dwell," expressively, but not faultlessly, sung by Mr. Iver McKay; Cowen's "I hear thee speak of a better land," and Odoardo Barri's "Patchwork," both rendered with touching pathos and admirable art by Mme. Sterling. "The Brave Light," given with dramatic power by Mr. Barrington Foote, occupied an intermediate position; and the same singer's fine and resonant voice was heard to great advantage in Molloy's "The Way of the World." Mme. Adelina Hirlemann sang "Voi che sapete," and was very successful in two other songs. In Wekerlin's pretty and characteristic song, "The Wood," Miss Alice Fripp sang in a style very superior to her interpretation of Gounod's "Ave Maria," which was lacking in expression and delicacy. Masini's pleasing and striking duet, "I Mulattieri," was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Trehernie and Mr. Ernest Cecil. In some violin solos by Papini and De Beriot, Miss Amy Hickling was a little uneven, her tone thin, and her execution characterized by an indecision which may be the result of nervousness, but had more the appearance of the inexperience of a young artist. The most successful of Mme. Zimeri's performances was her rendering of Dessauer's bolero, "Onvrez, ouvrez," which was executed with facile precision and considerable grace of expression. Signor Carlo Ducci's pianoforte-playing and Mr. Arthur Lawrence's recitals must be considered as not the least strange anomalies in the evening's entertainment. The chief accompanyists were Mr. Lindsay Sloper and Mme. Mina Gould.

On Saturday last at the Crystal Palace, Beethoven's Choral No. 9 was performed, and naturally the whole of the programme was subordinated to this great work. An excellent quartette had been secured—Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Marion Mackenzie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Frederick King. Take it for all in all, the performance was thoroughly good. The Crystal Palace choir, to which was allotted the choral part of the symphony, has greatly improved since we last had an opportunity of hearing it. Their attack is much better, and the general quality of tone of the various parts, and the intonation of the whole choir, are extremely good. It is evident that, with a few more public performances, and more frequent opportunities of singing together, this choir might well take rank among the first in this country. To the performance of the band we have nothing but praise to give, and Mr. Manns conducted the work throughout in thorough sympathy with the great composer. The programme began with the Overture to the Nozze di Figaro, of Mozart, and from the first moment it became evident that in the last week the band had made enormous progress where progress seemed almost impossible. Few orchestral works give such a delicate test of perfect attack, power, delicacy, and subordination of a band to its conductor; but in no one of these points could the most fastidious critic find anything to complain of. Between the Overture and the Choral Symphony were interposed a series of songs, the first of which, an aria from Mozart's Idomeneo, was sung by Miss Annie Marriott, who was not heard to such advantage as a solo singer as she was later on in the concerted music. Two songs of Rubinstein's—"A Morning Song" and "Reveries"—were sung by Mr Harper Kearton. The songs themselves, though by no means unpleasing, were of a character to make one understand how it was really Rubinstein who composed Il Demonio. Mr. Harper Kearton has a pleasing voice, unfortunately so produced as to give it that throaty tone too common amongst modern tenors; but he is a vocalist of no mean ability, and a sympathetic artist. A pretty but somewhat strained and sentimental song, "Farewell," by F. E. Bache, was sung excellently by Miss Marion Mackenzie. After the Symphony, and in very pleasing contrast with it, from the restful tone of its earlier parts, came the prelude to Lohengrin, most admirably played by the band, which was followed by the "Evening Star" song from Wagner's Tannhäuser, sung by Mr. Frederick King, who thoroughly justified his position as one of our first young English vocalists. Then came the overture to the Tannhäuser of Wagner, and in spite of the fatigue which must have been produced by having gone through so heavy a work as the Choral Symphony, Mr. Manns and his band succeeded in giving one of the finest performances of this work that has ever been heard in this country, as full of fire and freshness as if conductor and band had had complete rest for hours before attacking this trying work. The performance of this work gives us an opportunity of referring to the marvellous excellence both in quality of tone and in executive ability of the wood-wind band of this orchestra, which was heard to very great advantage in the earlier part of the Overture; indeed the performance of this work was so remarkable, that it dulls all the praise we feel we ought to have bestowed on the other orchestral numbers of the programme, which, though all played in most excellent style, were as nothing compared with the remarkable ability of both conductor and orchestra shown in this Overture. Before the concert began the Dead March in Saul was performed as a mark of respect to the memory of the Duke of Albany.

THE RACING SEASON.

THE prospects of the racing season which has lately opened have been anything but bright. If one name was more honoured on the Turf than any other, it was that of Lord Falmouth, and few of its patrons have been more successful. The more credit is due to him in that he bred most of his own racehorses. Indeed, if he had never trained a horse in his life, he would have been well known among racing men for his skill and success as a breeder; but as it was, it would not be too much to say that he was the corner-stone of the Turf, and when the evil practices of certain owners of racehorses came to light, and scandal after scandal threatened to lower the Turf to the level of thimble-rigging or card-sharping, racing men always quoted Lord Falmouth, and argued that so long as such a paragon remained on it, the Turf could not be altogether corrupted. The racing season of 1883 had scarcely closed when it was announced that Lord Falmouth was going to sell all his racehorses and break up his breeding stud. No news of the kind had ever before caused such wailing and lamentations among racing men. Much about the same time one of the best known figures both on the English and on the French Turf left it for ever. Count Lagrange was an experienced judge of horses, racing, and men. His greatest triumphs were those gained by Gladiateur, who, however, turned out a complete failure at the stud. During a great part of his career on the Turf, Count Lagrange was the leading member of a confederacy, or private joint-stock racing and breeding company. For many years his name appeared as often as, if not oftener, than that of any other owner in the lists of nominations. But the losses to the English racecourse do not end with Count Lagrange. One of the most respected and successful racing families has been that of Grosvenor, and last season two generations of this great family were represented at the same time on our racecourses. The late Lord Grosvenor certainly inherited the family taste for racing, and when he died, he owned a filly which had ranked among the best two-year-olds of her year.

By the death of Count Lagrange the first favourite for the Derby was disqualified, and, from one cause or another, four of what were generally believed to be the best three-year-olds of the past season were excluded from the principal races. Some unpleasant racing scandals, and many disagreeable rumours about the proceedings of racing men in different positions of life, threw an additional gloom over the prospects of the approaching racing season. The very season itself began with disaster. The first important race of the year is the Lincolnshire Handicap. Mr. Naylor owned the first favourite. This was Fulmen, a four-year-old which he had purchased last year at the sale of the late Prince Batthyany's stud for 5,000 guineas. It was believed by those who had the management of the horse that he would now be able to scoop his purchase-money with ample interest; moreover, it is said that he was backed, by different people, to win between seventy and eighty thousand pounds. All went well until a couple of days before the race, when the horse was to have started for Lincoln by the midday train. In the morning he went out for his usual exercise, and on returning, he was groomed and left for a time to himself. When it became time to prepare him for starting for the railway-station, it was found that he was in a profuse sweat and so lame that he could scarcely move. Mr. Barrow, the well-known veterinary surgeon, was at once called in, and pronounced the horse to have been cast in his box. At first it was feared that his back was injured, but on further examination a severely bruised pelvis was found to be the cause of the lameness. Of course, all idea of his running in the Lincolnshire Handicap was out of the question. So much for the risks of horseflesh! After the failure of Fulmen, Tonans became a strong favourite. It will be remembered that this horse ran fourth for the last Cesarewitch. This appeared to give him a great chance for the Cambridgeshire, and for that race he was only beaten a neck by Bendigo. In the Liverpool Autumn Cup he again ran second. After this he was made an equal favourite with Corrie Roy for the Shrewsbury Cup, but both the first favourites were beaten. He had to face twenty-eight opponents for the Lincolnshire Handicap, and he had 8 st. 4 lbs. to carry, but Wood rode him with admirable judgment, and he won the race with something in hand.

At the opening of the present season Hermit still maintains his great superiority over all the other stallions at present at the stud. The earnings of his stock last season were almost double those of any other stallion. The average price realized by his yearlings, too, was nearly double that of the produce of any other sire. One of his yearlings alone was sold for 2,550 guineas, and a four-year-old son of his, who had not particularly distinguished himself, was bought for breeding purposes for more than 4,000 guineas. So long as his yearlings sell for nearly 1,000*l.* a-piece, it seems fair enough that his fee should be 200 guineas. Twenty-six of his stock won more than 30,000*l.* in stakes last year, the principal winners being Tristan, the Adelaide filly, and St. Blaise, the winner of the Derby. Next to Hermit, Galopin was the most successful sire of last season, his stock having won about half the amount credited to the children of Hermit. More than half of these winnings were earned by Galliard alone, and it is reasonable to suppose that, if Fulmen had not been disqualified by the death of Count Batthyany, the winnings of the stock of Galopin might have been even higher. After Galopin's 15,000*l.*, we come to three stallions whose earnings are all about 11,000*l.* These are Speculum, Sterling, and the French horse Salvator. Speculum had two more winners than Hermit. In fact, more horses by Speculum than by any other sire won races last year. When we look through the list of his winning children, we find an average useful class of stock, rather than a few horses of exceptional merit. Sterling had not half as many winners as Speculum, but among them there were a couple of remarkable two-year-olds. One of these was Superba, who won between six and seven thousand pounds worth of stakes, and the other was the fine but backward Harvester. His filly, Cherry, also showed good form in the Cheveley Stakes, the only race in which she ran. Nine of the eleven thousand pounds earned by the stock of Salvator were won by Ossian, the winner of the St. Leger, and thirteen hundred were won, in a single race, by Elzevir. See-Saw's progeny won over 9,000*l.* last year, which was a great advance upon the amount of the previous season, and he had seventeen winners, whereas in 1882 he had only had ten. The running of these horses last year seems to show that the See-Saws train on. Canser, aged, Cylinder, a six-year-old, and Despair, a four-year-old, were all useful horses, if not first class. Nor was See-Saw badly represented among the two-year-olds, Kincardine having won 1,489*l.*, and Monotony 1,334*l.* Hampton, who had an extraordinary season for a young sire in 1882, maintained his ground in 1883, in the matter of the amount won by his stock. He had now, however, ten winners instead of five. Among his two-year-olds, Belinda, Duke of Richmond, and Perdita II. were all large winners. Rosicrucian stood eighth on the list, and he had seventeen winners. As usual, his yearlings sold at very high prices. Their average was only below that of Hermit and Doncaster, and one of them brought in 2,000 guineas, a price only beaten by the 2,500 guineas given for a colt by Hermit. The winner of last year's Oaks was by Macaroni; by whom also was Vista, the winner of the Great Metropolitan Stakes and the Great Yorkshire Handicap. It was unlucky for Macaroni that Macheath, whose two-year-old career promised great things, should have been unavoidably thrown on one side as a three-year-old. Springfield had some fast two-year-olds in Primavera, Royal Fern, and Spring Morn. Albert Victor was stronger in quantity than quality with his sixteen winners. Petrarch, after boasting but one winner in 1882, had eleven last season, who won 7,000*l.* His two-year-old Busybody, the winner of the Middle Park Plate, earned more than half of this amount. Avignon and Woodpecker also won good stakes. All the winners by Petrarch were two-year-olds. Wenlock, who, like Petrarch, is a son of Lord Clifden, had nine winners in 1883, against five in 1882. His stock won almost the same amount as that of Petrarch. His son Deceiver won the Epsom Grand Prize of 3,83[illegible]l. and his two-year-olds, Whitelock, Marianne, and Wrekin, showed some very fair form. The first-named won 1,200*l.*, but 400*l.* of this was for a walk over. Lowlander's name stands among the list of sires whose stock won just under 7,000*l.*; but it is not unlikely that he may do much better some day, as he has hitherto had the misfortune of being mated with a good many unfashionably-bred mares. His filly Wild Thyme won more than 4,000*l.*; but he was unlucky in his very able five-year-old son, Lowland Chief, whose running was inconsistent. Camballo had a handsome, though rather short, two-year-old colt in Camlet, who won nearly 2,000*l.* The two-year-olds Corneille and Scot-Free won large sums to the credit of Macgregor. Although Doncaster was eighteenth on the list of winning stallions, he was second in the sales, as regards the average prices of his yearlings; and he had a very smart two-year-old in Sandiway, who won little short of 4,000*l.* Queen's Messenger made a great advance last year in the amount of the winnings of his children, and his filly Reprieve was considered one of the best two-year-olds of the season. As a proof of her merit, she won over 5,000*l.* in stakes. Kisber promises yet to earn fame at the stud; for his two-year-old Eira won some 1,400*l.* last season, while Kinsky and Madrid also ran well, and won much the same amount between them. The winner of the Cesarewitch was by John Davies; and John Jones and Lizzie, by the same horse, won fair stakes. Wild Oats had as many as fifteen winners; but, with three or four exceptions, they were but platers. Beauclerc did not show a very large return of winnings; but his yearlings averaged 406*l.*, an average only beaten by the yearlings of Hermit, Doncaster, and Rosicrucian. One of his yearlings fetched 1,850 guineas. We may notice here that the average price realized by the thoroughbred yearlings sold last season was 237 guineas. In most cases this would be a remunerative price; but it must be remembered that the fee alone of three sires amounts to from 100 to 200 guineas, although it is but fair to say that the stock of these particular stallions repaid the outlay. Horses by several stallions that are dead won races last year. Among these defunct sires were Strathconan, Cremorne, Adventurer, Blair Athol, and Blue Gown. On the other hand, the stud has been strengthened by several young stallions of promise, such as Beau Brummel, Barcaldine, Petronel, Retreat, and Foxhall.

There was a slight increase in the number of horses that ran last year, but it has often been greatly exceeded. The Duke of Hamilton's Ossian, Lord Falmouth's Galliard, Mr. Lefevre's Tristran, Lord Alington's St. Blaise, Mr. Peck's Superba, and the late Lord Grosvenor's Reprieve were some of the largest winners. About two-fifths of the horses that ran won races, and their average winnings were something under 500*l.* The amount run for in stakes, equally divided amongst all the racehorses that took part in races during the season of 1883 would scarcely have produced 200*l.* a-piece, which, considering the cost of breeding, trainer's bills, forfeits, jockeys' fees, and travelling expenses, would be anything but a satisfactory return. This shows how hard it is to make racing pay without betting; yet if one bets, one will probably be ruined. Altogether, racing can scarcely be considered a remunerative enterprise.

THE REVENUE RETURNS.

THE Revenue Returns for the financial year ended with Monday last are not quite as satisfactory as they promised to be when we were last writing on the subject. The total receipts amount to 87,205,184*l.*, which is 656,000*l.* above Mr. Childers's estimate last April, allowing for the introduction of the Parcels Post, on the one hand, and for the non-introduction of sixpenny telegrams on the other. There has been a remarkable falling off in the rate of collection of the taxes during the month of March. During January and February the weekly receipts averaged 2,177,000*l.*; but during March they did not quite reach 1¾ million. There was thus in the last four weeks of the financial year, compared with the preceding nine weeks, a falling off in the average weekly receipts of about 427,000*l.* On the other hand, the expenditure has considerably increased. Up to the night of Saturday, March 22nd, the expenditure had been greatly behind the estimate; but during the last week of the year the outlay so greatly increased that the total for the year is about 87 millions. The return of expenditure is so framed as to present an accurate calculation of the outlay for the purpose of keeping up interest in the forthcoming Budget statement; but the margin of error is so small that we may roughly say there is a realized surplus of about 200,000*l.* It will be recollected that Mr. Childers lately took power to pay to the Indian Government half a million sterling which would not be due until the new year. In 1880 Parliament voted 5 millions to India in part payment of the costs of the Afghan War. Two millions had been previously lent by the Beaconsfield Government, and were then made a free gift, and 3 millions additional were to be paid in annual instalments of half a million. The instalment falling due in the year on which we have now entered was paid last week. Adding this payment, which did not properly belong to the year, to the above surplus of 200,000*l.*, we get a total surplus for the year of about 700,000*l.* The total expenditure, as estimated in the Budget, was 85,789,000*l.* There has thus been an increase of over 1,200,000*l.*, from which, of course, we have to deduct the half-million prepaid to India, leaving the actual increase over the Budget estimate about 700,000*l.*, due mainly to the Soudan expedition. Some of our daily contemporaries regard the falling off in the receipts during March as evidence that the condition of the country is deteriorating. We, however, are not prepared to look upon it in that light. The falling off occurs almost entirely in Income-tax, Stamps, Customs and Excise, and Miscellaneous Revenue. As the Income-tax was reduced by three-halfpence, the falling off under that head was fully expected. Indeed, for the year the tax proved far more productive than had been anticipated. Mr. Childers last April estimated that in consequence of the reduction there would be a falling off of 2,135,000*l.*; but the actual falling off has been only 1,182,000*l.*, or not much more than half the estimate. During the last quarter, indeed, the falling off amounted to over 2 millions; but in the last quarter all the arrears at a higher rate had been already got in, and the tax at fivepence was comparing with the tax at sixpence-halfpenny. The falling off in Stamps again amounts to 221,000*l.* for the year and 251,000*l.* for the last quarter. It is greater, therefore, for the last quarter than for the whole year. This is explained partly by the fact that the reduction of the Railway Passenger Duty did not come into operation until the second half of the year, and partly by the complete collapse of speculation. When speculation on the Stock Exchange is active, the duties paid upon transfers of stocks go to swell the stamp duties, and when, as at present, it is dormant, that revenue falls off. Lastly, the revenue, no doubt, has been adversely affected by the extraordinarily fine winter, which has reduced the death-rate amongst the exceptionally wealthy as amongst all other classes.

In Customs and Excise together there is an increase for the year of 66,000*l.*, but a falling off for the last quarter of 277,000*l.*; and as Customs and Excise are usually looked upon as the best indices to the condition of the great mass of the population, our contemporaries infer that the consuming power of the people has been diminished during the past three months. It is to be recollected, however, that for several years now there has been a marked decline in the productiveness of the drink duties; and the figures just quoted show that temperate habits are still on the increase amongst us. It is true, no doubt, that this does not account for the marked falling off in the last three months, since there is no reason to suppose that temperance has spread with exceptional rapidity during the quarter. But there is another and a special cause which would account for the diminution in the drink duties. The provisional convention entered into with Spain has led to a general expectation that in the coming Budget Mr. Childers will greatly modify the wine duties; and if he undertakes to deal with the wine duties, it is not improbable that he may also find himself compelled in some way or other to deal with the spirit duties. In any case, it is natural to suppose that those engaged in the trade would pay as little as possible of the existing high duty, either upon wine or spirits, when it may be that in the course of a few weeks those duties will be reduced. A falling off, therefore, in the revenue from both spirits and wine was to be expected, and has in it nothing to surprise. The falling off, too, has been going on all through the quarter. Indeed, it would seem as if the deliveries out of bond for consumption had been kept down too low, for the decrease in the Customs and Excise as compared with the previous year was larger when the last weekly return was issued than it appears to be from the final return for the whole year. During the last seven days of the year, therefore, there must have been exceptionally large payments of duties. The argument we are here putting forward is borne out by the large consumption of tea. Up to the end of February there was a slight falling off in the consumption of tea compared with the previous year; but since the beginning of March the consumption has increased. And there is but little decrease in the consumption of sugar and coffee. Taking all the facts into consideration, then—bearing in mind how large the volume of business done throughout the country is, how well wages have been maintained, and how considerable is the employment given—we see no reason to suppose that the consuming power of the people has declined; while we find in the expectation that the wine duties will be reduced, a sufficient explanation of the marked falling off in Customs and Excise during the past three months. And the large yield of the Income-tax, to which we have already referred, further bears out the contention. As we have seen, the falling off in that tax, notwithstanding the reduction of three-halfpence, is little more than half what Mr. Childers estimated it would be last April. It is true, indeed, that all competent persons were satisfied that Mr. Childers's estimate was excessive; but, at the same time, few were prepared to find that the yield of the fivepenny tax would be so large as it has proved to be. Considering the complaints one hears of the condition of trade in all parts of the United Kingdom, of the long-continued depression in agriculture and the collapse of speculation, we should not have been surprised if the decrease in the Income-tax had been much more considerable than it has. The actual yield proves that the prosperity of the country is well maintained; that not only is the trade done very large, but that the profits it yields, if moderate, are substantial. There are not, of course, the large profits that are yielded in times of active speculation; but it is clear that the tax would not have yielded nearly 10¾ millions if the incomes of property-owners were not increasing. Land-tax and House-duty show increases both for the quarter and for the year, and so does the Post Office. The increase in the Post Office revenue for the year is as much as 430,000*l.*, and for the quarter actually 280,000*l.* The introduction of the Parcels Post thus would appear to be a financial success. The telegraph service for the year gives an increase of 35,000*l.*, though for the quarter there is a small decrease of 5,000*l.* But the most curious feature in the whole Return is the large diminution under the head of Miscellaneous Revenue. In his Budget statement Mr. Childers estimated that this revenue would decrease, compared with last year, 880,000*l.* The actual decrease is as much as 979,000*l.*, while for the quarter the decrease amounts to 586,000*l.* Mr. Childers failed to explain last April why he anticipated this large decrease, and it will be interesting to hear his statement in reference to it when he introduces the Budget. But what makes the falling off the more remarkable now is that the Indian Government has paid to the Home Government a million sterling on account of old army claims long outstanding. This million ought to be accounted for somewhere in the Return, and naturally one would expect to find it under the head of Miscellaneous Revenue; but it is clearly impossible that it can have been inserted there, as in that case the falling off in the Miscellaneous Revenue would amount to very nearly two millions. The Miscellaneous Revenue is made up of such a large number of items that its increase or decrease has no significance as regards the condition of the people; but a falling off of nearly a million of course seriously affects the Budget. If this revenue had proved moderately productive the result for the year would be much more satisfactory than it is. Indeed, the receipts from taxation proper are highly satisfactory and give a favourable view of the condition of the country. It is chiefly this Miscellaneous Revenue which has disappointed the promise given by the weekly returns issued up to a fortnight ago of a very large surplus.

As regards the coming Budget, it appears from the facts now stated that there is little room for fiscal reform. The arrears of Income-tax this year will be at the lower rate of fivepence in the pound, and, therefore, we must anticipate a falling off in the Income-tax compared with the past year of nearly half a million. Moreover, the sixpenny telegraph scheme will, we presume, be introduced, and last year that was estimated to cost about 170,000*l.*, while the Railway Passenger Duty applying to the whole year will likewise reduce the Stamp Duty. Altogether, therefore, the revenue on these grounds will lose from three-quarters to a million sterling. On the other hand, the growth of population and wealth are sure to make the remaining taxes more productive. Of late years the normal increase has amounted to about one per cent.; and, therefore, the falling off for the reasons stated above will be nearly, if not quite, balanced by the normal increase in the revenue. Still, as Mr. Childers last April under-estimated his income, he is likely to do so again; and probably, therefore, he will not look for much more than 86½ millions in the year we have now entered upon. On the other hand, the expenditure will be less, since the half-million due to India has been already prepaid. In the year just ended there were two instalments of the Indian subvention paid—the instalment due in the year and the instalment due this year. The year we have now entered upon is therefore exempt from any payment to India; and consequently the expenditure, which last year was 87 millions, will be cut down by a whole million. There has, it is true, been a slight increase in the Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates, but the increase is unimportant; and, if Mr. Childers does not undertake to deal with the wine duties, he may estimate a revenue of 86½ millions with reasonable certainty, assuring to himself a small surplus. The probability, indeed, is that the revenue will be larger. If it should be, and if there should be no increase of expenditure on account of the Soudan or in some other unexpected quarter, he may be able to pay off the last half-million due to India, which, however, need not be paid until next year. There are several problems waiting for solution: the financial condition of Egypt, for instance, the fortification of our harbours, and various other matters. But perhaps Mr. Childers will deal with none of these in his Budget statement. There is no evidence as yet that the Government has adopted a definite Egyptian policy, and until it has done so, it can hardly be prepared to deal with the financial situation in Egypt; while the protection of our harbours would probably be undertaken with borrowed money, and would throw little charge on the current year. The wine duties question appears a more pressing one, though perhaps Mr. Childers may choose to leave that for decision when some final arrangement is arrived at with Spain.

REVIEWS.

SEELEY'S EXPANSION OF ENGLAND.*

REPRINTED lectures are apt to make somewhat thin and unsatisfactory books. This perhaps is only another way of saying that a great many lectures are thin and unsatisfactory, and that their lack of substance becomes more manifest in print. But the two courses of lectures which Professor Seeley has reprinted under the title of The Expansion of England are certainly not open to this reproach. They are, in fact, unusually solid and weighty, and should be read by all who study history, not for the mere love of romance or of antiquarianism, but for its bearing on "practical politics." We will let Professor Seeley, who has long been understood to hold that history ought not to be made entertaining—any more than medicine ought to be made nice—speak for himself on the true meaning, as he conceives it, of the interest of history. The passage quoted below forms the concluding paragraph of his book, but it will serve equally well here for an introduction:—

> I am often told by those who, like myself, study the question how history should be taught, Oh, you must before all things make it interesting! I agree with them in a certain sense, but I give a different sense to the word interesting, a sense which after all is the original and proper one. By interesting they mean romantic, poetical, surprising; I do not try to make history interesting in this sense, because I have found that it cannot be done without adulterating history and mixing it with falsehood. But the word interesting does not properly mean romantic. That is interesting in the proper sense which affects our interests, which closely concerns us and is deeply important to us. I have tried to show you that the history of modern England from the beginning of the eighteenth century is interesting in this sense, because it is pregnant with great results which will affect the lives of ourselves and our children and the future greatness of our country. Make history interesting indeed! I cannot make history more interesting than it is, except by falsifying it. And therefore when I meet a person who does not find history interesting, it does not occur to me to alter history,—I try to alter him.

The least pleasant feature of the book is its author's appearance of contempt for all methods but his own. "Is it not evident," he asks, "that what we have hitherto called history is not history at all?" And as we turn over his pages, we come upon "the old school of historians, who, according to my view, lost themselves in mere narrative"; "our childish mode of arranging history"; "the slavish obsequiousness with which our historians follow the order of business fixed by Parliament"; "a foppish kind of history which aims only at literary display, which produces delightful books hovering between poetry and prose." He is peculiarly scornful of the school who "deny that history can establish any solid or important truths," who "can only see that it is exquisitely entertaining and delightful to call the past into life again, to see our ancestors in their costume as they lived, and to surprise them in the very act of doing their famous deeds." We feel some doubts as to whether there really is any historical school—for Thackeray, who is here quoted by Mr. Seeley, was hardly an historian—which denies that history has important truths to teach; though there may be one which holds that the true lesson of history is the knowledge of human nature which may be obtained by entering into the life and thought of past generations. The fact, as it seems to us, is that the lessons of history are many. From it one man may learn to understand the nature of human kind when acting together in masses—how they are swayed by religion, or by what they take to be religion, by patriotism, or by other motives; how far they make their government, or how far their government makes them. Another may search for light on the causes of social well or ill being; has not Mr. Lecky written, and with some truth, that the most momentous fact in the history of the eighteenth century is the sudden development of the passion for gin-drinking? Mr. Seeley has much to say upon eighteenth-century history, but he does not mention gin. He names "Wilkes and General Warrants" only with a sneer; yet, after all, general warrants have a practical bearing upon personal liberty, which is not a wholly unimportant thing; nor is it altogether unreasonable to study history with a view to the solution of the ever-recurring problem how best to reconcile order and authority with individual liberty. Some, following in the footsteps of the late Mr. Green, may look upon history as the biography of a people, and may think that Newton belongs to history just as much as Harley—an opinion which Professor Seeley expressly rejects. Yet another man may have no theories at all, and may read simply as the knights in the Faerie Queene read, and for our part we do not see that he is to blame. Mr. Seeley maintains that our object should be to "discover the laws of political growth and change," and, in the history of the eighteenth century, to contemplate what he calls "the foundation of Greater Britain." We have every respect for his view, but we plead for tolerance of other people's methods. Besides, there is always a suspicion of trade jealousy in the depreciation of one class of writers by another. One man has the knack of picturesque reproduction of the past; therefore he maintains that to be the historian's function. Another cannot be picturesque for the life of him, but he can extract from history what the Senior Wrangler could not extract from Paradise Lost—he can tell "what it proves." Consequently he is sure that this is the only function worthy of the historian. For ourselves, we are willing to listen to all in turn, and only request that each will refrain from abusing his neighbour's shop over the way. This touch of literary arrogance and a tendency to repetition, both of thought and phraseology—as when the author speaks in one sentence of certain wars as being "the great decisive duel between England and France for the possession of the New World," and in the next sentence of their being, "as it were, the decisive campaign in that great world-struggle"—are about the only faults we have to find in the book.

> Burning both with fervent fire
> Their countreys auncestry to understond;

The author's main point throughout is that the most important fact in the history of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is "the expansion of England," "the simple obvious fact of the extension of the English name into other countries of the globe, the foundation of Greater Britain." He admits that most people, if asked what is the general drift or goal of English history, would answer by pointing to the growth of what, for lack of a better name, we must call democracy. But he contends that this, though it excites more attention at the present moment, is in reality of minor importance:—

There is something very characteristic in the indifference which we show towards this mighty phenomenon of the diffusion of our race and the expansion of our state. We seem, as it were, to have conquered and peopled half the world in a fit of absence of mind. While we were doing it, that is in the eighteenth century, we did not allow it to affect our imaginations or in any degree to change our ways of thinking; nor have we even now ceased to think of ourselves as simply a race inhabiting an island off the northern coast of the Continent of Europe. We constantly betray by our modes of speech that we do not reckon our colonies as really belonging to us; thus if we are asked what the English population is, it does not occur to us to reckon in the population of Canada and Australia. This fixed way of thinking has influenced our historians. It causes them, I think, to miss the true point of view in describing the eighteenth century. They make too much of the mere parliamentary wrangle and the agitations about liberty, in all which matters the eighteenth century of England was but a pale reflexion of the seventeenth. They do not perceive that in that century the history of England is not in England but in America and Asia.

In the next chapter Mr. Seeley roughly sketches the history of the eighteenth century, or rather of its foreign wars, which, as he says, are the chief events of the period. Here his work ought to prove of great use in exposing the fallacies so frequently uttered on the subject of these wars. We know how Mr. Bright and his disciples speak of them as the mere madness of kings and statesmen, and how the ordinary run of writers moralize over the criminal absurdity of our mixing ourselves up with questions of the succession to the Spanish throne, or of the interests of Maria Theresa or Frederick the Great. On the war of the Spanish Succession, which by reason of its dynastic-sounding name is in peculiarly ill odour, Mr. Seeley makes some good remarks:—

That war has such a splendour in our annals, and the title we give it, "War of the Spanish Succession," has such a monarchical ring, that we think it a good sample of the fantastic, barbaric, wasteful wars of the olden time. It is of this war that "little Peterkin" desires to know "what good came of it at last." In reality it is the most business-like of all our wars, and it was waged in the interest of English and Dutch merchants whose trade and livelihood were at stake.

The subsequent "trilogy of wars," as he happily phrases it—the War of the Austrian Succession, the Seven Years' War, and the American War—he describes as "neither more nor less than the great decisive duel between England and France for the possession of the New World." His theory may perhaps be thought to be somewhat strained when he goes on to apply it to the wars which arose out of the French Revolution; and, indeed, he slurs over the pre-Napoleonic period, passing on at once to Napoleon and his designs upon Egypt and India:—

As in the American war France avenges on England her expulsion from the New World, so under Napoleon she makes Titanic efforts to recover her lost place there. This indeed is Napoleon's fixed view with regard to England. He sees in England never the island, the European State, but always the World-Empire, the network of dependencies and colonies and islands covering every sea, among which he was himself destined to find at last his prison and his grave.

It may be a question whether in dealing with the later Napoleonic war, that of 1803, he does not make too much of Napoleon's vague designs upon India. Napoleon undoubtedly "caressed," as the French phrase is, such projects; but he had so many countries to conquer by the way, that his ultimate designs remained little more than dreams. On the other hand, the author does not mention, what would have considerably strengthened his theory about the New World—Pitt's vision of a conquest of Spanish America, which produced, though not till after Pitt's death, definite action in the shape of Beresford's fleeting success, and Whitelocke's and Craufurd's failure, at Buenos Ayres. He speaks, however, of the destructive privateering war which the French kept up from the island of Mauritius long after their naval power had been destroyed at Trafalgar, and adds, "It was by the conquest of this island and its retention at the peace by England that the Hundred Years' War of England and France for the New World came to an end." All this is the more interesting in view of the present curious tentatives of France in the direction of foreign dominion.

It would take too long to go through the chapters dealing with colonial systems, ancient and modern, and we can only call attention to a passage here and there, especially to that in which the author treats of the value of colonies as "lands for the landless, prosperity and wealth for those in straitened circumstances." Finally, he discusses the practical question whether our present colonies must necessarily secede because those which now form the United States did so. It is usual to speak of the loss of the American colonies as not only inevitable, but as advantageous—an instance, he thinks, of "that curious kind of optimistic fatalism to which historians are liable."

From that Revolution we infer that all distant colonies, sooner or later, secede from the mother-country. We ought to infer only that they secede when they are held under the old colonial system.

Under what new system the present "Greater Britain" is to be held together Mr. Seeley does not undertake precisely to determine, though he throws out some hints of his ideas on the subject. His opinions on the probability and the desirability of the permanence of what, in default of a more accurate name, we call our Empire are, at any rate, worthy of the consideration of that school which somewhat ungraciously bids the colonies leave us, and the sooner the better.

The second part of the book is composed of a course of lectures upon India, which show the same robustness of thought and absence of commonplace that characterize their predecessors. There is some quiet satire at the expense of the rhetorical speakers and writers who represent our conquest of India as "a standing miracle in politics, only to be explained by the heroic qualities of the English race and their natural genius for government," Mr. Seeley undertaking to show that it is an event which, when the circumstances are fairly and fully looked at, is not so very difficult to account for, and which did not demand such prodigious heroism. But he contends that on scientific examination the Indian Empire will be found to gain in historic what it loses in romantic interest. As however we have no further space to quote or even to condense his opinions, we must refer our readers to the book itself. It is not one which will please those who incline either to what he calls "the bombastic school," or to the sentimental. He does not believe in "the blood of the Vikings," nor in the intrinsic glory of an Empire "upon which the sun never sets." But, on the other hand, he treats historic facts in a spirit which to sentimentalists may appear almost Machiavellian. His business as a historian, he contends, is to find out how things came about, not how they ought to have come about; he refuses to be troubled with subtle questions about the lawfulness of past conquests, and he scorns those readers of the past generation—are they so wholly of the past?—who held "that there is nothing good in politics but liberty," and nothing worth reading about in history but the progress of liberty. In short, from first to last there is a great deal of common sense in the book; and this is rather an uncommon merit.

FOUR NOVELS.*

OF the four books before us Vestigia is undoubtedly the best. It is a very pleasantly written book, one that it is impossible to read without feeling it to be the work of a lady—and we use the word not merely as a polite synonym for woman. There is absolutely nothing in the book from beginning to end that offends against good taste—unless a reader should be so fastidious as to object to the uncompromising English "Damn" by which the writer, somewhat frequently perhaps, seeks to represent the spirit of swearing where the Italian original would fail to convey to her readers more than the outward semblance of an expletive. For the scene is laid in Italy, and the people are Italians. But—and this is the fundamental weakness of the book—the characters might belong as well to any other nationality, and most of all to that of their literary parent. Cælum non animum. They live under an Italian sky, and are called by appropriate names; but there is nothing distinctively national about their characters or views of life. They are simply men and women; but that they are men and women, and not animated dummies, is, after all, a good deal for novel-readers to be thankful for. It requires something more, however, than Italian names and scenery and a liberal sprinkling of Italian words and phrases to make a Romola. The story is slender, and, in the first volume, it must be confessed, rather dull; but in the second we get along faster, and the interest is well sustained to the end. 'Dino, the hero, a lad in humble life, gets involved with some (very amateur) conspirators, who select him to attempt the King's life. Horrified as he is, there seems no sufficient reason why he should be unable to draw back; but he has imbibed or inherited some odd notions, and feels himself bound by a code of false honour, to which he adheres with misdirected quixotism. The struggles of his really fine and honest nature between this and the true call of duty, which lies in the direction of the lovable little daughter of his benefactor—a rough and hearty, extremely British old fisherman—are very skilfully portrayed. The scene in which he tells the old man he has other duties, which he cannot surrender even for the sake of marrying Italia, and the description of his feelings and doings just before the fatal day, contain elements of no inconsiderable power. And if the same cannot be said of the parting interview between the lovers on the eve of 'Dino's departure on his uncongenial mission, the situation may at least claim the merit of novelty—their accidental moonlight meeting being brought about on the surface of a "large red buoy" bobbing about in the harbour! The title seems singularly inappropriate, since in the last chapter, giving the key to its meaning in the heading Vestigia nulla retrorsum, the hero is turning his steps back to honest life and pretty little Italia; having at the last moment been saved from the commission of the dreaded act imposed upon him. How all this comes about, readers of novels will not regret finding out for themselves by reading these two unpretending little volumes.

tizing it analytically, and it is scarcely worth that. It is neither very good, nor very bad, nor in any respect remarkable or original; a book of the regulation pattern, which makes one doubt whether all the novels really are written by different people, or are not, rather, being endlessly ground out by some huge machine, like carpets or cretonnes. The title tells us the kind of thing we may expect; and we have the same old familiar friends doing the same sort of things, as they have been doing them any time this quarter of a century. We have the wise and the unwise, the selfish and the unselfish people, the true-hearted and the cold-hearted, and the people with no hearts at all, and so on through all the virtues and some of the vices—though we are happily spared all the less reputable and presentable forms of vice. One apparently unconscious piece of humorous inconsequence we cannot refrain from quoting:—"The higher life," it is said, "was unknown to him; he had lived like his neighbours, as far as his income allowed; nay, even further"! For plot, the various sets of lovers are dancing, as it were, all through the book a kind of cotillon in real life, in which of course, after all the kaleidoscopic changes of partners are over, each couple comes out properly matched at the end. Meanwhile, those more immediately concerned are industriously playing "hunt the slipper" with "Uncle George's money," each eagerly insisting on passing it on to his neighbour in the circle, and determined himself to be rid of it, with such effect that, at the end of the game, they positively manage to lose half of it altogether in very earnest by the smashing of a bank! However, the individual who happens to be sitting on the slipper at the time seems so thoroughly pleased at the loss that it would be useless for us to regret it. Of the characters, the, here inevitable, rich old uncle is really almost too impossibly rude to his relations even for a "rich old uncle." Lady Keith, the representative of the ladylike, sensible (not to say, sententious) woman type of character, is well drawn; so is—but there are too many figures for individual mention. The book is by no means badly written; it has many negative and some positive good qualities; of the latter class is the important one—in a book—of being eminently readable; the story never flags. And for negative recommendations it can boast the complete absence of sensationalism, animalism, and vulgarity. It may, in fact, be "warranted sound and free from vice," as its own one-time slangy, horsey Maggie would have said. Maggie, by the way, nearly wrecks her happiness for ever by smoking a cigar on the box-seat of a drag. It would be interesting to know how many scores of fast young ladies have got into trouble, in novels, in the selfsame manner, since poor dear Kate Coventry's famous escapade.

A very different kind of book from either of the foregoing is For Love and Duty. It is not always easy to know to which sex a very young and inexperienced novelist belongs; nor in such cases is the question of any importance. So, without troubling to search too closely for clues from internal evidence (though "Is there no vid media?" (sic) looks feminine), we will give the epicene name of "Elmond" on the title-page the benefit of the doubt, and speak of the author in the masculine gender, using it in the comprehensive sense given to it by the interpretation clause of Acts of Parliament, as "including the feminine." This book is further described as "A Romance of the Peerage." To the experienced eye the addition suggests misgivings; and they do not prove unfounded. It is, indeed, "a romance" pure and simple so far as concerns "the peerage" and the manners and customs of the people connected therewith. Why will people write about the peerage without even so much outside knowledge of it as could be gleaned in five minutes from the most ordinary and accessible books of reference? Here is a young person, who must needs write "A Romance of the Peerage," calling "the only son and heir" of an earl "Lord Rupert Dracey." Nor is this a casual slip; he is so styled more than once, in the first few pages, before he comes to the earldom, interchangeably with what appears his proper designation of Viscount Dracey. And his father before him is referred to later on as "Lord Eustace Dracey" before coming into the peerage on the death of his father. Any one could have told the writer that the eldest son of an earl takes by courtesy his father's second title, and that by no possibility could any son of an earl be called Lord Rupert, or Lord Eustace, or Lord anything else Dracey. After this we need not be surprised that all the people "my lord" and "my lady" each other up and down the pages in the most familiar intercourse; nor that, when three or four of them are sitting together at a private luncheon-table, they speak of, or rather at, one another as "my lord bishop" and "the right honourable and learned lord." All this might have been passed over with a word of advice to the writer to leave alone the peerage. But there is a far more serious offence behind. The story being (as we shall see presently) sensational and unpleasant, the writer, nevertheless, not content with peopling his tale with imaginary lords and ladies, has had the shockingly bad taste to drag in among them, under the thinnest disguise, a well-known lady of rank. So much for the "romance" of the "peerage." And what of the romance of the story itself? If a supposed bigamy (on which the whole plot turns), another bigamy contemplated, one actual murder, one cruel and revolting attempt (believed by the perpetrator to have succeeded) on the part of a wife to murder her husband, to say nothing of forgeries, perjuries, and other such small fry among crimes—if such materials constitute a romance, then Love and Duty is romantic; otherwise not. Of a story so constructed our readers will hardly expect or desire us to give much account. However, the cardinal points may be explained in a few words. On the death of a certain Earl of Glenalan, leaving a wife and children, a strange woman appears on the scene, and claims to have been his wife from a time anterior to his avowed marriage. She was one of two sisters, to one of whom, it is shown beyond doubt by parish registers, Lord Glenalan had been married; that one had died shortly afterwards, and the husband married again. The other, to whom Lord Glenalan had always made an allowance, falsifies the register of her sister's burial by substituting her own name for that of her deceased sister; and, at the Earl's death, fortified by the marriage-register and the compromising fact of the annuity, personates his deceased wife. It does not seem to occur to any one that there is anything suspicious in her having thus awaited the death of the Earl. Nor do the legal gentlemen concerned, or the friends of the ousted family, among whom is an ex-Lord Chancellor (the "right honourable and learned lord" above referred to), for a moment question the identity of the claimant, though there are indications in the first few chapters that disclose at once to the most uninitiated of novel-readers the true state of the case. On the contrary, so plainly sustainable does the claim appear to these simple-minded folk, including the "eminent firm of solicitors" engaged and the ex-Chancellor, that the case is not fought, the young lord "chivalrously" preferring to give up everything without a struggle. Of course he comes to his own again in good time—that is to say, after occasion has been afforded for a sufficient number of murders, &c. It remains to add that in one at least of the scenes there is promise that the author is capable of better things. But if he would succeed in turning what promise there is to any good account, let the writer follow better models, eschew the peerage, and in other respects, too, be a little less ambitious. Above all, let him seek, by avoiding for ever any repetition of such an offence, to atone for the painful impropriety above alluded to.

The title of Cherry is an excellent one. So highly does the author evidently appreciate its excellence that she has made it do duty for two stories, for the second of which, beginning in the middle of the second of the three volumes, all called "Cherry" on the title-pages, she could find no better heading than "Dead Sorrow's Kin"; and, as the title of Cherry is the strongest recommendation of both stories, perhaps she has done wisely. The heroine of Cherry proper, albeit an innocent and loyal country-bred girl throughout, yet gets entangled with her soldier-cousin, and has a declaration of love made to her by her husband's groom within three months of her marriage. Her father, a clergyman, is described as "apt to do things with a burst"; and his "most forcible form of exhortation" is said to be "Come, jump!" which we should have thought forcible enough for any one. But he is not alone in the vigour and terseness of his expressions. Cherry's husband, who is not in the least intended to be ill bred, replies to a lady in his own house, in the course of a particularly serious conversation, with the emphatic monosyllable, "Rot!" The "Radical" groom's favourite address to his superiors and others is "Curse you!" (hissed between his teeth), while the Vicar's younger children (one of whom appears to have been christened Friswig) habitually call each other "greedy pigs!" at table, which youthful ebullitions their elders, conscious no doubt of their own peculiarities in the matter of language, are too consistent to rebuke. For plot the story is dependent on the mental activity of a preternaturally wicked Frenchwoman, who, coming no one knows whence, quarters herself, as a kind of unprofessional "companion" to Cherry, on these amiable people, and, with no sufficient motive, but presumably "just out of badness," first poisons Cherry's favourite dog, then her horse (whereby she is thrown and nearly killed), and finally, with a well-founded confidence in every one's stupidity, proceeds, in the most open possible way, to poison Cherry herself; but the inconceivably blind people about, doctors and others, are at last told what has been so long going on under their noses, in time to save her life. The Frenchwoman disappears, and the Radical groom drowns himself the same night—a sad warning to advanced politicians. The climax of the story is to be looked for in the subsequent discovery of the identity of a Frenchwoman convicted in Paris of poisoning her aunt with Cherry's agreeable but rather dangerous "companion." And that is the end of Cherry proper.

In "Dead Sorrow's Kin" we are introduced to a gelatinous, out-at-elbows "ecclesiastical agent," his wife, with a turn for writing stories and talking Atheism-and-water, and a nondescript "gentleman of no occupation," who falls in love with the wife, and she with him. All three go out in a boat together and get capsized. The lover saves the wife, but has the presence of mind to hit the husband over the head, so that he is drowned. It is not worth while pursuing the story. The point that struck us as most worthy of note is that the gentleman of no occupation on rising from dinner "laid his napkin on the table." The simple and touching incident here recorded, in addition to the intrinsic interest naturally attaching to it, derives especial importance at the present time from the circumstance that the gifted author of Don't says the napkin should be placed on the chair.

THE RIVER CONGO.*

WHETHER General Gordon has the fortune to survive and go to the Congo or not, it is certain that the Congo should not be left, like Yarrow, unvisited. Mr. Johnston has spied out the land, penetrating to Stanley Pool, and his report proves, at least, the extraordinary natural wealth of the country. On the Congo every one can find what interests him most. The river tastes like weak tea, which just suits Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Here be orchids beyond the dreams of affluence and of Mr. Chamberlain. Here are birds, beasts, and flowers enough to occupy the attention of the whole Geological Society, and game enough to console the Scottish deer-stalker for all the enterprise of Mr. Bryce. Here are fish as big as salmon and delicious to eat, fish which have never had a fly cast over them, and perish by a dishonourable death in wicker-traps. Here are odd savages for the anthropologist, savages almost too hospitable, and apt to insist on the tourist taking to his arms all their marriageable daughters at once. Then there are fetishes and fetish-men, mysteries, mummeries, queer gods, like the Lampsacene, strange burials, and odd religions enough to occupy "agriologists" for years.

Concerning all these matters Mr. Johnston writes with plenty of intelligence, though he sometimes yields to temptation, and is a little facetious. Probably the facetiousness of travellers is the result of a creditable effort "to be jolly," like Mark Tapley, under difficulties. There are difficulties on the Congo. The mosquitoes, of course, make life hideous. The sudden rains, coming down with tropical violence, swamp the explorer's tent, and reduce his French novels to "a mass of yellow pap." This is the harder because Mr. Johnston found fiction and light literature the best pick-me-up and stimulant for the African traveller. Europeans in general prefer brandy and various "pegs," with results which may readily be predicted. The food, too, at least in the lower stations near the coast, is a dreadful diet of tinned meats. At first Mr. Johnston seems to have thought tinned meats capital fare, and revelled in (tinned) mock-turtle soup, salmon cutlets, lobster, roast beef, boiled mutton, potatoes, game patty, asparagus, and plum-pudding. These luxuries palled on him, however, before he reached page 56 in his narrative, and he confesses to preferring "plain roast goat, however tough, to the insipid contents of a tin, notwithstanding the attractive name it might bear in the menu." Another drawback to travel on the Congo and elsewhere is the enterprise of your crocodile. Mr. Johnston mentions the case of a man who was sailing down the river in a canoe, amusing himself by watching a crocodile swimming beside him. Suddenly the animal "rose" at him, like a trout at a fly, and seized the European by the leg. The crocodile was beaten off, but retreated with the foot of its victim. Fever is also apt to assail the tourist on the Congo. At first it affects him like champagne, making him feel wonderfully brilliant and clever; but the results are deplorable when the first exhilaration has passed away. The best way of preserving the health in Africa is to shun much strong drink and to eat often, if the food at hand be wholesome. Some soup should be taken the first thing in the morning. There is an "idiotic idea," according to Mr. Johnston, that in Africa "it is more heroic to conduct yourself like a martyr, undergo long periods of fasting, and generally pay little attention to how much or how often you eat and drink." This absurd notion "standeth in a false following" of Mungo Park, who, of course, ate little and seldom, because he had next to nothing to eat, being entirely devoid of circulating medium except the brass buttons of his coat, which he soon traded away. The modern explorer does not go out thus poorly equipped, but has plenty of cloth and plenty of beads. He must be careful to have the right cloth and the right beads for each district, as blue alone is sought for in some regions, while red or yellow cloth is the currency elsewhere; and there are places where cowries are still a legal tender.

An important point in Mr. Johnston's book is his belief in Mr. Stanley and in Mr. Stanley's success. Again and again his conviction that Mr. Stanley goes to work in the right way with the natives finds expression. They need to see a show of force; and in an attack on one of their stations they did see it, and learned their powerlessness in war with Europeans. This is Mr. Johnston's opinion; and perhaps the race which has just made such a remarkable show of force near Suakim has no right to find fault with proceedings that, on Mr. Johnston's showing, were not unnecessarily high-handed. Mr. Johnston even looks forward to the day when civilization shall have covered the Congo, and hotels with French names and twenty acres of primeval forest attached shall be found on every eligible site. But he admits the "degradation and banalité" that our commercial civilization carries with it into Argyleshire as much as into Africa. Perhaps his prophecies will not speedily be fulfilled. A letter in the Standard of April 1—a letter, to be sure, by a jealous explorer—avers that Mr. Stanley is by no means so prosperous and firmly established as Mr. Johnston found him. The local missionaries, it is pleasant to learn, are not of the flogging sort, like the Rev. Legrees of Blantyre, but are almost too mild in their dealings with their black flocks.

The native races of the Congo, after all, are more interesting than the flowers which Mr. Johnston draws so well, more interesting even than the birds to the student of the natural history of mankind. Here is a curious account of blacks at church, and of the extent to which they are influenced by Christian doctrine:—

> When the missionary holds a Sunday service in King Kongo-Mpaka's house, some twenty or thirty idlers look in, in a genial way, to see what is going on, much as we might be present at any of their ceremonies. They behave very well, and imitate, with that exact mimicry which only the negro possesses, all our gestures and actions, so that a hasty observer would conclude they were really touched by the service. They kneel down with an abandon of devotion, clasp their hands, and say "Amen" with a deep ventral enthusiasm. The missionary, on the occasion that I accompanied him, gave a short sermon in Fiote, well expressed considering the little time he had been studying the language. The king constantly took up the end of some phrase, and repeated it with patronising interest after the missionary, just to show how he was attending, throwing meanwhile a furtive glance at his wives, who were pursuing their avocations outside with sufficient diligence. A short prayer concluded the service, and when the king rose from his knees, he promptly demanded the loan of a hand-screw to effect some alteration in his new canoe.

A missionary, however, is not without influence. In one instance a fetish-man or medicine-man had audaciously accused a stingy king of murder. This is deeply interesting. Early history, as in Vedic India, always shows us the chiefs at war with the sorcerers (when sorcerer and chief are not the same person), the Kshatriya striving against the Brahman, the State against the Church. Near Mayanga, the Church (that is, the fetish-man or spiritual power) had quite got the better of the secular arm. The wife of a sub-chief of the King of Dandanga fell ill and died. The people do not, of course, believe in natural death. As among other savages all natural deaths are thought unnatural. The fetish-man was called in, as the Biraark would have been in Australia, to discover the murderer. He fixed on the King Mlongo, who would have been compelled to undergo the ordeal of "poison water" had a missionary not arrived and rescued the monarch. Like the Cambridge cad who wanted money to "drink the health" of the undergraduate who had rescued his child from drowning, the King showed his gratitude by begging for cloth. Probably the fetish-man will be even with him yet, the black Becket will master the miserable black Henry. A fetish-house, the temple of native religion (as far as they have a religion) is rather esthetic. The walls are decorated with European plates, like a drawing-room in Kensington. Inside the house is a mound of clay, adorned with patterns in coloured pebbles. On each side of the mound are Priapean statues, as in the Admiralty Islands, executed with curious realism. Schweinfurth also remarked the realism of art among the Bongos, where it is carried to extraordinary lengths. When a man has been murdered, and the criminal is unknown, a friend will give a dinner to all the neighbours. After dinner he will introduce a coloured image of the deceased so exactly like him, that the conscience of the malefactor generally betrays him into a terrified confession. Mr. Johnston remarked, on the Congo, "the great resemblance these figures bear to native men and women, and the clever manner in which they were carved and painted."

The tribes of men in the Congo basin belong chiefly to the Bantu family, which spreads from the Ovahereroes in the south-west to the Victoria Nyanza, and is distinct from negroes, negroids, Hottentots, and Bushmen. On the Upper Congo there is also a dwarf race, who may possibly be degraded Bantus; they are hairy like the Bantus, and their language (about as much is known of it as of Pictish) resembles Bantu. The Bantu type becomes finer, almost Greek in physical perfection of form, as you penetrate further into the interior. The chief vice is the hideous cruelty of witch trials, in which the Ba Kongo almost rival the Puritan Fathers. Chastity is unknown, and jealousy by no means plays the part which Sir Henry Maine assigns to it in the development of the early human family. The rites with which Greece adored Dionysus, Hermes, and the Lampsacene, are most prevalent where morals are least licentious, and these rites are said to be "a solemn mystery to the Congo native." Connected with this are the initiatory ceremonies when boys enter on manhood. They are much the same as in Australia, America, and among savage races generally. Instead of warning people out of their way with the Bull-roarer, like the Australians, the Congo initiates make "a sort of drumming noise like dur-r-r-r." The initiates, as in Greece, are plastered over with white clay, a practice almost universal in mysteries. Had Lobeck known all that we know about the mysteries of savage peoples, he could greatly have strengthened his case as argued in Aglaophamus. Perhaps the Congo people throw light on another Greek problem. What was the language of the gods, so often mentioned by Homer, in which things have not the names given them in the speech of men? Can it have been a survival of a mystic, esoteric lingo which, on the Congo, as among the Eskimo and the early Irish, is employed by conjurers, priests, Angakuts, and Bretons? Mr. Johnston thus describes the spiritual speech on the Congo:—

> A curious part of these semi-religious rites is the acquiring of a sacred mysterious language, which is taught by the nganga, who presides over these ceremonies, to the disciples who are being circumcised and gathered into the confraternity. This language is never taught to females, and as yet no European has been able to examine its nature. I have heard men discoursing in it, as they do freely, and there were most of the Bantu prefixes and concords recognisable in their speech, though the actual words were unfamiliar. It might possibly be some older and more archaic form of Bantu language conserved for religious purposes—like the Sanskrit, the old Sclavonic, and the Latin—or it may be nothing more than an arbitrary transmogrification of words such as is found in the Mpongwe, or in such artificial dialects as the Ki-nyame of Zanzibar.

We may also compare the esoteric slang, once compulsory at Winchester, and the "secret speech" of little boys and girls in America. Children and boys naturally evolve the same queer freaks as savages. In addition to a "vague phallic worship," there is a good deal of moon-worship on the Congo, as among the Hottentots. There is a deity of small-pox, and, as in India, most diseases are supposed to be evil spirits. Among some tribes Mr. Johnston, like Dr. Schweinfurth, found scarcely any religion, but there was ancestor-worship, and to express their "shadowy idea of a god they always employ a term that is identical with heaven or sky," like Zeus and Varuna. A future life is believed in, or slaves would not be slaughtered at the graves of chiefs. Plates and knives buried with the dead are broken too, that they may die, and their spirit be released to accompany the departed. Unlike the Bongos, but like the Romans, the people of the Congo think dog's flesh a luxury. The mechanical arts are tolerably advanced, and the pottery not ungraceful. The lyre has only five strings.

Such are the people of the Congo, hesitating between higher savagery and lower barbarism. Their future is in the hands of European trade, and we have little doubt that they have seen their happiest days.

Mr. Johnston's drawings on the wood are very adequately engraved and useful; his etchings, we fear, it is impossible to praise. Many of his studies of heads, of flowers, of landscape, and of articles like native utensils are very spirited, and greatly add to the value of his excellent book.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

THIS is a reissue in a more popular, but less portable, form of a book which is at once too popular in style to suit the taste of the learned, and too learned to be widely studied, though it may have, and probably will have, in its present shape an extensive sale. It appears now as a somewhat cumbrous quarto, just the book for a school prize, with more than three hundred illustrations, some of them rather remotely pertinent to the subject, and all of them more remarkable for vigorous effect than for careful or artistic engraving. The mixed aim of the Archdeacon's work has had its effect on its performance. His chief object, he says, was to give a clear impression of St. Paul's teaching—i.e. of the inner heart of the man himself, and of the circumstances amid which he taught and wrote; and no one will question that he has chosen the best means of giving life and reality to the Epistles by incorporating them with the biography. They are thus read, so to speak, where and when they were written, with their local colouring fresh on them, and with such advantage as may be gained from the Canon's translation—a translation which aims almost solely at being easily understood. This we regard as far the best part of his work, and as it is incomparably the hardest part, and is not only relatively but absolutely well done, he may congratulate himself on success. It is much easier for one who like the writer has seen something of the East, and is widely read in its literature, to imagine the material surroundings of the Court at Cæsarea and the theatre at Ephesus than to transplant himself into the thick of the metaphysical and theological controversies which suggested or have left their marks on more than one of the Epistles of St. Paul. But, though this is the best part of the book, we fear it will be the least read—ordinary readers of Canon Farrar will know where to look for the "purpurei panni," and will get what they want. It is painful to find a book of really vast learning and of labour, such as hardly any one but the author would have undertaken in such a busy life as his, disfigured, we must say, by such almost slang phrases as "justices' justice," "their worships," "their Proctorships," used of the Duumviri at Philippi. It is a relief to turn from such a passage to the narrative of the shipwreck, related not with passion like the other, but with feeling both for the geographical and nautical questions involved in it, and for the simple greatness of the hero of the scene. Conybeare's and Howson's volumes on the same subject seemed, when they were written, to be exhaustive; but Canon Farrar has the unquestioned merit of supplying a deficiency in the former work by his treatment of the Epistles. The book, however, is not a mere supplement, but has an individuality of its own, and that in its most valuable portion; it is to be regretted that in other parts it exhibits sometimes too much of the least admirable tendency of the writer's mind.

The title of Mr. Bardsley's volume might suggest that it was another contribution to a kind of religious writing of which we have had too much lately—we mean speculation about the character and conditions of the life to come. Readers who order it under that impression will find themselves mistaken. The Veil is the veil of nature which half-conceals and half-discloses God, and the writer seems to think that he has some qualifications for penetrating it, as he quotes of himself the saying of William of Bamberg, "Surely he who rained on Solomon hath also condescended to shed some few drops on me." His readers must decide this point for themselves, but his congregation appear to have made up their minds about it, for they have asked their Vicar to publish various courses of sermons. It is impossible for a reviewer to approve or condemn such sermons as these; they may not please learned readers, hard-headed congregations, nor practical preachers, but if they are the kind of discourses Mr. Bardsley's congregation like, and find acceptance in the still wider circle of those who read such literature, there is no more to be said. Granting their aim and style, they are not badly done. The author has equipped himself with much information about the departments of nature in which he finds some of his "types" as may be culled from Wyville Thompson, Gosse, Maury, The Cruise of the Challenger, and other sources, and he shows signs of a breadth of reading on modern subjects of religious controversy which might well be imitated by more preachers. But we think he has not been sufficiently cautious in observing his own rule (laid down in his preface) and has sometimes strained his "types beyond the bounds of just and reasonable comparison." For instance, in the sermon on "Deep-sea Soundings," after giving the results of sounding and dredging, he says, "the depths of the sea afford a striking illustration of certain experiences of Christian life"; and here are the practical applications. The deepest sea is not unfathomable, so there are no depths of Christian trial which are not sooner or later proved to be fathomable. The deepest ocean teems with living organisms, so spiritual depression is quite consistent with the existence of spiritual life. "A shark can bear without inconvenience the pressure of half a ton on the square inch," so "God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that we are able." As we said before, we pass no opinion on this kind of treatment of nature and Scripture; if it has its admirers, that is perhaps reason enough for publishing it; we have done our duty in giving our readers an idea of the character and contents of this volume.

Mr. Wylie defends himself for adding another to the many volumes already existing on the subject of the Holy Land, by the plea that he has read all the literature on the subject. His book, we are bound to say, justifies his implied misgiving. It is the work of a close observer, of a profound believer in the literal accuracy of every statement of the Bible, and of one who has, as he says, read a good deal about the country before he went to it. And it is more than this—for it is evidently the product of a mind which can infer, combine, and generalize from what it sees, and of a heart in the deepest sympathy with the sacred scenes that lay thick along the author's route. But we cannot say more; it falls under a book's last worst curse of not having been wanted, and of adding nothing fresh to what we know before. Even the writer's staunch belief in Holy Scripture seems to have led him astray in matters of style, as when, in describing the scene of the battle of Gilboa, he gives a whole page of extract from the Books of Samuel, and in his apparent assumption generally that his readers are not well acquainted with the Old Testament. But the substance of his work, as well as its style, seem to us to be vitiated by what we must call a want of intelligent appreciation of the Book which he evidently loves so well, and believes so firmly. One of his objects is to show that it is quite possible to renew in Palestine its ancient fertility, and to restore the Jews to their own land, and he quotes Ezekiel to justify his hope; in fact, he says plainly that such a restoration would be a fulfilment of the prophecy in question. Surely this is a strange way of showing respect for Scripture. Ezekiel was the prophet of the Captivity; he prophesied the return from it, and the people to whom he prophesied did return. What ground is there in the Bible, in the teeth of many passages to the contrary, and of the whole tendency of Jewish circumstances and manners in our day, for believing that Ezekiel's prophecy was not fulfilled in the return, or that it will be fulfilled again? In one passage only do we detect the shadow of a shade of doubt in the author's mind, and that is when, in answer to an American clergyman who asked, as they were riding together down the valley of Ajalon, "Do you really believe that the sun stood still in this valley?" He "simply replied, 'The Bible says it,'" and "left his clerical friend to argue the point with the Bible." If we had not guessed the writer's nationality from his name, this "pawky" answer (we believe that is the word) would have revealed it.

Mr. Arnold's Isaiah of Jerusalem is, we believe, a reprint, more or less exact, of his translation of the first thirty-nine chapters of the Prophet, published some years ago, and of a recent article in the Nineteenth Century. The title of his book is sufficient indication as to the side he takes in the controversy about the deutero-Isaiah, and there is no need to go into the question further than to say that it is essential to the idea and plan of the present work to refer the last twenty-seven chapters, as well as certain passages mixed up with the first thirty-nine, to another hand. Mr. Arnold's theory has the merit of being complete and consistent. The book is divided into seven portions—namely, Prelude, Calamities for Judah, Vision, Immanuel, The Burdens, The Woe, Sennacherib; and the keynotes of the volume are the names Immanuel (God with us), Shearjashub (Remnant shall return, i.e. be converted to God), and Maher-shalal-hashbaz (Spoil speedeth, prey hasteth). The names, so translated, tell their own story. The corruption of nobles and clergy and the misery of the lower classes call aloud for punishment, and the great Northern power, Assyria, is speeding to the spoil and hasting to the prey; nevertheless, "God is with us," and a "Remnant" will remain faithful to Him or will return to His allegiance, and the foe shall not triumph nor the threatened ruin overwhelm. Isaiah's denunciation of woes had their partial fulfilment in the victory of Sargon, and his assurance of final escape in the destruction of Sennacherib's army. This was the culmination of his prophecy, as the period of it was the culminating point in his career as a statesman and a teacher. Sennacherib's ruinous failure was in 701 B.C., and was the real close of Isaiah's public life, which had covered the last half of the eighth century, though the prophet lived some time into the reign of Manasseh, and is said to have been murdered by him.

But quite as interesting a portion of Mr. Arnold's introduction to his own translation of the thirty-nine chapters is his plea for a translation which shall (1) preserve the rhythm and poetry of the original, (2) make quite clear the historical situation which Isaiah had to deal with, (3) so arrange the prophecies that we may have them in their right order and connexion. He submits this book as an attempt to comply with all three requisites, the introduction fulfilling Nos. (2) and (3) and his own translation No. (1). Few books in the Bible can put in a better plea for a careful and loving revision of their text than the Prophecy of Isaiah, both from its intrinsic grandeur and beauty and from the number of errors which have made it in places unintelligible. Whether he agrees or not with Mr. Arnold's conclusions, the reader will find a new meaning, a new beauty, and a new reality in the Prophet as he studies this careful and polished little volume, and he can hardly fail to sympathize with the writer's enthusiasm for his subject.

The Bishop of Bedford's long and varied experience as a clergyman gives him a right to publish a volume on Pastoral Work; and he has other qualifications for the task—a nature exceptionally sympathetic, an eager zeal for the good of men, and an infinite capacity for work, have not only widened but have deepened his experience. These high gifts, however necessary for the pastoral office, have their drawbacks as well as their advantages in a writer on the subject. They lift him so far above the average clergyman that they tend sometimes to discourage by an unattainable standard, by representing duties and states of feeling as ordinary, inevitable, and matters of course which to the commonplace curate or incumbent are Utopian, impossible, and hopeless. A good clergyman like the Bishop of Bedford cannot of course help writing as he does, and to read such a man's conceptions of duty must, as a whole, do good to less worthy and less gifted pastors; but the danger alluded to does lurk below, however much it may be outweighed by the good. The volume contains some practical suggestions which have the merit of freshness, and some practical hints about preaching, and, as they are given with the homely simplicity which is part of the charm of the Bishop's character, they are likely to stick in the memory. We refrain from giving extracts, because the book is short and cheap and worth buying. Old clergymen as well as young, especially the young, will find in it some things worth remembering, though they may find some with which they cannot wholly agree, and older men will perhaps find more which they knew before.

Professor Dickson has published his Baird Lectures for 1883, and we venture to presume that publication, as is the case with the Bampton Lectures, was a condition of their delivery, or he would hardly have run the risk of issuing a book so little likely to be sold or read as a learned treatise on such an obscure and difficult subject as he has selected. One of his motives for publishing appears to have been to make his hearers and readers acquainted with the monograph of Dr Wendt, of Gottingen, on which his own work is largely based, because it seemed to him, "from its special character, little likely to be translated." We fear that we must draw a similar inference with regard to the fate of his own book. He will not lack readers for any want of exhaustiveness, erudition, argumentative skill, or clearness of statement. However little it may be possible to agree with him, it is satisfactory to find a writer laying down his line of argument so clearly at the outset as to say that in every instance of his use of the terms "Flesh" and "Spirit" St. Paul had only one meaning. Readers of Professor Jowett's thoughtful excursus on the same subject will readily understand how soon he comes into conflict with Dr. Dickson, and will be prepared for the difficulties of an exegesis which starts on such a rigid hypothesis. After revising the principal German theories, and selecting hints and passages enough to make his own work, as he calls it, a "mosaic," he lays down the canon of interpretation given above, and proceeds to consider the Old Testament use of the terms, and is then landed in the thick of his argument by comparing and contrasting the usages of the word πνεῦμα as applied to God and man. The discussion becomes more complex as it advances. Not only is the precise meaning of the word to be ascertained in each verse, but the relation to it of such other words as σαρξ, ψυχὴ and νοῦς, sometimes apparently used instead of it; and there is the ever-present difficulty of the genitive case, whether it means "of" or "from" or neither, but is objective, and in no sense progressive. The possibility of endless uncertainty about the meaning of such words is suggested by remembering our Lord's use of ψυχὴ in such a passage as St. Matt. x. 28, and St. Paul's use of ψυχικὸν as the antithesis of πνευματικὸν, 1 Cor. xv. 45. But a better notion of the variety of result attained by this treatise, and the number of threads to be unravelled and tracked in arriving at it, will be gained by studying the Conspectus, p. 425, which we advise the reader to master before and not after he reads this book. Though it is one which will not attract many readers, there is much in it which will repay study.

An account of a religion professed by 400 millions of the human race may well claim a place among books of divinity, and Bishop Titcomb's little manual on Buddhism supplies a want without aiming at the completeness of the longer treatises on the subject; it gives in a clear form the main points of likeness and contrast between the religions of the East and West, and while glancing through the volume it is impossible not to be struck by both. Closer inspection reveals that the similarities are, as a rule, superficial, the contrasts essential and deep-rooted. The monastic and sacrificial systems; the duty of fasting; the equality of men in religion; the elevation of women; celibacy; ritual; ordination, remind the reader of some of the elements and some of the excrescences of Christianity; while the impersonality of God, the reservation of Nirvana for the elite alone, the practical unbelief of Buddhists in prayer and in the eternity of sentient life, and their pessimism, are negations of the vital forces of the Western creed. On the other hand, Buddhism is honourably distinguished by a pure morality, a refined philosophic system, a catholic benevolence and toleration—that is, when seen at its best, for it has suffered more than Christianity from the process of "accommodation," and Guzerat, Thibet, Nepal, and China have associated or degraded it with metaphysics, or rationalism, or "praying-wheels" If Christianity has also assimilated itself to its surroundings, it has been more by the attempt to raise them to its own level than by deliberate adoption of a lower standard. If it has been able to keep abreast of the progress and civilization of the West, it is because of its differences, and not from its points of resemblance, to the great religion of the East. If it has maintained its ground as the creed of men who guide and rule and move the world, it is because it contains within itself the innate capacity for development which springs from a belief in a personal God, from hope for the human race, and from faith in an endless life—its crucial instances of antagonism to the older creed. All these harmonies and contrasts are clearly brought out by Bishop Titcomb, somewhat coloured, of course, by his faith and his office, but set down in no spirit of unfairness, nor with any want of sympathy with the religion of the millions of human beings by whom he is surrounded.

MODERN HORSEMANSHIP.*

IT must in the first place be freely granted that Mr. Anderson is a master of his subject, a practical and a very accomplished horseman. The fact is obvious from his book, and it has been otherwise demonstrated. A few months ago Mr. Anderson brought to London a very ill-shaped horse, which he exhibited, to a few gentlemen who are known to be interested in horsemanship, as an example of the system. The Duke of Beaufort, whose qualifications as a judge of the horse and his rider will not be doubted, was of the company. It happened that a representative of the Times and of an illustrated sporting journal were among the spectators, as was the present writer; and it must be admitted that, on a horse which was understood to have been purposely chosen for its lack of quality and apparent clumsiness—the absence in make and shape of what the school trainer usually regards as essential—a very remarkable exhibition was given. An account of the affair was published in the Times and in one or two other journals. Those who saw Mr. Anderson ride were astonished at the docility and apparent intelligence shown by the horse in the hands of his master; but when the accomplished rider publishes a book with the object of propagating his system, it is necessary to pause and consider whither he would lead us. It often happens that a man is mounted by a friend for a casual ride or for a day's hunting. "How did he carry you?" is the owner's question—except, of course, when the animal appears mud-stained, by himself, and the ex-rider arrives later. "Charmingly!" is the common reply. "He is a perfect hack," or hunter, as the case may be. The friend has known next to nothing of the horse; but, if he be a horseman, he has found that the animal was obedient to a light hand on the reins, ready to take a hint, bold but discreet, and that, happy in a perfect understanding of each other, he and his mount have got on admirably. The rider has never heard, or has barely heard, of the piaffer, the croupade, and other school movements, the horse has still less idea that any of his race are given to such extravagances, nothing of which comes within the scope of an ordinary horse's instruction. What, then, has Mr. Anderson to say on behalf of the laborious exercises which he so earnestly recommends, as, it may be added, so many riders and writers have advocated them before him for hundreds of years past? No doubt it is pleasant to see the perfect unanimity which exists between such a rider as Mr. Anderson and his horse, to notice how, with scarcely a motion of the reins, the animal is shown what to do, and to observe the readiness with which he does it. The reins, in fact, according to the author, only form one of the "aids" by which the horse is governed. These direct the forehand. The spurs—always "aids," and never to be regarded as instruments of punishment—direct the hind-quarters. "Each extremity of the horse must be prepared, by the aid that governs it, for every movement of the other; and the force of the forehand and of the hind-quarters must be so collected that they will act together." So says the author. But, all question of aids apart, supposing indeed that the rider does not even wear the spurs here described as being only of secondary importance to the reins, will it not be found that, in the average hack, or in the hack that is something above the average, though he has not been "schooled" as men not connected with training will understand the schooling of horses, the hind-quarters do act with the forehand? This may not be the case to the extent demanded by school riding, but is it not so to all other intents and purposes? One might not be able to make the horse perform the "bolotade" by the reins alone, without the other aids; but is a knowledge of the "bolotade" or the "capriole" (the most vigorous of all school movements, being like a high "bolotade," with the kick from both hind legs delivered with full force) necessary to the man who holds his own in a fast forty minutes over the pastures of High Leicestershire, which is perhaps as good a test of horsemanship as can well be required?

It must by no means be understood that Mr. Anderson's book is being derided. Jumping exercises are part of his scheme; and the man who invites caprioles, and sits them critically, is not to be deterred by those fences which are abhorrent to men who, like many followers of foxhounds, hate jumping. There is much in this not very happily named book—for Modern Horsemanship describes an ancient system, with new features, which the author hopes to modernize—worthy of much approval, though at the same time there are some things which suggest a question; and a few rules are so obvious that they might well have been omitted altogether. Of the latter is the direction that, "When a horse rears, the rider should lean forward; but the body should be carried back when the horse kicks or stumbles. If these instructions are borne in mind," the author continues, "the rider will in time bend the body with the motion of the horse without being aware of any mental effort." Quite so. But when a horse stumbles there is rarely time for mental effort, and when he rears, if what may be called the instinct of horsemanship has not momentarily thrown the rider forward, reflection as to what, according to the best authorities, he should do under the circumstances is apt to come to him too late. It is more to the purpose of riding when Mr. Anderson reminds readers that "the rider's aim should be to see with what light touches upon the reins he can control the horse," and his remarks about bitting are also shrewd. The snaffle he describes as "an excellent bit for a bad rider, because with it he can do but little harm." The fact might here have been emphasized that sometimes the very easiest of bits will suffice to hold a horse which goes unkindly in a bit that is only moderately severe. In a famous South-country stable, a well-known racehorse, that is not to be held by any of the complex devices which have been invented with the object of stopping horses, can be comfortably ridden in a bit made simply of a piece of leather rolled round and sewn. On the vexed question of lifting horses at their jumps, the author, if we understand him aright, expresses an opinion which is open to argument. "To raise a horse at a jump is a delicate operation," he says, "and the beginner should not attempt it. If the horse be a willing jumper, the play of the bit made to collect its forces will be all that is required, and all that the beginner should attempt. But a horse can be raised to a leap just as it can be raised to perform a pesade or any of the high airs of the manige. By an unskilful horseman the animal may be pulled into the obstacle; but that does not prove that the bit has no lifting power." One must differ with caution from such an approved good horseman as the author, but that the bit has any real lifting power must be doubted. It gives the horse the hint to lift himself; that it does more than aid him to collect his forces when the rider steadies him as he approaches a fence we are not ready to believe. Nor is Mr. Anderson quite explicit enough in his rules for the treatment of a shying horse. He says, "The rider may induce the horse to pass a stationary object by turning its head away from that which causes it terror and 'traversing' by." This, however, depends upon circumstances. It may be judicious to convince the horse that there is nothing to alarm him in the object from which he has started, and this must be done, not by turning his head away, but by coaxing him to approach it.

But these are everyday affairs, and the principal object Mr. Anderson has in view is to popularize school riding. He maintains that great and unmistakable benefits are to be derived from it, and > the advantage of a good method of training over a crude and improper one may be seen by comparing the carriage, action, and temper of a well-schooled horse with an animal that has been "broken" in the usual manner. The schooled horse, carrying itself in a light and graceful manner, at easy, regular, and controlled paces, will render immediate obedience to every command of its rider. The horse that has not been systematically schooled learns in time to carry its burden more or less awkwardly, depending upon its natural form and balance, in paces which hardly ever equal in grace and smoothness those in which it moved in liberty. If an animal consents to move along in a shambling walk, a disunited trot, and a lumbering gallop, hanging back from the bit or bearing upon the hand, it is as far advanced in its education as the majority of horses ever got.

We do not say that Mr. Anderson over-estimates the perfections of the schooled horse, but does he not somewhat underestimate the capacity of the horse that has been "broken in the usual manner"? Many horses that have never been schooled certainly move, nevertheless, with lightness and grace, and cannot be properly described as having a shambling walk, or a lumbering gallop; nor do they hang back from the bit or bear on the hand. At the same time, there can be no doubt that a horse's good qualities are likely to be very greatly enhanced by some schooling (the word is, it need hardly be said, used always in the sense signified by Mr. Anderson, and not as the trainer of steeplechasers would understand it). The author certainly makes a point, too, when he dwells on the fact that with the schooled horse compliance becomes a fixed habit, and the animal is "rendered ready and willing to give prompt obedience to every demand of its master." The author is of opinion—though, with the sterling honesty that is a pleasant feature in the book, he will advance nothing positively of which he has not strong reason to be convinced—that schooling, which has a tendency to strengthen and make pliant joints and muscles, would add to a horse's speed. What he means by schooling he proceeds in the second half of the book to describe in detail, illustrating his descriptions with instantaneous photographs. These are remarkably well done; indeed, considering the circumstances under which they must necessarily have been taken, most of them are wonderfully clear. We have here the "piaffer," the "Spanish trot," the "demi-volte in gallop," the "low pirouette," and other movements; but who wants to accomplish these equestrian feats? They do not come within the scope of amateur horsemanship, and for the ordinary rider we cannot but think that they are a waste of time, more especially as the ordinary rider would probably perform these "high airs" very badly. That a horse is made light in hand by the exercises here shown of suppling the neck and bending the head is readily comprehensible, and some schooling, to the extent, for instance, of making a horse change his lead in the gallop, is also a desirable grace of equestrianism. As for the more intricate matters, it was perhaps well that Mr. Anderson should show what can be done, but he is not sufficiently plain as to the extent to which he would have his pupils follow him. On the whole we are well inclined to go some way with our author as to the good which would arise from the higher schooling of horses; only he shows a disposition, we think, to demand too much. A little schooling is not, like a little learning, a dangerous thing; on the contrary, as is candidly confessed, "a horse may be so highly trained that no one but a rider of the firmest seat and lightest hand can manage it." A rider not thus gifted who suddenly and unwittingly gave the highly-trained horse the signal for the "capriole" would be in an awkward position.

BIBLIOGRAPHY AND PRETTY BOOKS.*

HERE are seven books together, and six of them are printed on hand-made paper and published with rough edges, while The Home Library is designed to point out the beauty and value of such trifles, and, without disparaging the insides of books, to make us think as much as possible of the outsides. There were book-fanciers before the Beckford Sale, nay, for that matter, before the Roxburghe Sale; but it cannot be said that until now it was likely to add to the popularity of a book that it should have qualifications calculated to attract the book-hunter. We are conscious of a growth of taste in such matters. For one person who twenty, or even ten, years ago cared for uncut leaves and old-faced type, there are now hundreds, perhaps thousands. The New World, too, with its wealth, is in the markets of the Old; and books made up to please the eye cannot easily be pirated. Mr. "Penn," as he calls himself, thus sets out the maxims on which American book-buyers act:—

> Never buy at auction unless you have had an opportunity previously to examine the goods, to see that they have no defects and are in every way in good condition. Remember that the highest priced books are not necessarily the best, or the lowest priced necessarily the cheapest. Choose good type, and good paper, and good ink, even if they cost a little more; it is false economy to spare the pocket and spoil the eyes. A book that is worth buying at all is worth buying in good condition and in a good edition.

With such principles, and an American purse, hundreds of fine libraries are being accumulated, and we of the Old World see the treasures of ages disappearing from our view. It is not, however, a matter for regret. The supply is practically inexhaustible. As fast as one class of books becomes unattainable, another is sought after. Few of us can hope for Mazarine Bibles, Tyndale Testaments, or Valdarfer Boccaccios; but there are many other objects to which we may turn. A few years ago Italian books with woodcuts began to "look up." Next came Early German art. There was a long run upon English Service-books and English Bibles. French vignettes were in the ascendent for a while. Now, perhaps, Bewick and his pupils are the objects of most interest here. In short, there is always something to be collected; and when the prices of one branch of literature have gone up, they somehow never come down again. A few years ago a very handsome Bewick volume might have been thought dear at double the subscription price of a guinea and a half. Now the same volume fetches perhaps twenty pounds. It would be but too easy to multiply examples of this kind; but at present we are occupied rather with new works than with old. One is tempted to inquire if any of these pretty books will live, and in its turn become scarce and valuable on that account. There are many examples in contemporary literature. A copy of the first edition of John Inglesant is already at a premium. Mr. Ruskin's early works and Mr. Hamerton's great book on etching are enormously costly. It would be rash to predict such a distinction for all the books before us; but, unless a very large edition has been printed, we might, with some security, prophesy it of Mr. Warburton's Sonnets. It is a small quarto, issued in whole calf binding, uncut, but with the top edge gilt. It is printed on hand-made paper. Opposite every leaf of letterpress is a woodcut view from a drawing by Mr. Boot, printed on smooth paper. The cuts represent all kinds of places, waterfalls, lakes, castles, the Bay of Naples, and the Simplon Pass; but the prettiest perhaps illustrates the sonnet called "Home":—

> Though mist and darkness wrap our northern grove,
> No nightingale to charm the listening ear,
> Nor vine clad hills, nor cloudless moons above,
> For such I sigh not; this dark atmosphere
> Home gilds and gladdens with the light of love;
> There brighter skies, but fonder hearts are here.

The picture represents a brook with a rustic bridge and tall elms on either hand; in the background, engraved with the utmost delicacy and minuteness, is a stately English mansion, with a tower and bay windows and Elizabethan gables. It would be but too easy to linger over this fascinating book. The poetry, though not of a very soaring character, is poetry, not merely verse. Here is a touching allusion to the blindness and bereavement of the venerable poet's later life:—

> No rising sunbeam cheers me with its ray,
> 'Tis as though light had never created been,
> As though this world and all that is therein,
> Still without form and void, in darkness lay.
> One from my side has passed unseen away,
> Snatched from this world of darkness and of sin;
> My prayer, my hope that I may likewise win
> And share with her the light of endless day.

Most of the sonnets have the same undercurrent of religious feeling, and all are equally simple and sweet.

Next in neatness and finish we must notice The Marriage Ring, edited by Dr. Kerr for Messrs Field & Tuer, as a beautiful example of this modern movement. It is bound in boards of delicate dove colour, on which the title appears in red and a gold ring below it. Nothing can be simpler or in better taste. The printing and paper are equally good, and the book is small and light. In these respects it is superior to Mr. Coutts's edition, which is much too large. He has, however, a different purpose in view, as is apparent when we find that, of the 104 pages of which the book consists, 42 are taken up with a dissertation by way of appendix on the "Ethics of Love," and 19 with an article on the "Song of Solomon," by Miss Ellice Hopkins, reprinted from the Century Magazine. Both these additions are very readable and interesting, and the notes at the end should prove useful. Strange to say, Mr. Coutts says nothing about Bishop Taylor's connexion with the family of the last Earl of Carbery. Dr. Kerr mentions it, and points out that the volume in which the sermon on marriage appeared was dedicated to the Earl, and was published at the special desire of Lady Carbery. Neither editor mentions a point of some interest—namely, that Francis, Lord Vaughan, the eldest son of Lord Carbery, was the husband of Lady Rachel Wriothesley, who after his death married the ill-fated William, Lord Russell, beheaded in 1683. This very sermon may well have been preached at her first wedding.

Mr. Elliot Stock's reprint of the Religio Medici is bound in oak boards very tastefully stamped with a design in relief. The printing is perhaps more rough than it need be, and we cannot help thinking that the art of the "facsimilist" may be carried too far. Still, it is interesting to see Sir Thomas Browne's immortal essay as it first appeared. "There were," says Dr. Greenhill, the editor, "several MS. copies of the work, one of which found its way into the hands of a bookseller, who printed and published it in 1642, without the consent or knowledge of the author,' who was compelled to issue a second or authorized edition. Mr. Stock has reprinted the pirated version, both because it is the real first, and because it has not been used for later editions, but also because it displays some "personal traits of character" which do not occur in the authorized edition. There were, in fact, two unauthorized editions, both printed by the same bookseller in the same year, which is strong testimony to the immediate popularity of the book. The preface points out some interesting variations between this edition and that authorized by Browne himself. Thus in one place he observes that "I shall injure Truth to say I have no taint or tincture" of heresies, schisms, and errors. In the authorized edition, which presumably, if the manuscript was written in 1635, represents his later and more matured opinion, he expressed himself somewhat differently, and "hoped he should not injure Truth in saying he had no longer any such taint or tincture on him." Dr. Greenhill gives a list of all the alterations, and shows how justly Sir Thomas Browne complained that the book was published not only without his knowledge and consent, but also in a "depraved" and "imperfect" form. The most curious of the "depravations" is at p. 55, where he is made to say that Ptolemy thought the "Alcoran" of the Turks "an ill-composed piece."

The fourth volume of the Bibliographer shows no sign of flagging. It contains articles of interest to a circle of readers far outside that of the bookworm. A series of epitaphs on printers and booksellers is full of curious notes. Unlike some collections of the kind, chapter and verse, or rather place and date, are given for each quotation. The following example may be selected. In the parish church of St. Mary, Bury St. Edmunds, lie the remains of Peter Gedge, the printer and proprietor of a local newspaper. He died in 1818, not a period very remarkable for well-expressed epitaphs. But Peter Gedge's ends thus:—"Like a worn-out type, he is returned to the founder, in the hope of being re-cast in a better and more perfect mould." A series of articles on the "Genevan Bible" is continued and concluded by Mr. Nicholas Pocock; a list of booksellers' signs in London is contributed by Mr. Goodwin, and there are articles on Chambers's Journal, on Sir Richard Phillips, on "Sham Titles for Books," on the Librarian's meeting at Liverpool, and the Beckford and other great sales. One of the most curious papers relates to an extraordinary American production, "The Rest of Don Juan." It seems that in 1825 Isaac Star Clason published at New York the "Seventeenth and Eighteenth Cantos of Don Juan," and that in 1846 "The Rest of Don Juan" appeared at New York. It was by Henry Morford, a poet almost unknown even in his own country. Even Allibone does not mention him. In another verse he prophesies his own early death, but Mr. Ashbee in the article before us seems unable to say what was Morford's real fate. On the whole, we may safely recommend the Bibliographer to unbibliographical readers as containing much amusing matter; while to the collector, fired with the new spirit of the age, it is simply indispensable.

A very pretty book is The Battle-Ground of the Eights, which contains a series of etchings of the Thames and Isis, drawn by Mr. Robert Farren, and issued just in time for the boat-race. Some of the pictures are very superior to the others; the best being, perhaps, that of a very familiar, not to say hackneyed, subject, Hiley Mill. In one and all Mr. Farren breaks down in the sky. In the view of Grassy the sky appears to be actually falling. It is raining iron railings, which is the more to be regretted as the landscape part of the work is among the most pleasing. Mr. Farren should study Rembrandt and Mr. Haden. As we look back in conclusion over the seven volumes here noticed, the general excellence of material, the neatness and correctness of the printing, and the good taste manifested in the production of popular books at the present day, is a hopeful sign. Even wood engraving, which for awhile seemed asleep or dead, appears to be reviving.

NATIVE LIFE IN TRAVANCORE.*

THOUGH not written with any such purpose, this work comes opportunely to remind us that "nationalities" in India are something very different from what political clubs and fluent English speakers represent them to be. In late acrimonious discussions we have heard of a certain marvellous ethnological unit, termed "the Indian people,' which is credited with all sorts of yearnings after independence and self-government, and has been somehow gradually fused and welded out of rather discordant elements into one compact mass. A glance at the chapters on caste in this volume shows that not only have the higher classes in Southern India no sort of intercourse or connexion with their corresponding divisions of society in the central and northern parts of the Empire; but that there are still numbers of inferior castes which, in the author's expressive language, form "a piecemeal and patchwork distribution of mankind of the most singularly complicated pattern." We hear of "degraded," "defective," "intermediate," and "accursed" castes. Some are "delighters in sin", others are slaves or hunters. None of them intermarry. Some speak a dialect neither Tamil nor Malayalim; and in many the only resembling features are repulsive filth, dense ignorance, and fear or hatred of those above them who wear the sacred cord or belong to the Lunar race. To form a correct idea of the barriers which still divide society both in our own territories and in native States, we ought to picture to ourselves a sort of England in which Saxon, Dane, and Norman had never intermarried or amalgamated in the smallest degree to this hour; in which aboriginal Britons still dwelt on Salisbury Plain and stealthily offered human sacrifices at Stonehenge, while Picts of pure origin were found on the moors of Sutherlandshire, and undiluted Norwegians in the Shetland Isles. We might then be able to judge whether it could be correct to talk of the "Indian people"; and, further, in order to be fair to the Mahommedan population in India in such a comparison, we should have to imagine that a large number of foreigners of the Latin or Celtic race had once conquered all England about the year 1500, had held sway for some few centuries, had then been deprived of their sovereignty, and were now living scattered about our various counties, ready, if occasion offered, to burn down parish churches, to fly at the throats of Norman and Dane, and to make one more throw for empire.

Of course Mr. Mateer never puts forward a moral or political axiom of the above kind. But he has compiled an interesting work out of ample materials collected in a quarter of a century of missionary labour. Gentlemen of his profession are somewhat apt to view the native world from the pulpit or from the preacher's standpoint, under the shade of the magnificent banyan-tree as it is absurdly called, and to consider the multitudes of a humming bazaar merely as likely or unlikely converts. But it is one merit of this book that it is not one long sermon on the evils of caste, the degrading effects of Brahmanical supremacy, or other stock subject. Here and there we have a chapter or two on the humanising effects of religious education, and in one in particular we have the results of mission work, with its gradual increase of converts and communicants; but, while there are some remarks which could only proceed from a missionary, there is much that an administrator or statesman may read with profit; and every page attests a knowledge of the native languages, a familiarity with agriculture, manufactures, native modes of thought, and an interest in the advancement of the population, such as we are accustomed to look for in those reports of district officers to whom Mr. Hunter stands indebted for much of his statistical volumes. For be it remembered that Travancore is still under the government of its own Raja, and internally independent. During the wars of Hyder and Tippoo the Raja was our faithful ally. His relations with the British Government were settled by a treaty in 1795, which has practically remained unaltered to our day. The country is believed to be nearly seven thousand square miles in extent, and the revenue to be about half a million of our money. Of the royal family and its peculiar succession according to the Nair custom, from the sovereign to his brothers and then to his sister's sons, Mr. Mateer has something to tell us; but the greater portion of his work is taken up with castes, and the habits and social peculiarities of the masses. The opening chapter is a good specimen of descriptive power. There is no cold season in Travancore. The tropical rains clothe the country with perpetual verdure; there are no hot winds; and in a small compass we have sea-coast and mountain ranges, rivers and lakes, rice-fields and groves of cocoa-nuts, primæval forests and spaces cut out of the jungle and converted into coffee estates. One very peculiar feature of the principality is the series of lagoons or backwaters which begin somewhere to the north of Cochin, and, passing by Alappura and Quilon, reaches as far south as Trevandrum, the capital. Generally a narrow strip of land, as in the case of the Chilka lake in Orissa, separates these natural waterways from the sea; and during the S.W. monsoon we should say that a journey in an unwieldy but comfortable boat is not unattended with danger. But in calm weather this sort of journey, though tedious, is pleasant enough. It is far superior to the palanquin or the bullock cart, as the traveller takes books, stores, and household servants with him, and arrives at his destination as little fatigued as is possible by any mode of travelling where the atmosphere resembles a conservatory. Here and there the lagoons are little inland seas; and the shoals of fish, the flocks of waders and parakeets, the diversities of native craft, the well-supplied bazaars, the ruined forts and the new public offices, make up a picture not exactly to be met with in any other part of India, not even in the central or eastern parts of the Bengal Province. Agriculture in the plains seems very much on a par with that of other localities. The great staples are rice, cocoanut, and the ordinary vegetables. Mr. Mateer talks about the exhaustion of the soil, but admits that in rice lands rotation of crops is impossible. Half a million of acres are devoted to this one crop, and we are glad to hear of an increase in the purchasing and consuming power of the lower castes, who now eat more rice, with fruit or vegetables and other grains. Cocoanut plantations are remunerative, and there is a flourishing export of dried kernels, oil, and coir. But the new industry is coffee. A beginning was made by the late General Cullen when Resident, in 1854, and in the last twenty years the enterprise has been promoted by Christian converts and Ceylon and Scotch planters. An elevation of some 3,000 feet seems best fitted for this experiment; and the returns in one or two places favoured by rich soil washed down into a basin from the surrounding hills, was almost incredible, being at the rate of a ton per acre. This was exceptional, other planters being very fortunate if they could secure three to five hundredweight on the same area; and very soon the leaf disease began to make its appearance. This visitation took the form of patches of fungus, brown or orange in colour; the berries were empty or light in weight; and these sources of failure and ruin were aggravated by the selection of wrong sites, bad management, and a tropical rainfall. The land was soon exhausted, and the cost of cultivation on the highest estates was estimated at more than one hundred rupees per acre. The roots of the plants were next attacked, and though enterprising men have attempted to make up for losses in coffee by introducing tea and the chinchona, there is quite enough to induce caution on the part of intending purchasers. The satisfactory feature in the case is, that Englishmen have been enabled to spend their money, without special legislation, in a native State. But it would be rash to conclude that many States in India can, in point of enlightened administration and equitable treatment of foreigners, compete with Travancore. Nor was the condition of the masses better here than elsewhere till the appearance of Sir Madhava Rao. In the eighteenth century the Raja of Travancore was a personage of but slightly more importance than some half a dozen others who cut up the state into little principalities. The Brahmans as priests, and the Nairs with their military tenures, had despotic sway over the agricultural castes. Practically the ruling races paid no taxes, like the French aristocracy before 1792. Mahommedan landholders had to pay a succession duty of twenty-five per cent. Bribery and peculation were the milder forms of misgovernment, the more flagrant being impalement and mutilation for such offences as cow-killing and simple theft. Disabilities in a country of exemptions, privileges, and "anomalous distinctions," press with very little weight on the mass of the community. But some of the degraded castes were not allowed to use the highways, and others could not come within a certain distance of a Nair without danger to his life. Such classes, for purposes of easy recognition, were compelled to go uncovered to the waist. Only kings and nobles might build mansions, and on certain public occasions none but Brahmans might carry umbrellas. Slavery, which had its origin in wars, reprisals, and famines, existed till within the last twenty years; and emancipation was at first successfully impeded by the slave-owners, who spread all kinds of absurd reports and prevented slaves from registering themselves as owners of small reclaimed plots. To this day many remain unaware of their own legal position; and we hear of whole bodies of men who are debarred the use of public ferry-boats and markets, who cannot enter a shop to make a purchase but have to shout outside for what they want, and who may not approach within a certain number of feet of a man of high caste. It is one of the happy results of sound missionary work that the new generation of Pulayars, Kuravars, and Vedars, who probably represent the aborigines, are growing up more cleanly in their habits, less influenced by silly rumours, less given to degrading vices, and more sensible of their duties and rights. Many of the questions arising out of this altered state of things are just touched upon by Mr. Mateer; higher education; the separation of Christians from others in schools; and what he truly designates as the obstructive power of uneducated women. We are glad to see that he does not countenance the notion that women are powerless. In the precincts of the Zenana they are in reality no more slaves than the British matron at the head of her household. True, a Brahmani waits on her husband at meals and eats what he has left; but the female character asserts itself in the East as in the West without open opposition, and we have heard natives of education and ability admit that for domestic tyranny there was no one to compare with the Ma Thakurâni, or aged mother of Brahmans and Rajas and others. They offer "an irresistible and passive opposition in the limits of their own domain" to anything which they do not approve.

One interesting chapter sums up all the arguments for the retention or abolition of the kudumi or topknot of hair, in the case of converts. Is it a badge of superstition and Hinduism, or is it a mere national custom and a pardonable prejudice? If the latter, it might be winked at. If the former, it is, says the preacher, esse revidendum, lest the pars sincera of conversion should be corrupted. Opinions seem to differ even amongst clerical authorities, and so high a personage as Bishop Caldwell regards it as "a national fashion and a mark of civilization, refinement, and adornment." The Church Missionary Society and that for the Propagation of the Gospel tolerate the kudumi. But there is rather a consensus of opinion amongst other missionaries against it as idolatrous. To cut it off is a test of sincerity and a proof of the earnestness of the convert.

It speaks well for pure native administration that in spite of reports and panics, which left old men and children to till the ground and reap the harvest, like Arretium in Macaulay's Lays, a census was taken of the population of Travancore in 1871, and again in 1881. Native Christians of various denominations, including Roman Catholics and Syrians, numbered nearly half a million. Advocates of progress can study the chapters which show the very raw material out of which converts have been made. Some of the Pulayars worship the sun, moon, and stars. The dress of the women is long grass and a few beads. Some eat beef and file their front teeth. Drinking and chewing tobacco are common customs. Polygamy here, as elsewhere, depends on the ability to feed more than one wife at a time, and a man may have four wives. A belief in demons and ghosts leads naturally to charms, incantations, and barbarous music. There is a curious sketch of an instrument called a kokkara, a kind of iron plate with serrated edges, out of which a pin or spike of the same metal produces a discord which must be truly diabolical, and sufficient to drive any hysterical or weak patient, possessed by a demon, into a confession of any number of sins and payment of fines, taken out at once by the relatives in drink. The Pulayars and Shanars occupy the plains. The hill tribes cultivate patches of forest by the wasteful and reckless process of burning down the timber and moving elsewhere after two or three years' cultivation of one plot. This process in other Presidencies is known as joom. One tribe, whom Mr. Mateer calls Mala Arayans, build huts in the forks of trees; but, we gather, more for the purpose of watching their crops and driving away wild beasts than for regular residences. The repulsive custom of polyandry prevails with some of the hillmen, with its usual consequence—a diminution of the population. But the diversities of these castes, with perplexing questions as to their origin and affinities, are too minute for detailed analysis. We have only to add that the narrative is enlivened by some very fair sketches of men and women and rustic scenes, and that, though there is no index, native terms in five or six different dialects are explained in a glossary, and any one musically inclined might find some amusement in attempting to sing or play some eleven Tamil tunes if he could only make out the notes, which, we must admit, is quite beyond our power.

PARROTS IN CAPTIVITY.*

IT is no new thing for human beings to train for their amusement the brilliant shrieking birds that form the family of the Psittacidæ. We all know the parrot that Horace has immortalized. Martial seems to have kept a bird of the same kind as a stimulus to his loyalty, or at least he pretends to have done so:—

> Psittacus, a vobis aliorum nomina discam;
> Hoc didici per me dicere: Cæsar, ave!

But it is from Apuleius that we learn the particulars of Roman parrot-taming. In his book of odds and ends, the Florida, he discourses at some length on the nature and habits of parrots. He accounts for their powers of speech by supposing that they have the larynx and the palate broader than other birds, and he says that they can easily be trained to speak so distinctly that it is difficult to believe that it is not a man that is talking. It would have been a treat to hear a Roman parrot say "Quid est?" or "Tolle calices!" These are, doubtless, among the joys reserved for Mrs. Blimber when she succeeds in obtaining that long-desired invitation to stay with Cicero in his Tusculan villa. The parrots of antiquity, however, seem to have been even more insolent than their modern descendants. Apuleius says that, if once a parrot is taught to say naughty words, convicia, it will repeat them night and day, and make a song of them, and string them together in a sort of verses. This seems to surpass in devilry anything recorded of the present races of Psittacidæ, and we cannot but hope that the learned writer exaggerated. He goes on to say that the only way for a decent person to act towards such a bird is to cut out its tongue, or else to banish it into its woods, in silvas suas. Of course, if once the latter practice became usual, we can understand that the language of captive Roman parrots would be studiously offensive.

We are, however, doing Mr. Greene an injustice in prefacing an account of his book with a repetition of what the ancients have ignorantly said about parrots. He is exclusively concerned with the actualities of latter-day birds, and inspired by the belief that he has a mission to mankind on their behalf. He thinks that parrots have been grossly misunderstood, and as he is a great lover of this class of winged people, he has come forward in their defence. What he says on this subject is well worthy of the attention of fanciers. His great attack is directed against the practice of depriving parrots of water altogether. It seems that even at the Zoological Gardens some of the poor birds are entirely denied water upon every occasion, and Mr. Greene attributes to this fact the rapid mortality among parrots at Regent's Park. As there is to our knowledge one reverend parrot there whose ticket bears the date 1831 as that of his introduction to the Gardens, we must say of the deprivation of water what the old gentleman said of the use of coffee, that it evidently is not fatal in every case. Mr. Greene, however, brings strong evidence forward to prove that milk is no sort of equivalent for water, and that quantities of soaked bread are no better. His theories are evidently formed upon experience, and they are well worthy of attention, even when the peculiar way in which they are put before us is not the most lucid possible. We must hasten to confess that Mr. Greene does not wield a very elegant pen. Such a sentence as the following leaves something to be desired on the score of perspicuity:—

> It stands to reason that a Parrot, especially a young one, taken suddenly away from the crowded cage in the dealer's shop, where the warmth and society of its companions, and often their friendly mouthfuls of food thrust generously into its own, will take cold and mope and pine when placed in a cage, and too often a draught, by itself.

The meaning here is perfectly plain and very praiseworthy, but the style, it will be admitted, is extraordinary.

Mr. Greene covers a certain amount of ground in a desultory way in this volume, but gives us no indication of a guiding plan. He seems to begin with a consideration of Goffin's Cockatoo (Psittacus Goffini), simply because he has a strong personal love and admiration for the Goffin. The portrait of this stately creature forms the frontispiece of the volume. He is a very plump bird, of mild expression, and bearing a singular resemblance to Samuel Taylor Coleridge in old age. He is perfectly white, with a touch of salmon-colour in the crest and of saffron in the tail. Mr. Greene speaks of him with great affection, and he flatters himself, he says, that every one who reads what he has to tell about him will sooner or later purchase a specimen. We are not quite sure about this as regards ourselves. His fondest admirer speaks of the Goffin as "an inveterate and earpiercing screamer," and we are afraid that this statement goes a long way to reduce the enthusiasm which we feel for his lovable and teachable qualities, and even for his marvellous power of reproducing "the whimpering of an infant." He is, moreover, so clamorous for potato, that if by any chance he has ever seen a human being eating one, he will yell for the tuber day and night, even though the bottom of his cage be kept strewn with it in its most floury and kidney varieties. We are afraid that if we possessed a Goffin that had ever tasted potato, we should hasten to consign him, as Apuleius suggests, in silvas suas.

It is a sad pity that these beautiful birds have so little self-control. What more lovely companion could be conceived than a Leadbeater's Cockatoo, if it would only learn to put a bridle on its tongue! But we know too well what it all means, that exquisite swan's-down plumage washed with the rose of sunset, that curved and bridling crest, with its bars of amber and crimson, that delicate blushing back and kindling tail. It means a worse noise than ten cats upon a housetop, it means the music of two young pigs being killed all day long in the same enclosure. We are afraid that Mr. Greene, who is probably a man of action, is inclined to underrate the anguish that his pets cause to delicate nerves. We find him saying that the Purple-capped Lory is "a bird to keep in one's study and make a pet of." We dare say! The Purple-Cap is a kind of fiend with a short body, all ablaze with ruby-red and warm amethystine-black, with a crimson beak and a purple top to an extremely saucy head. It is a remarkable mime and a splendid linguist; and, on the whole, if it grows used to you, and finds that you are in the habit of bringing it grapes, it will prove an affectionate companion. But, as a bird to keep in our study, defend us from a creature whose best friend says that "it cries lory and chatters incessantly, in a hollow voice something like that of a man who speaks from his chest." The average person of letters will think twice before he shares his learned retirement with a chattering ventriloquist of this kind.

The illustrations to Mr. Greene's book are very good, and do no more than justice to the splendour of colouring of these birds. If the Rosy Cockatoo, with its magnificent waistcoat of deep peach-blossom colour, were not so common, it would amaze us by its gorgeousness. The Blue Mountain Lory almost abuses its privilege of wearing all the colours of the rainbow, so bright are the ruby of its breast, the deep sapphire of its head, the emerald of its back, the soft gold of its tail. It seems to be a very delicate bird; and Mr. Gedney, a great authority on the Psittacidæ, says that those who attempt to keep it in confinement must be prepared to expend upon it as much personal attention as is required by a new-born child. The Splendid Parakeet is a bird laid out altogether in a lighter key of colour. Its cheeks and wings are azure, its breast pale rose colour, its under parts clear yellow, and its back grass green. These birds, seen under a sub-tropical sun, flitting in and out of the long coarse grass of the open plains of West Australia, must look like veritable jewels, pretty animated clusters of garnets, turquoise, and turmelines.

There are not very many good stories in Mr. Greene's book. He is too much in earnest to loiter by the way, and pander to our instinct for amusement. He quotes, however, on the authority of Mr. Gedney, a curious instance of enmity between a young Joque monkey, called Jacko, and a Ring-necked Parroquet, a lovely slim creature, of a grass-green colour, sometimes called an Alexandrine. These two companions shared a room in which there was a knotted rope suspended from the rafter, with a few cross pieces of wood put through the strands, so as to form perches:—

> The great fun was to watch her and Jacko in their contests for the upper perch. Polly, having taken her tiffin, was disposed for an afternoon nap, and she accordingly commenced to mount the rope-ladder; but Jacko immediately set up a chatter, savagely showing his teeth meanwhile, and shaking the rope violently to impede the movements of Poll. In spite of this, up she goes steadily, hand over hand, nearer and nearer to the coveted perch, on which sits the monkey in a boiling passion, and trembling with excitement. Holding on by his tail and hind legs, he now attempts to get hold of Poll, but she snaps at his hands right and left, with a rapidity that is perfectly astounding, and presently a shriek of pain announces that her beak has drawn blood, and down drops poor Jacko like a stone, whilst Poll takes quiet possession of the perch, when, after repeating a few self-congratulatory notes, she dozes off as if nothing had happened. Jacko meanwhile sits upon his haunches, examining his bite with a very rueful countenance; but a little petting from me sets him right, and a thorough examination of everything eatable and drinkable having been made, he goes regularly to work to "blow the steam off."
>
> Making the rope-ladder his centre, he performs a series of splendid jumps to it from all the articles of furniture in the room, much to the disgust of Polly, and then, after a headlong rush round the apartment, he bounds up the ladder like a flash of lightning, and makes a grab at Polly's tail, dropping at once to the ground, to escape the consequences of this daring act. The bird, however, was never injured by him in this way, for she watched his every movement; the only time that he ever stole a march upon her was once when she happened to be feeding in the sand-tray immediately beneath the rope-ladder, down which her stealthy enemy slipped like a serpent, and making a snatch, caught her by the base of her tail.
>
> At that moment a well-directed branch of bananas from me hit him in the chest, and down he came, whereupon Poll seized him by the fleshy part of the lower arm and bit it through.
>
> This was a lesson which he never forgot, and although his deviltment compelled him to annoy Poll as a source of fun, still he grew to respect, if he did not love her.

In reading the above anecdote our sympathies are all for Polly. The person who deserved to be sent off in silvas suas was the tiresome Jacko, who could not understand that an elderly lady requires a nap after her midday meal.

AUSTRALASIA.*

THERE is no very great demand, we fancy, in the home market for books on Australia. The record of our colonies planted

> By the long wash of Australasian seas is honourable and important; but, for some reason or other, perhaps for a variety of reasons, there would seem to be an insuperable difficulty in making it interesting. Macaulay's famous complaint of the indifference shown by his countrymen to the history of their great empire in the East might, with still more reason, be urged to-day in the case of their other empire in the South. It is not, indeed, now with Australia as it was in the days when Sydney Smith could wax eloquent over the natural resources and endowments of a land "that has been able to survive the system of neglect and oppression experienced from the mother-country, and the series of ignorant and absurd Governors that have been selected for the administration of its affairs." No such accusation could be brought against the mother-country now, nor could have been brought, with any show of reason, for many a long year past. But still, people who have travelled among the inhabitants of those parts, or talked much with visitors from them, or studied their Parliamentary and other utterances, must be conscious that even yet there has not wholly passed away from among them a feeling that they and their affairs are not indeed ignored, neglected, or in any way put aside by the authorities, but by the great bulk of their fellow-countrymen over seas are regarded, to say the least, with a good-natured sort of indifference. That it is an indifference more pardonable, or at any rate less culpable, than that other Macaulay deplored, we may fairly plead, for it is one for which the colonists are themselves in some measure responsible. The record of their progress, in its broad aspect, has been one of such uniform prosperity, their conduct has been so blameless.

* The High Alps of New Zealand. By William Spotswood Green, M.A., Member of the English Alpine Club. London: Macmillan & Co.

> Along the cool sequestered vale of life
> They keep the noiseless tenor of their way.

We, then, who inhabit this large, restless, quarrelsome old world—we, with so much on our hands to do, and to read, and to talk about, may perhaps be pardoned if, with the natural selfishness of humanity, we are apt a little, in the multiplicity of our own affairs, not to forget, but to put by, those of our countrymen at the antipodes. Again, it must be allowed that they have not always been fortunate in their historians. Those who know the country best from personal experience are not, as a rule, of the stuff out of which historians are made; and if they were, they are probably a great deal too busy making history to find much time to write it. The official handbooks of the various colonies—some of which are quite excellent of their kind, notably those of New Zealand and South Australia—useful as they are for purposes of reference, and ample in all knowledge that can be learned from such sources, are naturally neither of such romantic interest or of such literary charm as to engross the general attention of the public; while the native works, or such, at any rate, as we have ourselves come across, that have been written with these popular designs, have rarely succeeded in fulfilling them, besides being not always quite so trustworthy in points of detail as their more matter-of-fact fellows. On the other hand, the travellers in those parts who have undertaken to tell the results of their travel have also from various causes been less successful than in most others. Australia is a larger country than all people are apt to remember. Now that it has been received into the popular area of travel, it is becoming of course much better known than it was. It has been brought within the range of the tourist, and tourists, as we all know, are very quick to take a very small part of what they see as a sample of the whole—a habit which is nowhere, perhaps, so misleading as in Australia. A fortnight or so in each of the principal cities, a visit to some flourishing "run," a scamper across to Tasmania, and so home, perhaps, by New Zealand, which very possibly means no more than a sojourn of a few hours in harbour while passengers and cargo are shipped from one steamer to the other:—in many, probably in most, cases this forms the sole equipment, so far as personal experience is concerned, of the traveller in Australia for writing a book on the country. It is clear therefore that, however observant he may be, however conscientious, a very great part of his information must be gleaned at second hand. Now Australians, and one can hardly blame them for it, are a little suspicious of "chiels" who have come among them for the purpose of taking notes. In a new country, a country that is yet only making, it is inevitable that mistakes should be made, inevitable, too, that, even where seen and acknowledged, they cannot all be set right at once. It is only natural that the Australian should prefer that his visitor should not see these mistakes, or, at least, that he should see them with native, and not with alien eyes. No writer was ever more conscientious than Anthony Trollope, and few travellers have been more observant; yet he was not suffered to see everything with his own eyes, or to judge everything with his own judgment. He has written not only the most popular book on our Australian colonies, but the best that has as yet been written; but there is not everything in it that there might have been. Lastly, of a country moving forward so quickly, and on so many lines as Australia, may one not be excused for saying that the time has not quite yet arrived for its history to be seriously written? What the traveller of to-day sees is not what he of yesterday saw, will not be what he of to-morrow shall see. Ere the ink be fairly dry the tale must be re-told. So that our Australian brothers should bear with us if we seem occasionally, in the press of our own affairs, to evince something like an indifference to their literature, and rest assured that it does not spring from any indifference to themselves or their country. That dislike to reading a story "in numbers" which is shared by so many people, is one for which there is a good deal to be said.

The two books we have just been reading, and by which the preceding observations have been inspired, or rather re-awakened, have, in truth, only this in common, that they are both, as one may say, "on Australia." In all other respects, both in design and execution, they are as far as the poles asunder. Yet they are both interesting, though they will not perhaps both interest equally the same class of readers. Mr. Green's book is indeed as interesting as any record of difficulties overcome by courage and skill that Australian travel has yet produced. It tells how the writer, with two Swiss guides, made the ascent of Mount Cook, the highest peak of the great Southern Alps of New Zealand. Mr. Green, with rare modesty, owns that he did not "set foot on the actual summit," and will willingly, therefore, relinquish any such claims "to the man who passes the point where we turned." But those who read his book will own that he and his two brave Switzers, Boss and Kaufmann, dared all that may become men; and, inasmuch as they left unconquered but thirty out of the 12,349 feet for which the great mountain lifts its head to eternal winter, and turned only when night was closing round them in a blinding storm of wind and hail and snow and mist, the honour he will not claim may fairly be allowed him. The account of the night passed on a narrow ledge of rock 10,000 feet above the sea, and about 5,000 above the line of perpetual snow, where they could neither sit down nor shift from their first position, with a handful of Brand's meat lozenges and their empty pipes to suck at for sustenance, is more than enough to prove that those thirty feet were left unclimbed not from any lack of heart or endurance. Mr. Green tells his story precisely as such stories should be told, in a manly, straightforward way, not without passages of that simple eloquence which the recollection of such scenes will almost always inspire in the heart of every intelligent man. Like that other traveller whose marvellous history we have all been reading, like Arminius Vámbery, he neither makes light of his adventures nor unduly magnifies the toil and danger of surmounting them. Yet the book must necessarily be one of primary interest to the mountaineer. As a contribution to our knowledge of New Zealand as a home for the superfluous population of the Old World, its value is necessarily slight. The whole time he was able to spare himself was but six months, inclusive of the two voyages, and of this three precious weeks were passed in quarantine at Port Phillip, in consequence of the small-pox having broken out on his steamer off the Cape. All that he could see of the country he saw with clear and intelligent eyes, but it was inevitably little. In his last chapter, however, will be found many useful hints on the class of people for whom New Zealand offers the fairest chances, and how those chances may be turned to the best advantage. One of his suggestions is, we think, a new one, and seems a very sound one. Both from Switzerland and Norway now, as from most other countries of the Old World, the tide of emigration is setting strongly. It mostly sets, of course, towards America; but America, he says, does not suit them well. Why should it not set towards New Zealand? There is a real want there of men capable of herding sheep on the high ranges, and who could do such work better than the mountaineers of Switzerland and Norway? And he is careful to point out, with an eye to the ruling passion, how useful they would be found as guides to "ambitious young New Zealanders, imbued with a healthy admiration of mountain beauty and affected with the desire to explore the wonders of their own icy peaks."

Mr. Bonwick, on the other hand, is Australian to the finger-tips; but his Australia is of the past. In his industrious volume will be found collected all the widely-scattered records of that long-doubtful settlement of Port Phillip which has now grown into the large and flourishing colony of Victoria. To the future historian of that colony, or indeed to the future historian of Australasia, such a volume will be of inestimable value. It will not only save him an infinity of trouble, but has preserved for him much curious and useful information, gathered by the writer from his personal acquaintance with many of the chief actors in those early and stirring scenes, which might well have otherwise perished, or, at best, passed into the domain of tradition. Mr. Bonwick has been careful to verify all this information by authentic documents, many of which he prints, and by the official records, from which he gives copious extracts. His book is less a history, as he himself owns, or even a continuous and methodical narrative, than a collection of materials hereafter to be employed on such work. As such it deserves the highest praise, but, also as such, it can hardly be recommended to the reader for amusement, or even to any reader who has not some practical purpose in view. There is one sentence we could have wished away from his otherwise modest and sensible preface. It is perfectly true that "all those associated with Victoria, or who have laboured in any way for the advancement of its interests, must feel proud of the colony in its material and educational progression"; perfectly true, also, that "all the various settlements throughout Australia are now far better fitted for the comfortable homes of Englishmen than at any former period"; or, as he elsewhere puts it, "the Victoria of to-day is as much beyond the Port Phillip of 1835 as the England of our Queen exceeds the Britain of Boadicea." But when we read that "the Britain of the South is healthier, freer, and happier than the Britain of Europe," we are a little inclined to demur. So very broad an assertion savours a little of that practice of "blowing," to use their own vigorous language, to which our brothers of the antipodes, like most young societies, are still somewhat addicted, and through which their utterances on themselves and their affairs are apt to lose a little of their value in stranger ears. However, Mr. Bonwick, of all Australians who have written of their country, is singularly little of a sinner in this respect; and he has, no doubt, every reason to speak with gratitude of a colony with which he has been so long acquainted, and whose early history he has laboured so hard to preserve.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE greater part of the papers at Chenonceaux were burnt at the Revolution by a too zealous Curé who feared to compromise Madame Dupin and her friends (1). But it seems that at least one portfolio escaped, and M. de Villeneuve-Guibert, a pious great-great-grandson, has published its contents. They were certainly worth publication, and if no one of the documents can be said to be of extraordinary interest, few books of recent appearance contain the work of more distinguished hands. There are letters of Voltaire and of Montesquieu, and of Mably, there are scraps and notes of Rousseau, and there are fragments of many only less interesting people. Perhaps M. de Villeneuve-Guibert might have dispensed himself from heading each section with a more or less elaborate notice of the person by whom its contents were written. For some of us have heard of Voltaire and Montesquieu before, or could at least ascertain the chief events of their lives with the aid of books of reference which are accessible without any very enormous difficulty. But it is an amiable weakness, and in the case of persons like Mairan and Le Cat almost excusable. Some of Mme. Dupin's own reflections are very interesting, and the portrait, after Nattier, which does duty as frontispiece, ought to make the moderately warm-blooded critic fall in love with the book and its subject out of hand. A typical eighteenth-century face, not regularly handsome, but delightfully pretty and amiable and intelligent, and full of readiness to be happy and make others happy, it looks out of the page "as if it would never be old."

We should suggest for M. Bastard's little volume of sketches in pen and pencil the sub-title of Album de la haine (2). The reproduced croquis from MM. de Neuville and Sergent are not uninteresting. But the letterpress has more than one fault. It is not drawn up with precision or skill of advocacy enough to make it the indictment against the Germans which its author seems to wish it to be; and, as a mere description, it lacks vigour and picturesqueness.

It is a pity that a man who, like M. Brunetière, unites strong common-sense with not a little acuteness and a great love of literature, should lack the catholicity and subtlety of appreciation which, with the qualities just mentioned, make up the five points of the critic. It is specially a pity, because of the five the two which he has not are by far the most valuable and the rarest. To appreciate what he does not like is, let it be said again and again, the one great note of every critic who can pretend to the first class, and, unluckily, M. Brunetière has it not. He opens the first piece of his present volume (3), an article on M. Lair's Louise de la Vallière, with what we can only call a silly fling at editors of early French literature. The fling has absolutely nothing to do with his subject, and simply shows his prejudices. Again, he remarks elsewhere, "On ne saurait presque rien dire de général à l'occasion de l'ot-bouille qui ne convienne aux Fleurs du mal"; a sentence which is in itself almost final as to his claims as a literary critic in the proper sense of the term. Of yet a third and different kind (though all three are traceable to the same defects) is his remark that Théophile, St.-Evremond, and the other philosophes of the seventeenth century are not really precursors of Voltaire, they are disciples of Montaigne; that their voice is an echo, not a harbinger. In fact, the gulf between Montaigne and St.-Evremond is far greater than between St.-Evremond and Voltaire; and after the double Renaissance-Protestant revolution the chain of scepticism is unbroken. But M. Brunetière's exaltation of the grand siècle made it necessary for him to ignore this, as it makes it necessary for him to sneer at once at chansons de gestes and at nineteenth-century poetry, to couple Corneille himself and Victor Hugo in a single sentence of disapproval. Work done from such a point of view can never be satisfactory, save in parts; though no man of M. Brunetière's ability and learning could write a book which should not be, as this is, in parts satisfactory.

M. Dupin de St.-André's book on "Mexico To-day" (4) records the experiences of a visit made in 1882 after a light, easy, and sufficiently lively fashion. The average French book of travels, of which this is a fair specimen, is shorter than its English analogue; but it is by no means the worse for that. M. Dupin de St.-André did not go very far afield or stay in the country very long. Such differentia as his book has is chiefly given to it by a philological excursus on the indigenous dialects of the country. Like all recent travellers, he urges Europeans to "open up" Mexico.

It is a pity that the accomplished author of Dosia, who has learnt many things not ill from English novelists, has also learnt from them one of their worst habits—that of incessant production. It is but a dozen years since no one, save her personal friends, had heard of "Henry Gréville"; now she has more than thirty novels, some of them of considerable length, standing against her name. Among these Folle Avoine (5) will scarcely hold a first place. The theme—the inability of a girl who marries with something more than the ordinary flaccid indifference of the French ingénue, wholly to forgive her husband for his post-nuptial escapades—is rather a dangerous one, and the indiscreet fashion in which fathers and mothers-in-law meddle with the pair rather destroys the sympathy which ought to be bestowed on Annie Romanet. We have never read a bad book by Mme. Alice Durand; but, for her, Folle Avoine can hardly be called a good one. Mademoiselle Blaisot (6) enters the world with such prestige as may belong in these latter days to a novel which has seen its way through the Revue des Deux-Mondes. It is a moral book enough, of a somewhat clap-trap kind of morality. The wicked aristocrat is confounded by a virtuous aristocrat-desdichado, who is his own son; the army is cried up, there is a little (not too much) stupidité égalitaire, a little (also not too much) satire on Legitimists and Clericals, and, in short, all the current cant in France is flattered and echoed in a not too pronounced fashion. It is a pity that M. Uchard, who is a writer of some talent, should condescend to this kind of rabâchage. Mme. de Witt's volume of short tales (7) needs no other introduction than the author's name, and is quite worthy of her.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE words "the Early Ancestors of the Prince of Wales" (1) on the title-page of a book leads the reader to expect a learned treatise on German history. It is a subject of which few Englishmen know much, and they would doubtless like to learn something, if it were only told them in an attractive manner. Something is no doubt to be learned from Dr. Taylor, but not nearly so much as his ambitious title would lead us to expect. What he has written is an account of a tour in Germany, intermingled with some rather disjointed notices of the Princes of the House of Wettin. Dr. Taylor says in his preface that he had long felt an interest in these worthies, and at last went on his travels to see the countries they had ruled and fought for. Dr. Taylor is rather inclined to underrate the labours of previous writers in the same field. He tells the story of the Prinzenraub, for instance, as if it were perfectly new; but it is only too obvious from his style that he has made a very careful study of Carlyle's account of that remarkable incident. Indeed Dr. Taylor is continually breaking into Carlylese as it is understood by the imitator. Now the greatest admirers of Carlyle will be the first to agree that nothing in literature is more offensive than imitations of his style. If, however, the reader is content to overlook these backslidings, and not to ask for much coherence in the historical sketches, he will find Dr. Taylor's book fairly readable. His tales of travel are not thrilling, but they are on the whole free from the tourist's worst sin—the perpetual attempt to be funny. The doings of Albert the Unnatural, Frederick the Warlike, Conrad the Great, Otho the Rich, and the other Wettins are a little confused in the telling, but they are highly interesting in themselves.

Mrs. Mary Boole has (2), as our American friends would say, seen Dr. Taylor's title, and gone several degrees better. His is only a little ambitious, but hers passes all understanding. Only the initiated can tell what is meant by "Symbolical Methods of Study." The explanation is certainly not given in the book, which is simply a collection of essays on things in general. We hear at times of "Mr. Bett's theory of counterpart forms," and how "In Boole's logical equation the $1-x$ (or not x, or polar-opposite of x) must belong to and be included in the same 'Universe of Thought' as the x itself," but the profane mind is left to find what it all leads to. Perhaps the lady students of Queen's College, London, to whom the book is dedicated, see how it all applies to the character of Portia and M. Renan's Life of Jesus. On these subjects Mrs. Boole is at least intelligible. We observe that she has by no means a high opinion of Portia. She thinks her virtues rather cheap, and that she had no right to talk about mercy in such a superior way after her shockingly callous behaviour to the Prince of Morocco and other unlucky gentlemen. Concerning M. Renan Mrs. Boole can only say through several pages that he is certainly wrong, but that it is very difficult to say why. Probably because he does not thoroughly understand the theory of counterpart forms and the logical equation. A good deal of the book consists of the dark sayings of Mrs. Boole's friends. Thus, under the attractive heading "A Lake of Fire," we get this quotation from Mr. Hinton:—"Throw potassium into water, and it makes a lake of fire for itself." No doubt; but what then?

Punch, that stern censor of morals, has a particular pleasure in reproving the degenerate youth who spends time, care, and money on his dress. "Mashers" get no mercy at his hands. In turning over Punch for the last few months one has noticed certain verses which bore an outward resemblance to the metre of Childe Harold.

(2) Symbolical Methods of Study. By Mary Boole. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1884.

They are now collected in a species of pamphlet (3), and it appears that they contain the history of one Childe Chappie, who was an extravagant young fool, and ended badly. Mr. Milliken, the author, is very severe on the vices of our youth, and seems to labour under an impression that debauched imbeciles of tender years are a growth peculiar to this part of the nineteenth century.

Thanks are due to the translator who devotes himself to the prose and not the verse of Heinrich Heine. "I. B.," who has attacked "Buch le Grand" (4), is further entitled to praise for having done his work well. His object, as he modestly says, has been "so give Heine (as far as lay within the translator's power) as he gives himself." In this he has been so far successful that his translation reads easily, and is quite free from German idioms. That is much; but it can perhaps scarcely be called "giving Heine." The English reader who makes his first acquaintance with him in this book is likely to be severely puzzled. "I. B.'s" translation would have been improved if it had contained an introduction.

Our list of handbooks includes the Victorian Year Book for 1882-3 (5), a well-printed volume full of useful colonial information; The Medical Register (6) and The Dentist's Register (7), both useful for reference, and appropriately bound in a gruesome blood-red colour.

A second edition of Dr. Birkbeck Hill's Colonel Gordon in Central Africa (8) is appropriately published at the present moment when we are all waiting with anxiety to know what will be the end of the General's second and more perilous adventure in that region. We have also to notice second editions of Mr. Delbos's Chapters on the Science of Language (9) and of Mr. Wright's Anglo-Saxon and Old English Vocabularies (10), together with a timely new edition of Messrs. Treherne and Goldie's Record of the University Boat Races (11), carefully revised and completed to date.

STREET'S INDIAN and COLONIAL MERCANTILE DIRECTORY, 1883-84.

This Annual offers to the manufacturers of England a reliable and valuable guide to the European Merchants of India, China, Japan, and the Eastern Seas, Australia, New Zealand, British Columbia, the West Indies, West African settlements, Gold Coast Colony, Liberian Coast, and all the Colonies and English Settlements. The contents have been most carefully revised (locally) as great expense, so that it cannot but prove a trustworthy book of constant reference. It also contains Tariffs, Trade Returns, Populations, Maps, and other information useful to Merchants.

"There is a healthy tone and also a freshness about 'Not Like Other Girls' which we have thoroughly enjoyed.....Miss Carey has in it achieved another genuine success."—John Bull.

"'Not Like Other Girls' is a very amusing book, and one which can be very well spoken of."—Pall Mall Gazette.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A WESTERN WILDFLOWER."

IN LONDON TOWN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"The story which opens with this delicious bit of practical paradox is bright and amusing throughout. It is written with a clever woman's generous sympathy in manly views of life, and with a sly perception, also, of the narrowness into which exclusively masculine ideas are apt to run. No one who knows what good writing is, no one who is original enough to enjoy originality, should miss the pleasure that this novel—which has plenty of true sentiment and genuine pathos in it as well as humour—will give."—Daily Telegraph.

immediately available assets for that purpose, she is. Egypt could be made solvent and put in the way of a financial existence not more encumbered than is the wont of civilized nations in a very short time. But it is suspected, if not known, that at least one European Power, and probably more than one, would gladly use this financial distress at once as a cause of complaint against English predominance, and as a means of preventing England from making that predominance more real. There is much reason for the view that Mr. GLADSTONE's extraordinary outburst of rage on a certain Thursday night was only in part affected, and that it was in part due to the difficulties in which the Government have found, or rather placed, themselves in regard to this question. These difficulties are undoubtedly serious, and the rumour that England has proposed to the Powers the reduction of General WOOD's mock army as a way out of them is absurd. That forlorn force is the creature of England, and England has no need to ask any one's leave to disband it. In itself the step would no doubt be a wise one, but as a stipendiary force of some sort, either English or Turkish, would become necessary, the gain to the Egyptian exchequer, though sensible, would not be absolute. The arrangement of the Civil Service on a more economical and reasonable footing, and the better administration of the public estates, would be much more effective. Most effective of all, no doubt, would be a more equitable distribution of taxation, and the removal of the inability of Egypt to deal with foreign creditors and foreign residents in a manner consulting at once equity and reason. But here's the rub, and here it is that the European Powers may make themselves obstructive.

This having been clear from the beginning, the fault of the English Government in mismanaging the administration proper as distinguished from the finances is all the more flagrant and intolerable. They might, after Tel-el-Kebir, have relieved the burdens of Egypt in many ways, and particularly in dismissing the useless European functionaries who get in each other's way and hinder reform. They did nothing of the sort; but, on the contrary, introduced a fresh swarm of foreign judges and so forth—very excellent persons, no doubt, but, as COWPER's farmer remarked of his rector's doctrine, "plaguy dear," and not always, it would seem, very effective. They have acquiesced in the saddling of the country with an enormous compensation debt to the losers by those Alexandrian disturbances which, if it had not been for the irresolution of Mr. GLADSTONE himself and his colleagues, would never have occurred. Their management of the Soudan business has brought upon Egypt the maximum of expense with the minimum of useful or profitable result. And they have followed the famous example of General HAYNAU in sending into the luckless country the bill for the expenses of its own punishment. This is how a faithful account of the stewardship of the English Government in Egypt for the last two years would run, and if any one thinks it an account creditable to the stewards, he is very welcome to his opinion, but can hardly hope to have it shared by honest men and impartial politicians. That the stewards themselves are conscious of the difficulty of passing their accounts is sufficiently evident from the passages touching on Egypt in Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's Derby speech. Not one of Sir WILLIAM's hearers or readers who is a man of sense really thought or thinks that, because Lord BEACONSFIELD took Cyprus and put it into a condition of order and good government, Mr. GLADSTONE was fatally obliged to take Egypt and put it into a condition of anarchy. Yet this, and this only, is what Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's defence of the past comes to, while he has nothing whatever to offer for the future. On the other side, Lord SALISBURY at Manchester has laid down, not too soon by any means, but clearly and, it may be hoped, finally the policy of the Opposition in the Egyptian matter. That policy can be briefly put; it comes to this—"Egypt is under our government, and we must govern it." That is exactly what Her Majesty's present advisers cannot make up their minds to do. They will do spasmodically things which are outrageous and unintelligible except as acts of government, such as the deposition of CHERIF, the episodic and now totally unintelligible freak of the Souakim expedition, the mission of General GORDON, and so forth. But they will do these apparently as a practical joker who had got possession of an office for a day might do them, without any definite plan, any intention of following them up, or any notion of a coherent policy to connect and justify them. Such a policy Lord SALISBURY announced in the brief demand that Egypt shall be "governed," and it is the business of Englishmen to insist that, if the present Ministry will not govern it, they shall make room for better men who will.

THE EDINBURGH TERCENTENARY.

EDINBURGH is celebrating the tercentenary of her University with stately and dignified high jinks. Never has the city been more festive since the memorable visit of GEORGE IV. The Scott centenary, another great holiday, occurred in the early autumn, when no one was at home, and tourists pervaded the streets in strange attire. But the University has wisely chosen a moment for its fête when the inhabitants have not yet deserted Edinburgh. In a month or so all the Edinburgh world will have moved into the country. All the windows will present a barren array of brown shutters, with placards announcing the proper address for letters. Grass will be growing in Moray Place, and the "gites" of the Edinburgh Academy will pitch wickets in Queen Street. But for the moment all Edinburgh people are in Edinburgh, and a capital time they are having. The town is not often visited by many illustrious strangers at the same moment, though a rhetorical celebrity from town occasionally appears and lectures at the Philosophical Institution. At other seasons Edinburgh has to depend on her own wit, jocular law-lords, and advocates who happen to sing. Now her streets are lively with Dutch professors, whose names may not be exactly familiar, but who are, doubtless, men of European reputation. By the way, if ever a person connected with science or letters is quite unheard of at home, he always has "a European reputation," or so his friends declare. Edinburgh is now basking (in spite of the east wind) in the presence of M. D'ABBADIE, who has written a work on the géodésie of Upper Ethiopia. The poet NICOLAAS BELTS is also there, the bright lyrist who wrote "Guy de "Vlaming," and in maturer years a Life of St. Paul. Mr. BROWNING's genial presence is seldom wanting at a feast, and he, too, is helping the Edinburgh people to make holiday. M. CARO is another of the celebrities; M. CARO, the lecturer most beloved of intellectual and emotional womanhood. Eclipsing poets and economists in fame comes M. DE LESSEPS, still eager to polish off Isthmuses in his eightieth year. Men of science and archæologists, as MM. PASTEUR and PERROT and VIRCHOW, and the Master of Balliol, are all accepting the hospitality of the University. No wonder that the Scotsman drops into poetry, though the Doric strain is not kept up with much consistency.—

> Our northern air is hard and snell,
> Our northern braes are bare;
> But the spirit of the Scot knows well
> The wondrous power of "lear."

"Lear" is "lore," no doubt, but why does the minstrel say "knows" when he means "kens"? He goes on, in a Republican spirit:—

> When the fair Halls of Holyrood
> Were changed for proud St. James,
> Than springs from Royal names.

"St. James" doubtless means "St. James's," but one cannot write about "Royal names's" (except in a Bab ballad), and the poet has chosen dignity at the risk of being obscure. We feel inclined to add a verse to this lay; a laurel from a Southern chaplet among the spikes of the Northern Thistle:—

> Ah, still historic shadows cling
> About the haunted place
> Where Blackie oft was asked to sing,
> Where Brodie stole the Mace.

To desert poetry, into which we have only been tempted by the siren strains of the Scotsman, it must be acknowledged that no University in Europe could have set before her guests a more splendid and varied entertainment than the old Town's College of Edinburgh. When University College celebrated her thousand years of fancied existence she did not collect nearly so distinguished a gathering, perhaps because people were shy of King ALFRED, in whose claims to be the founder even the Times has ceased to believe. The ancient town of Edinburgh is the very place for an historical solemnity. The affair opened with an impressive service in the grey old Cathedral of St. Giles's, a place crowded with memories of the feudal revenges and theological jars of Scotland. Here is an expiatory chapel to atone for the starving of ROTHSAY, here JENNY

Geddes threw the historical stool and expressed a Presbyterian contempt of Collects. The change that has come over the spirit of modern Scotland was attested by an amateur performance by students and lady amateurs in the Theatre. What would the Presbyterian fathers, not, perhaps, of Rollock's time, but of the dour later Puritanism, have said to this promiscuous play-acting? With patriotism and common sense, the undergraduates abstained from playing in a tongue only understood of Mr. Browning, the Master of Balliol, and a few Professors. They did not act Sophocles or Aristophanes, but the King o' Scots, by the late Andrew Halliday, an opportune adaptation, we presume, of The Fortunes of Nigel. From sport to sport the visitors were hurried, from King James to an admirable organ recital by Sir Herbert Oakley. Then came an Academic evening party in the Library, and, last, a students' ball. The students' torchlight procession, winding through the most picturesque sights in Europe, was a sight only to be rivalled by German Universities. Perhaps the chief practical result of the festival will be to increase the esprit de corps of the students, and to encourage that pride in their own University which the ordinary conditions of Scotch academic life are apt to leave dormant.

FRENCH POLITICS.

After a dull interval of attention to the practical business of administration French politicians are about to have another chance of recasting their national government. The Revision Bill is to be introduced at an early period, and then minor questions will be thrust aside while it is being decided how to make the Senate still more pliant, and how to get a Chamber of Deputies which can be kept in some sort of discipline. In the meantime those Frenchmen who are professionally bound to take an active interest in politics are mainly employed in watching the attempts made by the Radicals to bring about a useful disturbance. One such effort has been made at Avignon. The very ordinary trade dispute which has been dragging itself along in that district for some time was too tempting an opportunity to be missed by the anarchists. They have done their best to turn a strike for higher wages into a little social war. The humbler agents of the party have stirred up mischief on the spot, and M. Clémenceau has done his part by patronizing them from Paris and coming forward with an offer to save society if it is handed over to the Radicals. Society has got out of the difficulty with the more practical help of soldiers and gendarmes, and the strike will end as usual in the surrender of the workmen. Those of them who have not found their way into prison will return to their work poorer men than they left it. The Chambers have been engaged in the apparently hopeless task of supplying Paris with a municipality which will not devote itself mainly to worrying the Prefect of Police and insulting the priests. The plan proposed did not look very hopeful. The Chamber has no love of scrutin de liste for itself; but it was inclined to try whether that method of election might not result in filling the Town Council with members who had some manners and some sense of dignity. It seemed too dangerous to give every voter a vote for all the eighty Town Councilmen. There seemed a prospect that, if all Paris was allowed to act together in this way, the elections would become purely political. By way of compromise between a plan which threatened to establish a rival Parliament in Paris and the present system, which has certainly failed to supply a satisfactory governing body, the Chamber hit upon the scheme of dividing the capital into four districts, each to be represented by twenty Councilmen elected by scrutin de liste. The Senate had probably no great confidence in any plan for improving the quality of the Town Council, and it has a lively dislike of scrutin de liste. Accordingly, it amended the Bill, and with unheard-of firmness stuck to its amendments. The Senate wished to see Paris divided into twenty districts, each electing four members. To this the deputies refused to listen, and so the municipality remains where it was for the present. The voters are to have no immediate chance of showing whether the dignity of choosing a name from a list of twenty, instead of voting for one candidate, would have the happy effect of making them more careful as to the character of their representatives. The Parisian Radicals have another excuse for clamouring for the revision of a Constitution under which a Senate can have an opinion of its own, and the whole question is postponed till the great Bill comes on.

It does not as yet appear to have been thought necessary by any of the politicians who will have to do the work to make any statement as to what is to be revised or why. There is no doubt as to the wishes and very little as to the intentions of the Radicals. From their point of view any form of government which supplies the means of putting a check on the noisy part of the town population deserves instant destruction, and it is perfectly natural that they should try to upset it. The readiness of M. Ferry to keep them is less easy to understand, and he shows no disposition to give any explanation. An admirable opportunity has just been afforded him, and he has deliberately let it slip. The statue which is the recognized due of every Frenchman of mark has been erected to Gambetta at his native town. The unveiling of this work of art has been made the occasion for the usual speechifying. Celebrities both local and national have collected. They have sung the praises of the deceased statesman as sincerely as they could. It has been found necessary to impose silence on a fiery poet who could not be trusted to preserve a judicious silence on the one part of Gambetta's hopes and plans which was generally known or intelligible. Frenchmen may dream about the revenge, but they wisely consider that it is nearly as dangerous to talk about as to try. The muzzling of M. Deroulède is by far the most characteristic thing about the whole ceremony. When the various speakers dwelt on the blank Gambetta's death had left in French politics, they can scarcely have been conscious of the undesigned proof that was being given of its existence. He at least was never afraid of telling the world that he was working for the day when France should play Germany a return match for the war of 1870. His frankness on that subject atoned for the general vagueness of his ideas on questions of internal politics; and, however dangerous it might have proved to his country, it served his popularity well. The politician who has stepped into the place left vacant by Gambetta, chiefly because there was no one else at hand, finds it prudent to choose another stock subject for his eloquence. M. Ferry escapes from the difficulty of explaining what it is he means to do, or of proving that anything need be done, by periodical declamations against the anarchists. At Cahors and on his way home by Périgueux he has repeated the substance of his speech at Havre a year ago. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the spirited tone of M. Ferry's harangues on these occasions; but Frenchmen who do not want to hand themselves over to M. Clémenceau may reasonably be anxious to know how he proposes to conduct the war proclaimed with such strenuous blowing of the trumpet. The answer to that question would be awkward to give. M. Ferry must have reasoned very differently from other French Premiers if he has not arrived at the conclusion that some means must be provided for supplying him with an obedient majority. It seems to be generally agreed that scrutin de liste is the one way of supplying this desired instrument of government which every Frenchman condemns when he is in opposition, and schemes to get when he is in power. Scrutin de liste can only be obtained by means of a revision of the Constitution; and therefore M. Ferry, who opposed the experiment when it was likely to work for the benefit of another man, is determined to try it for himself. It is proved beyond all doubt that a Chamber very unlike the present must be obtained if a consistent policy is to be obtained; but a politician must have the confidence of Gambetta himself to speak plainly on the subject. It looks too like asking to be made Dictator. It was Gambetta's trump card that he had proved his capacity for the office, and he never scrupled to say so. M. Ferry can scarcely show the same confidence; and his only resource is to try whether he cannot get the power of electing two-thirds of the representatives of France by alternately making himself small and posing as the enemy of the Radicals.

The Premier's utterances on the subject of foreign policy do not differ essentially in character from his declarations on domestic affairs. He holds forth generally on the necessity of being wise and also firm; but he has nothing to say as to the exact measures which ought to be taken to show wisdom and firmness. With consistent discretion he avoids all reference to the dangerous question of Egypt. He leaves it to be covered by the harmless statement that French interests must be defended. The formula has the advantage of stating nothing which anybody can deny, and leaving everybody to make his own interpretation. M. FERRY doubtless knows very well that the foreign policy of France must be regulated by the conduct of a Power on which no man can calculate. The Tonquin question has reached a point at which it becomes very doubtful whether it is going to end or to grow into something infinitely more serious. The French officials on the spot who have been the real inspirers of the policy all along are apparently persuaded that, if their country is to do something vigorous, it had better do it there. Whether it will have to be done depends on China, and what China will do remains as great a mystery as ever. It is about to be called upon to pay an indemnity for making mischief in Tonquin, if any confidence can be placed on the statements of the French Government. The position is not pleasant for China, and it is preparing to meet it with vigour after its fashion. Ministers are being deposed, generals are being dismissed, and there is much talk of cutting off heads. So much is certain, but there is room for doubt as to what it exactly means. The Chinese Government may be punishing all these unlucky officials because they have not done enough, and in order to make room for more energetic successors. It is, however, at least equally likely that it is preparing for a surrender by the sacrifice of servants who are associated with an unsuccessful policy. Nothing effectual has yet been done to prepare the Southern provinces to repel a French attack, and so far M. FERRY'S policy in that region has been justified. It may have been unwise to take Tonquin, but it has unquestionably been taken, and it is always there to show that, if France has to submit to unpleasant checks elsewhere, its interests are being well looked after by a wisely patriotic Minister.

LAW AND LYNCHING.

LAST summer an American citizen wrote to an English paper suggesting that an unpopular sportsman should be lynched. It was pointed out at the time that lynching was rather an emotional, and often an erroneous, method of securing justice. In our country we do not even lynch Irish-American dynamitards, whom Americans would certainly lynch if the dynamite game was attempted in the States. We regard our tame obedience to law as, on the whole, more civilized than the impulsive humours which led to the Cincinnati riots, and which have just caused the roasting of a buck negro in Texas. Our view of the case is taken by a writer in the Century, the New York periodical, who gives some very curious statistics tending to show that mob law has its disadvantages. It may sound noble to say that "every citizen has in his valise the rope of the exe-"cutioner," and the remark is more true than that which assigns the Marshal's bâton to every French recruit. But, admirable as the rule "every man his own hangman" may seem in theory, in practice its working leaves much to be desired.

The arguments adduced by the writer in the Century prove, apparently, that murders increase just as mob law (that gallant expression of the people's instincts) becomes more general. The States are the most murderous of civilized countries. Probably the reason is that murder is such a lottery. Even in our own country many murderers find some penny paper or other to get up an agitation in their favour, and to try them again by plébiscite. But in the States the odds are far more considerable against murder leading to the gallows. Last year fifteen hundred and seventeen murders were committed in the States. In 1882 there were twelve hundred and sixty-six. Out of the fifteen hundred and seventeen homicides, only ninety-seven were executed by legal process. Thus a criminal's chance of avoiding the capital penalty is about fourteen to one. He may, however, be lynched, and one hundred and eighteen lynchings occurred last year. Even so, the odds in favour of the murderer's getting off with his life are longer than they ought to be. The lynchings are caused by the popular belief that the criminal has been unfairly allowed to escape. But no number of lynchings seem to affect the hopes of murderers. We must remember that many murders, in the Southern and Western States especially, are scarcely regarded as crimes at all. Shooting at sight has taken the place, and secured the privileges, of duelling. Again, there are private injuries, particularly where the women of a family are concerned, which seem to be thought to justify murder. Revenge is recognized as a form of justice not much wilder than usual. Thus we must allow for a number of murderers whom no local jury would condemn. These men cannot be said to escape through the venality of jurors, or the venality of judges, or the devices of lawyers. They got off because their neighbours, like the Captain of the Thunder Bomb, "wery much applauded" when they heard what they had done. Again, as the writer in the Century observes, lynching does not much discourage murder, because "the mob is neither judicial nor chival-"rous; the weak and defenceless are far more likely to "suffer at its hands than the strong and prosperous, as is "shown by the fact that the victims of more than half the "lynchings reported last year were Southern negroes." Lynching is about as judicial in America as Jew-baiting and Jew-murdering in Russia. Other cases of lynching find a better excuse in the popular belief that murderers are allowed to escape the gallows unfairly. "The American Bar is distinguished for its fertility in the "invention of those vicious expedients by which trials are "endlessly protracted and the minds of jurors are hopelessly "confused." Bad as our own long trials are, the writer in the Century can talk of "the swift, sure, firm methods of "English and Continental courts in dealing with great "criminals." Certainly, at the very worst, our criminal courts are never disgraced by the systematic corruption of jurors, which has been said (though not by the authority we have been quoting) to prevail in the States.

"The machinery of justice is inefficient"—that sentence alone accounts for the amazing number of murders, of lynchings, and of escapes from the law. But why is justice so ricketty? In a country of practically universal suffrage, a country where justice is eagerly desired, why have the people to go into the streets and erect barricades and rob gunsmiths' shops to secure an article that in Europe can be had for the asking? What is the use of having votes if a people cannot even keep its criminal courts pure? This is one of the problems which may be recommended to people who believe in the panacea of universal voting.

SPANISH AFFAIRS.

SINCE the establishment in power of the present Ministry Spanish politics have been stagnant, at least on the surface. Señor CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO is probably secure in his tenure of office till the general election is over; and, if he follows the example of his predecessors, he will take care to provide for himself a sufficient majority in the Cortes. The process by which Spanish Ministers control elections is scarcely intelligible to foreigners; but, notwithstanding the ostensible existence of a popular suffrage, it is proved by repeated experience to be effective and supreme. Sometimes the official agents have in their excessive zeal so far mistaken the interest of their employers as to return a Congress in which the minority was scarcely represented; but the present Minister has sufficient experience to know that the absence of a Parliamentary Opposition would expose him to the danger of palace intrigues, and possibly of popular or military conspiracies. Parliamentary strength forms but an insecure foundation of political power when it is liable to be destroyed or shifted to the other side after the next dissolution. Another element of uncertainty is to be found in the partial dependence of Spanish Cabinets on Royal favour. Señor CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO was the chief founder of the revived BOURBON monarchy, and he was the early friend and instructor of the KING; but perhaps he may have taken too much on himself; or more probably his pupil, with natural impatience of control, wished to assert his personal independence. After some years of undisputed authority, CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO, though he still commanded a steady majority in the Cortes, was suddenly dismissed, for the avowed reason that the KING wished to give the Liberal party a term of office in its turn.

According to English precedents and notions, the change of Government was scarcely constitutional; but Continental copies of the most artificial of political systems never conform strictly to the original type. The Conservative party, of which Señor CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO was the head, would have occupied a false position if it had condemned the free exercise of the Royal prerogative. The Liberals on their part were not disposed to reject an unexpected advantage; and, on the whole, ALFONSO XII. accomplished his main object by establishing his claim to exercise large political influence. It would appear that he bears no ill will to his early friend and adviser, inasmuch as the present Cabinet was appointed by the KING himself, although the late Minister still retained a majority in the Cortes. Señor CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO has apparently not succeeded in detaching any Liberal section from the masses of the party, and some Conservative wavereers still prefer the alliance of his principal rival. Señor SAGASTA has induced his followers to propose as one of the candidates for the representation of Madrid his late colleague at the Foreign Office, the Marquis DE LA VEGA DE ARMIJO, who was always regarded as a Conservative, even after he joined the late Coalition Ministry. Party politics in Spain are so complicated, and the mutual relations of different sections change so frequently, that it is difficult to judge whether any combination is likely to be permanent. The powerful organization of the Liberal union, of which Marshal SERRANO and General LOPES DOMINGUEZ are the most conspicuous members, has not publicly renounced its antagonism to Señor SAGASTA. Whether the leaders of the Union will prefer CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO to his most formidable Parliamentary competitor is not at present known. A year ago it seemed probable that Marshal SERRANO would force himself or his followers into office by his paradoxical alliance with the extreme Liberals and a section of the Republicans. Hitherto the Liberal Union have only succeeded in driving SAGASTA from office.

The most formidable danger which threatens the dynastic and Conservative cause in Spain arises not from constitutional opposition or from ordinary political intrigue, but from the doubtful loyalty of a portion of the army. The mutinies of last year were easily put down, but they proved that the era of military revolutions was not finally closed. The plots which were then baffled were, perhaps, directed on the part of their local ringleaders against an unpopular Minister of War; but, according to general belief, the movement was organized by the veteran politician who, during the reign of ISABELLA II., was constantly opposed to SAGASTA. Señor ZORRILLA has, during his exile, become a professed Republican; and he would not hesitate to avail himself of the aid of disaffected military chiefs to overthrow the present Government. It is perhaps fortunate that no Spanish general now occupies the prominent position which in former times enabled O'DONNELL, NARVAEZ, and PRIM to control in succession the destinies of the country. Thirty or forty years ago civilian Ministers only held office by the permission and support of the leader of the army. Marshal SERRANO, the only survivor among the generals who were his contemporaries, has probably during his long retirement from affairs lost his influence in the army. The present PRIME MINISTER, though he employed General MARTINEZ CAMPOS to effect the restoration of the KING, relies on his own ability in the management of affairs, and not on any military alliance. The leader of the Opposition also has long experience in Parliamentary conflict and in the management of parties. Señor CASTELAR and the other Republican leaders, with the exception of ZORRILLA, although they profess irreconcilable hostility to the dynasty and to all forms of monarchy, repudiate the purpose of effecting a revolution by force. As the greatest Parliamentary orator in the country, Señor CASTELAR would probably be opposed to military interference in political struggles, even if he had not himself been a victim of the operation which in Spain has received the name of a pronouncement. As the nominal head of a Republican Government, Señor CASTELAR had for some months exercised a dictatorship with creditable vigour, till he unluckily thought fit to vindicate his personal consistency by once more convoking the Assembly. The Cortes, according to Spanish custom, consisted almost exclusively of members of the dominant party. In a short time the mischievous folly and incapacity of the Republican Legislature became so flagrant as almost to justify the intervention of the only remaining authority in the State. General PAVIA, the Captain-General of Madrid, at the head of one or two regiments, turned the Cortes out of doors, amid almost universal satisfaction; and so the Republic came for the time to an end. None of its chiefs were regretted, except CASTELAR himself, who, if he had helped to establish a vicious form of government, partially redeemed his character as a patriot and a man of sense by converting the Republic into a temporary despotism, administered by himself. He has perhaps learned by experience that the world is not governed wholly by fine sentiments, even when they are expressed in mellifluous language. At the same time, he probably remembers, not without resentment, General PAVIA's vigorous proceeding.

The material prosperity of Spain has probably been little impaired by the contests for power which amuse or excite professional politicians. The serious agrarian and communistic disturbances in Andalusia seem to have been repressed; and some surprise has been caused by the late judgment of the Court of Appeal, which aggravated the sentences passed on the ringleaders. The only subject of Spanish legislation and policy which is directly important to English interests has not been advantageously affected by the last Ministerial change. The Commercial Treaty had unfortunately not been concluded by the late Government, though the terms were virtually arranged. Señor CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO and his colleagues decline to be bound by the decision of their predecessors, and consequently England is still unfairly excluded from the privileges secured by treaties of commerce to more favoured nations. It is officially stated that no negotiations are at present proceeding; but Sir ROBERT MORIER would probably profit by any suitable opportunity of reopening the discussion. Mr. CHILDERS will perhaps, in opening his Budget, find occasion to explain and defend the refusal of the Government to modify the tariff on Spanish wines beyond the reduction which had been conceded. Two years ago Mr. GLADSTONE believed that an agreement with Spain was on the point of being concluded; and equally sanguine hopes were entertained as late as last autumn. The maintenance of the alcoholic test which was instituted in 1860 has ever since been regarded by Spanish winegrowers and by their Government as equivalent to a differential duty in favour of the light Spanish wines. Some English experts think that the contention of the Spaniards is just; but the contrary opinion is supported by the high authority of Mr. GLADSTONE.

Some uneasiness is felt in Spain as to the possible renewal of the chronic disturbances in Cuba which had after many unsuccessful attempts been repressed by MARTINEZ CAMPOS. An adventurer who calls himself General AGUERO, having succeeded in escaping the vigilance of the American officers at Key West, has landed with forty or fifty followers in Cuba, for the purpose of organizing an insurrection against the Government. The vessel which conveyed the expedition has since been seized by the American authorities; but AGUERO and his band have hitherto evaded capture. According to accounts published by the Government, the conspirators are actively pursued by the troops, and their enterprise will not become formidable unless they have an understanding with some considerable body of malcontents in the island; but the extreme tenacity of the former insurrection naturally suggests a feeling of anxiety. There are, probably, abuses enough in Cuba, but the remedy is not to be found in military rebellion. In one important respect the present Colonial Government is more fortunate than that of thirty years ago. Down to the time of the Civil War the American Government and the people of the Southern States made no secret of their desire to obtain possession of Cuba for the purpose of extending the area of slavery. Mr. BUCHANAN when he was Minister to the English Court ostentatiously held a meeting with some of his Continental colleagues for the purpose of considering the expediency of annexing Cuba. More than one President recommended in Messages to Congress the same lawless policy. AGUERO will assuredly receive neither support nor encouragement from the United States, which would since the abolition of slavery find the possession of Cuba a grave incumbrance.

LORD BRABAZON ON OPEN SPACES.

LORD BRABAZON has written to the papers to call attention to the provisions of a private Bill now before Parliament. It is not opposed by any one. No blocker has blocked it. In fact, it is received with the most perfect equanimity by the House and by the public. This means a strong probability that no more will be heard of it. Had Lord BRABAZON proposed that all the dwellers in London should be set by the ears; had he threatened to confiscate the vested interests of a great public body, or of a few private gentlemen; had he prepared an elaborate scheme for sending English trade into foreign vessels, and for handing over a monopoly of shipbuilding to the United States, he would at least have been sure of a hearing. But all he wants is that a piece of ground of some one hundred and sixty acres, now nearly all quasi-public property, should be retained for the use and benefit of the public, and should not be built over. The money needed to carry out this scheme is about what every few weeks we have to pay for successive vacillations in the policy of the present Government. It is about half what the land will be worth in ten or a dozen years. Yet, though the Ministry are quite willing to entertain a scheme by which the only body hitherto able or willing on principle to support such a course as that recommended by Lord BRABAZON is to be abolished, it will not help the present Bill. Its promoter is obliged to take advantage of the Easter holidays to make an attempt to call public attention to the matter through the columns of the daily papers; and all who are acquainted with the region concerned and with the facts of the case will feel it nothing less than a duty to aid Lord BRABAZON'S benevolent efforts and do all that can be done towards the fulfilment of his object.

Visitors at the so-called "palace" at Fulham, the suburban manor-house of the bishops of London from time immemorial, and certainly from long before the Norman Conquest, will remember that the bridge over the moat which surrounds the house and gardens is approached by a private road known as "the Bishops' Avenue." Lord BRABAZON, by the way, miscalls it the "Bishops' Walk." But Bishops' Walk lies between Fulham and the Thames, and is, moreover, continued northward for some distance along the left bank of the river. Between it and the main road which connects Fulham and Hammersmith, bordered on the south by the Avenue of which we have spoken, is a grass meadow, the greater part of which is still in possession of the representatives of the Lord of the Manor, namely, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It is a relic of the old endowments of the See of London, so large a proportion of which was alienated in the reigns of HENRY VIII. and EDWARD VI. The tide of buildings has lately overwhelmed all the country round. Most of us can remember when Fulham Road, as it was then called, ran through open fields. Only this one now remains, and unless it is rescued in time it will soon share the fate of its neighbours. One hundred and sixty acres is not a great space; nor, at the present day, and so near London, is 230,000*l.* a great price to pay for it. The charge on Fulham is calculated at about 4*d.* a year from every 20*l.* householder. For this he will have a piece of recreation-ground larger than the absurdly misnamed Finsbury Park at Hornsey, also a relic of the old episcopal estates; and will be able to secure for future years, not only the fresh air and healthfulness of an open space, not only the advantage of a playground for his children, but the preservation of a trace of that rural aspect which has but just abandoned Fulham, and which made the parish so long a resort of wealth and fashion, of royal and noble names and rents in proportion. Should this opportunity be neglected, it will not recur. What may be bought now for a moderate sum will perhaps have to be bought later for twice or thrice as much. Open spaces are becoming more and more rare in the suburbs of London. Buildings are extending in all directions. Already what the Corporation saved for us of Epping Forest is nearly surrounded by villages which are really suburban. Incredible as it may seem, a suburb is growing up at Burnham Beeches. A piece of open ground like this, miles within the so-called "metropolitan" boundaries, is seldom to be had; and Lord BRABAZON should not only be able to count on the success of his scheme, but should further be assured of the gratitude of the multitudes for whom he is endeavouring to obtain this boon. The Alexandra Park project hangs fire. The Paddington project has so far failed. It becomes more and more desirable every day that such proposals as this one should be strongly supported. When the Radicals have pulled down the Corporation of London, with its vast funds and its open-handed public spirit, no more chances will occur. We shall have no more gifts like Chaldon or Wanstead. Every remaining open space should be jealously guarded. In America, as Lord BRABAZON reminds us, the great towns systematically preserve certain areas. They set us an example which, at least under present influences, is not likely to be followed in London. The threats of confiscation which have of late been so freely aimed at public bodies owning land have naturally been followed by endeavours to get rid of such precarious property. Clement's Inn is gone, Clifford's Inn is going. The City Companies which still have gardens cannot be blamed if they think money would be a preferable form of estate. We can expect nothing else from the communistic views put forward so shamelessly by people who should, nay—in most cases who do—know better. It is without much hopefulness that we venture to call attention to Lord BRABAZON'S Bill; but it is the imperative duty of all who can aid him to do so, if only by showing the reasonableness of his proposals.

WRESTLING.

THE few authors who have attempted to write any account of wrestling mostly take great pains to assure us that this is the earliest art in which men engaged for hostile purposes. In that theory they are probably quite right, for boxing—the only other sort of combat for which no weapons are required—is comparatively speaking a very artificial affair. Boys attacking one another in primitive fashion by the light of nature soon get together, and decide the fortune of the day not by knock-down blows so often as by falls in which the weaker combatant is laid on his back. It requires an amount of skill which no novice can possess to prevent an adversary from "closing" if he has a mind to do so; and, accordingly, the man who is getting the worst of it at out-fighting will, if no law forbids him, or no straight-shoulder hit drives him back, soon rush in and convert the encounter from a boxing into a wrestling match. Moreover, in a fight for life and death, such as we may suppose most primitive combats to have been, a single fair back fall would do more to put the fallen man at the mercy of his opponent than a dozen severe blows with the fist. Besides this most men think that they can do themselves fair justice in a struggle body to body, whereas it requires obviously more art to stop a coming blow, as well as more pluck to face an ugly knock on the nose or eyes. Accordingly it is nowise surprising that in the earliest records we find less mention of fighting with bare fists than of the simpler art of wrestling.

It is, perhaps, a curious coincidence that in the Old World as well as the New wrestling should have developed itself into three different styles. In the Greek arena of the classic ages, common wrestling, in which the competitors took what hold they could, seems to have occupied a sort of middle place between out-wrestling—in which only the hands and wrists came into contact—and in-wrestling, which commenced with a close hold something like the Cornish "hug," and ended in a struggle on the ground. In the Homeric contest, long before these distinctions had grown up, the two kings who condescended to enter the lists faced one another rather after the manner of our North-country performers. The hands of each were stretched behind the back of the other; the feet were far apart, and the bodies arched forward. Although belts were worn, and indeed were put on specially for the encounter, it does not appear that any hold was taken of them. Nor is it quite clear whether the two hands of each man clasped one another, or caught at the skin of the other man, though the last seems the more likely view, as the poet so pointedly describes the discoloured wheals which rose on the flesh of the wrestlers. But in later times, when the wearing of even a simple belt was prohibited by law in Sparta and abandoned in all parts of Greece, the best hold would probably be that of the clasped hands; for the body of each man was abundantly covered with oil, and any attempt at catching hold of it would probably have ended in failure and defeat.

Wrestling in the Middle Ages was a pastime of the lower sort of people, and was seldom or never engaged in by the knights and barons, whose heavy armour would have sadly interfered with any attempt to make it useful to them in the field after a fall from their horses. In Lodge's Rosalynde, the original upon which As You Like It is founded, King Torismund of France appoints a day of tournament and wrestling, the former for men of gentle birth, and the latter for peasants and yeomen. And when Rosader—the Orlando of the Shakspearian drama—strips to engage in the latter sport, "the company grieved that so goodly a young man should venture in so base an action." This account, whatever its authority, gives a very remarkable and no doubt pretty faithful picture of the old manner of wrestling. The champion, who by command of the King stood up to face all comers, was a Norman of great stature and corpulence; and it is clear that the dread he inspired amongst the challengers was due chiefly to his habit of falling upon the vanquished opponent. He had, as the "novel" says, killed many by falling upon them; and on the day of the grand display he disposed of his first antagonist in this way. The elder son of the valiant Franklin, who had brought his children to contend, was crushed to death by the huge weight of the champion. The second, who appears to have been thrown over the big man's shoulder by the device known to Cornish wrestlers as the "flying horse," fell on his head and dislocated his neck. It was then that Rosader, promising to avenge the Franklin, stepped into the lists in spite of all efforts to dissuade him. The first bout resulted in a dog-fall, by the violence of which both were so much exhausted as to be forced to breathe a while. In the second the challenger threw the Norman, by what method we are not told, "falling upon his chest with so willing a weight that he yielded nature her due." There is an eloquence in this expression of "willingness" which will remind the profane reader of Bell's Life in bygone days of many a round in the prize ring, the description of which ended with the words "falling heavily upon him." But perhaps the most notable thing in the whole of the story in Rosalynde is the statement that Rosader before entering the lists pulled off his boots, showing that nothing at all in the shape of Devonshire wrestling was permitted.

Other centuries afford us some glimpses of wrestling practised as a popular amusement on the usual holidays. On St. James's Day and Lammas Day there used to be a match between London and Westminster at St. Giles-in-the-Fields. At the Feast of St. Bartholomew there was wrestling before the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, who were dressed for the occasion in their official costume. The most ancient prizes in England seem to have been either a cock or a ram: but it seems that in prosperous times white bulls, horses with saddle and bridle, gold rings, gloves, and even casks of wine, were offered for competition. But the sport was not well kept up, except in the West and North, for long after the Reformation. It was relegated to professional exhibitors at bear-gardens and fairs, and only saved from complete disuse amongst what we may call amateurs by the efforts of the few who continued to admire it as a beneficial exercise. Thus in 1730 we read of Oxford students being fined for not going to the wrestling matches held on summer evenings. At about the same time it was the custom for the squire in many parishes to give a beaver hat once every year to be wrestled for by the villagers. A little later Sir Thomas Parkyns, who seems to have counted among his pupils some persons of high distinction in the State, made a valiant attempt to revive the sport, which he recommended not only as a pastime, but as a convenient substitute for the mischievous practice of duelling. But even the exhortations of these well meaning persons who pleaded for the revival of wrestling were thwarted to some extent by an absurd theory, spread abroad by the doctors of the period, to the effect that it was a common cause of rheumatism and ague. Another writer declares that the sport did not for more than a century and a half recover from the blow dealt it by the restrictions put upon the amusements of the people during the rebellion. But about sixty years ago there was a grand revival, and from 1826 forwards wrestling has again commanded in this country some of the admiration and support it deserves.

The times at which our several distinct schools of wrestling became separated and acquired for themselves a local habitation and a name cannot be distinctly traced. But from the earliest the West-country wrestlers must have had a style of their own, and the North-countrymen one of a very different kind, while several others would be recognized in other parts of the country. In one of the most ancient drawings we have, dating back beyond the reign of Edward III., the two combatants have loose scarves passed round their necks, at which they clutch, holding one another at arm's length. In Henry VII.'s reign at a festival at Greenwich, several champions stood forth to contend with all comers at wrestling "in all manner of ways." There is, however, much reason to suppose that neither then nor for a long time after did any of those "manners" include the Devonshire style. For about two hundred and fifty years ago the West-country wrestlers, then accounted undeniably the best in England, entered the ring in their doublets and hose, and clearly wore no boots or shoes. The practice of kicking appears to have grown up gradually after this time in Devonshire out of the perfectly lawful habit of "striking" with the leg at the leg. Boys and men in Devonshire often settled a private quarrel by a bout at wrestling, and the impromptu umpires who supervised such contests would not be able to distinguish between a fair "strike" and a veritable kick. The spectators often rather liked the innovation, which made the struggle more sensational, and thus the use of the shoe had come to be recognized to some extent before the middle of the last century—as we know from a book which recommends that kicks should be met by standing low and parrying or stopping with the knee. In the meantime also the West-countrymen had more strictly defined several laws on disputed points. The rule as to a fall in this district was that one shoulder and the heel on the side opposite must touch the ground before the man could be called fairly thrown; if he was "endangered" only—that is, if he was thrown, but not in proper style—a "foil" was scored against him. In articles drawn up for a set match more than a century ago it is stipulated that "whichever man shall throw the other the first three falls, or give him nine foils, three foils to be accounted one fall, or give him falls and foils enough to amount together to three falls, shall have the two sums of 20l. each" staked by the two parties. In some rules, dated about the same time for West-country wrestling, it is enacted that "he who first comes with two joints to the ground, as joints are counted in wrestling, shall be reputed to be thrown a fall." The prize at this time was a beaver hat worth 25*s.*; and any man who sold the hat after winning it was to be disqualified from competing the next year. In these contests, held apparently by the Devonshire and Cornwall men living in London, shoes might be worn, but no nails were allowed in the soles. Until the end of the last century, although kicking seems to have been uncommon, there was much roughness in the play. One of the authors recommends his pupils, if they have long hair, to soap it well, so that the adversary, if he clutches it, may not get a good hold. From another allusion made by the same writer, it appears that it was not an uncommon manœuvre for a man to get "his hands at your hair and his thumbs in your eyes." Possibly a more irregular style of wrestling was then allowed in the prize ring than in mere wrestling contests, for Sir T. Parkyns gives some special directions under the head of "boxing" which seem to be more barbarous than the rest. Here is one of them:—"The best holds are the Pinion, with your arms at his shoulders and your head in his face; or get your right arm under his chin and your left behind his neck, and let your arms close his neck strait by holding each elbow with the contrary hand, and crush his neck, your fingers in his eyes, and your fingers of your right hand under his chin, and your left hand under the hinder part of his head." This elaborate, but no doubt singularly effective system of attack, clearly needs some practical illustration to be correctly understood; but the next prescription is much simpler—"or twist his head round by putting your hand to the side of his face and the other behind his head."

These directions are contained in a book upon Cornish wrestling which claimed to be the first ever published. It explains in detail, and sometimes more distinctly than in the above quotations, the various holds and throws—the in-clamp and back-clamp, the hanging trip, the in-lock and back-lock, once well known to Ulysses, the son of Laertes—the flying horse, and others too numerous to mention. The men wore stout waistcoats and shirts, and caught hold by these or by the band of the breeches. They wrestled in a large ring, thirty yards in diameter, and one "sidesman" on each side was allowed in the ring. Kicking was at this time an established practice with the Devonshire men, though tabooed in Cornwall: and it was upon their expertness with the shoe that the former chiefly relied in their contests with the men of the neighbouring county. The most celebrated of these encounters took place in 1826, at Devonport, before 20,000 spectators, between Cann, a Devonian, and Polkinhorne, the Cornish champion, weighing nearly sixteen stone. Cann wore one shoe, with which he "occasionally dealt severe kicks at his opponent to weaken his legs." Polkinhorne, who wore no shoes, submitted to this punishment with what patience he could, and after some disputed falls was adjudged to take the prize. His victory was succeeded about two years after by another striking success in London, where, out of twenty-six competitors, half Cornish and half Devon, the Cornish men won first and second prize.

Cumberland and Westmoreland wrestling—now much more commonly seen in London than the other kind, is altogether different from it both in rules and in style. Before the actual struggle begins both men must have fair hold by clasping their hands behind one another's back. To loose this hold, once taken, is to lose the bout; and the same result follows if a man touches the ground with a knee or any other part except the feet. This kind of wrestling was introduced, rather than revived, in London in 1839, when there was a grand contest, at which no fewer than 200 entered, and ever since that, with but very few intermissions, the Northerners have continued their annual Easter meeting. The only other system which needs particular mention is the Lancashire, or "catch-as-catch-can" wrestling, which differs in little but in the mode of taking hold from the other North-country variety. There are thus, if the Devon and Cornwall styles are reckoned as one, three distinct kinds of wrestling in England, each having its merits and defects. The rules as to falling are, no doubt, simpler and better in the North-country codes; for the distinction between fair back-falls and other falls is difficult to draw and productive of disputes. Still more unpopular in this country is the French system, by which the use of the leg, either in striking or hanching, is prohibited altogether, and the men, after falling, continue the struggle on the ground till one is fairly on his back. On the other hand, the obligation to retain a hold as first caught is artificial, and deprives the art of much of its practical value; for in an actual scuffle no man could wait to begin until his adversary had a fair hold. The Devonshire style is of course condemned by every one except Devonshire men, for nothing can be more barbarous or more destructive of fairness than to degrade the encounter into a kicking match, in which each man's shins are gradually disabled by cuts and bruises. The golden mean would perhaps be arrived at by a rule allowing the men to take what hold they can, and throw their opponent as they like. Any wrestler who was good at out-play would then have a chance to finish the combat without coming to close quarters, while one who preferred in-play would endeavour to rush in, and, as the Cornishmen say, "go to the grips." Full scope would be then allowed for the out-wrestler's "chips," such as outside and inside striking, haming, hankering, and twining over, as well as for cross-buttocking, hanching, hipeing, and the devices in which in-players excel.

TWO IRISH BOOKS AND A MORAL.

WE have before us two books by Irish authors which, in externals and nominal contents, are sufficiently different. The one is the Occasional Papers which Messrs. Kegan Paul have just published for Lord O'Hagan; the other, a Birthday Book of extracts, signed "Melusine," and bearing the imprint of Messrs. Sampson Low. Lord O'Hagan is so much of an Irishman in the best sense of the term (if we may borrow the language of a celebrated testimonial) that he is not likely, although he is an ex-Lord Chancellor, and although his book is a serious book, to object to seeing it coupled with an anonymous lady's collection of scraps. On the other hand, "Melusine" (who seems to have taken her cognomen from emulation of the Speranzas and Thomasines of the Nation) is much too much of an Irishwoman, not perhaps quite in the best sense of the term, to object to her romantic pseudonym being yoked to the name of anybody beginning in O', provided he is not an Orangeman, which it need hardly be said Lord O'Hagan is not. Moreover there is a moral in the conjunction, which shall appear in due time.

Lord O'Hagan's papers, whereof there are some fifteen or sixteen, deal with a large variety of subjects, and represent (of course by selection only) the leisure work of at least thirty years, if not more. The earliest dated paper, so far as we have noticed, is the interesting lecture on "The Hopes of Irish Progress," which was delivered in 1853. These hopes, let us remark, though the author will no doubt differ with us, have simply failed of realization for the most part because of the perverse misconduct of his own political party, which has fed the flame of Irish disorder by Disestablishments and Land Acts. Not a few of the articles are, like this, devoted to questions of social and political economy. Two or three are professional, on Criminal Law Reform, on International Law, on the comparison of different systems of jurisprudence. There are complimentary addresses, such as those headed "Cardinal Newman" and "Henry Grattan," sometimes addressed to living persons, sometimes written on the occasion of centenaries, statue unveilings, and the like. By far the most interesting of these is, as might be expected, that on O'Connell. Finally, there are purely literary papers, such as those on Coleridge and Moore. They are all scholarly and creditable pieces of work, worthy of their author's position, and justifying that position. There is not perhaps in them any marked originality of thought, or any very exceptional distinction of style; but the thought is rarely anything but clear, honest, and respectable, and the style is always finished according to the best models, and free alike from slovenliness and over-ornament. For any man, and especially for any man whose profession is not literature, but who, on the contrary, has had heavy professional employment of other kinds throughout the greater part of his life, this book is a book which he may look at with satisfaction on his shelves, and take down from them certainly not without satisfaction.

We should imagine, however, that of the two productions "Melusine's" is the one which will actually give most of this kind of delight to its author. "Melusine's" Birthday Book is, physically speaking, a very pretty little book indeed, and its characteristics remind us of a delightful ditty which we once heard from Irish lips, and quote with all reserves:—

Me father and mother were Oirish,
And Oi was Oirish tu,
And we bought a kettle for noinpence,
And that was Oirish tu.

The cover of the Irish Birthday Book is, "Melusine" tells us, made of Irish linen, and certainly there is no better. On that cover there is a sweet Irish cross, with a sun-burst behind it, and shamrocks wreathed about its foot in a mighty pretty manner. The book is dedicated, "without permission!" says the author, with a charmingly feminine and Irish note of interjection, to Irish people all over the world, and the first sentence of the preface puts the comether on us in the most illigant fashion by observing: "There is no prose in the Irish Birthday Book for May or June, because they are the months in which, with fresh leaves, pure bright flowers, and sunnier skies, all nature seems to breathe poetry." These were the sentiments, no doubt, which animated some recent Irish martyrs when they took a walk through the Phœnix Park two years ago on May the 6th. But this reflection is worthy only of a brutal Saxon.

Unluckily, on narrower inspection of the contents of this pretty little volume, compact of cool drab linen, gold crosses, and prefatory remarks about flowers and nature, it is found to be (what, indeed, the too experienced mind forebodes from the sun-burst and all the rest of it) simply an anthology of the kind of maudlin and mischievous rant and babble to which Irish people all over the world owe nearly all their misfortunes, as they are pleased to call them. On February 17 the mild and spring-like voice of Mr. Timothy Healy thus speaks from the page:—"England maintains in Ireland a very large garrison; some are uniformed as policemen, some as soldiers, some as militia, and some wear the ermine." On July 29 (it should surely have been May 6) Mr. Sullivan informs the readers of the Birthday Book that "We Irish are no race of assassins or glorifiers of murder." On October 12 Lady Wilde observes to the world that "The English, as a nation, have none of it [the gift of fascination], though capable of splendid acts of individual generosity"; which may be true enough, but seems oddly placed in a Birthday Book, unless the object is to excite hatred and contempt towards the unfascinating people. On January 6, severed from all context, having no meaning except as a general appeal to passion, is this cheerful passage from Mitchel. "For the next two weeks, awaiting the result of this trial, all things stood still in Ireland except the famine and the addresses of confidence from landlords, and the typhus fever, and the clearing of estates, and the wail of the Banshee." The 29th of January has for epigraph that sublime absurdity of Moore's, which in his works is pardonable enough, but by itself is a standing satire on Irish patriotism:—

On our side is virtue and Erin,
On theirs is the Saxon and guilt.

This couplet, it should be observed, even Irish patriots of advanced type have been known to characterize as a hasty generalization. Elsewhere "a ballad of '98," called "The Patriot Mother," contributes its loyal advice. The 4th of March, however, records such a delightful bull that we are obliged to Melusine for having given it us. John Mitchel, it seems, who, to do him justice, was not usually a dealer in that sort of cattle, remarked that "the aspiration for Irish nationhood will outlive the British Empire." Now men do not aspire for what they have got, and as it seems that after the British Empire has perished Ireland will still not be a nation, surely Irishmen, as reasonable beings, need not do anything to accelerate an event which is to do them no good. This, however, does not seem to have been the way in which Melusine reads Mitchel, for elsewhere she borrows the exhortation:—

And rend the cursed Union
And fling it to the wind,
And Ireland's laws in Ireland's cause
Alone our hearts should bind.

As a gloss whereon it suggests itself that, when the cursed Union is rent, there will be a good many heads, as well as hearts, which will require binding. On July 3 Speranza informs us that "America is the great teacher of the nations, and her lessons will eventually lead the world." Poor world! Then the same authority lays it down that "The English are grateful for benefits to self; the Irish are grateful for sympathy with their country;" and that, "Wherever the Greeks passed they left a trail of light, but England a trail of blood." An author named Donal Sullivan indignantly protests against the notion that Emmet was a traitor.

And now, if it be asked why we have coupled this collection of veiled sedition and not at all veiled petty spite of race with Lord O'Hagan's respectable work, animated certainly by a very different spirit, there is not much difficulty in giving an answer. The spirit of the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland is different, and yet it is in a way the same—a great deal too much the same—as "Melusine's." Of course Lord O'Hagan talks no folly about '98; does not vapour about the harp of Erin and the sun-burst and the shamrock and the rest of it; does not inform Englishmen that they are not only the greatest tyrants, but the most disagreeable and objectionable human beings of whom history tells (it surely, by the way, does not say much for Ireland that she let herself be conquered by such a crew), or anything of the kind. A gentleman, a scholar, a man of sense, a man of the world, a man of business, is not very likely to stoop to the follies of schoolgirls and shopboys, the commonplaces of political adventurers and lackalls on the look-out for endowment. But such a passage as the following is "for thoughts":—"Dynasties have been exalted and destroyed . . . during the centuries which have seen Ireland always distracted, always weak, always miserable. For her only there was no redemption; to her only hope came not that came to all. She had no place in the march of the nations, no profit from the revolutions of the world." Fudge! my lord, fudge! and, what is more, known fudge! To the ear there may be no actual historical falsity in the statement that Ireland was generally (not always) distracted, weak, and miserable; to the sense which Lord O'Hagan knows that thousands of his countrymen and countrywomen, like the simple lady who has compiled our Birthday Book will put on it, it is utterly false. The place in the march of nations has never been refused to Ireland, except in the sense that for the last thousand years, at any rate, it has been refused to Kent and Devonshire. If hope did not come to her it was because she chose and chooses to hope for nothing reasonable. She was not redeemed because there was nothing to redeem her from, except evils which time cured in her case as in the case of all the world, but which were aggravated and their cure retarded by her own fault. So long as men like Lord O'Hagan refuse to hold plain language of this kind to their countrymen, so long as, in however guarded a way and with whatever scholarly phrase and dress, they give countenance to the fable of Irish persecution, the delusion of Irish nationality, the baseless fabric of Irish grumbles, so long will there be an excuse for the rants of a Davis and a Speranza, the agitations of an O'Connell and a Parnell. A very famous admirer of Richardson's heroine has observed that "there is always something which Clarissa prefers to the truth." That is the curse of Erin no less than of Clarissa. Irishmen of one class won't speak truth, and Irishmen of another won't hear it. By far the greater part of the woes of Ireland were home-made, and by far the larger part of the rest were woes which most, if not all, other nations have gone through and got the better of. But these nations have not gone about puling or fuming about wrongs, or fiddling with sun-bursts and shamrocks, or pleading against their partners by manifest destiny for the portion of goods that falleth to them and a separate establishment. They have put their shoulders with those partners to the common work and rejoiced in the common weal. This is the simple truth, and this is what the Melusines cannot see, and, we are sorry to add, what even the Lord O'Hagans appear to be extremely careful not to speak.

CHARLES READE AND HENRY BYRON.

TWO leading figures have disappeared together from the literary scene. The first died in the fulness of time as years are counted, but older than his years from a sorrow which made the close of his life a weariness. The second was taken away in his prime, but after a long and wasting illness which had prepared his friends to welcome for him a release. Both were men who influenced and delighted many by their varied and continuous work, and both are a standing protest against the miserable spirit of unkindly depreciation of all cotemporary workers in the fields of fiction, which unceasingly animates a certain school of criticism. Their text is one on which they never fail to enlarge, and as they once worded it it is this—Novel-writing in England is "a lost art, and survives in France only." We remember the Times affirming this in connexion with the name of M. Victor Cherbuliez, who was described as better known to fame than all the English novelists put together; this, by-the-bye, was while Trollope was still alive amongst others. Not long afterwards, travelling in Italy, we turned over the books at an outlying railway station. Of fifteen volumes of fiction, eleven were English, and of the four in French, three were translations from the English. So we took heart of grace. It is of course not only in the field of letters that the bad English fault of depreciation of everything English is so besetting, and we can scarcely wonder at foreign critics being so apt to take us at the estimate of our own. The truth about novel-writing is that in England its average never stood so high, and that the principles of the work were never so well understood. What its detractors mean, where they mean anything, is that Thackeray and Dickens are dead. So are the greater Dumas and George Sand. And the amount of knowledge required of those who are allowed to take this tone cannot be better measured than by a criticism which has just appeared in the Times on Mr. Crawford's novel To Leeward. To anybody acquainted in the most superficial way with the letters of the day, Mr. Crawford's name is now a household word. But the Times twice refers to him as "the authoress," apparently because his Christian name is Marion. And this is the sort of knowledge required of our instructors!

To those who really know their work, Charles Reade and Henry Byron, different as they were in all other ways, were among the many living answers to the charge of decadence. Now that they have followed the innumerable caravan, and belong, alas! no longer to those whom De Quincey, in this same connexion, once described as "the not inconsiderable class of men who have not the advantage of being dead,' there will be plenty of regrets heard where there was little but petty cavil before. They have passed beyond the susceptibility to pain which all sensitive spirits feel at the touch of the kind of defamation we have described; and, therefore, why waste time on them? "On il n'y a rien, la rancune perd ses droits." It must have been some such squire as this who invented the nonsensical "De mortuis nil nisi bonum" as a salve to his conscience for his aphorism of preference, "De vivis nil nisi malum."

Charles Reade was neither a Dickens nor a Thackeray. But he was for all that—and, in the interest of English letters, it cannot be too plainly or firmly said—a great and a fine novelist. For, first of all, he was a creator; and creation is the touchstone, if touchstone there be. His men and women, the last particularly, were true and breathing flesh and blood; and no writer in the language, Thackeray and Dickens not excepted, ever showed the bloom of English girlhood in a brighter and more sympathetic light. His young lovers, those stumbling-blocks of the novelist, of whom even Walter Scott could make but little, have a singular attraction for the kindred soul. Chiefly among them in our memory live the healthy and direct young couple whose simple, faithful passion runs like a golden thread through the painful madhouse story (too painfully true in all its detailed possibilities, we fear, cheap and easy as it is to dismiss them as "overdrawn") and makes all the pulses, of those who have any, thrill with theirs. Among our own favourite heroines of fiction that delicious Julia Dodd, with no particular characteristics which might not belong to any good English girl in the world, holds a foremost place. Contrast with her Reade's "Peg Woffington," the actress—the erring but womanly woman, who sometimes so supersedes the real Peg in our minds that we forget the "bad voice" which marred her effects, and the great artistic superiority of the real Kate Clive to the real Woffington; and, again, that perfect chrysolite of a girl of quite another type, the bonnie fishwife "Cirsty" Johnstone, and Charles Reade's gallery of feminine portraits will stand comparison with those of higher-rated men. Indeed, we suspect that his habit of rushing violently at every sort of windmill his imagination could raise may have prevented his being generally assigned a higher place than he can, perhaps, so far be said to have won. That he will rise higher now we believe. The chief critical objection to his work, so far as we understand it, has been that it is "too melodramatic," a charge especially levelled at what, in our judgment, remains on the whole his best and most characteristic work—It is Never too Late to Mend. As the story is a melodrama, the charge may be admitted; and in the name of common sense why not? The novel form embraces everything, which is, indeed, its special charm, from the still-life pictures of Miss Austen to the wild fervours of Ouida; and in some of its very highest flights fiction has been pure melodrama. Certainly Scott did not shrink from it when he wrote The Bride of Lammermoor; certainly Shakespeare did not when he conceived Macbeth. As it appears to us, no better groundwork for an interesting novel can be found.

Charles Reade has one rare title to be remembered. He was what few Englishmen have been, a novelist and dramatist who made high mark in both lines. As a dramatist, indeed, he was, in our opinion, of a great capacity, which he did not use as he might have used it, through the unfortunate conditions of our stage. Those very flesh-and-blood qualities in his people, his strong and terse English, his love of incident and action, are the things that make the great dramatist. It is Never too Late to Mend, in its stage shape, is the best of modern home-grown melodramas, and the most unvaryingly popular. It is admirably constructed in the only true sense, in that the interest leads one on progressively from scene to scene. That is the only construction for which the public cares. Unluckily the word has become a sort of shibboleth in the mouth of the modern theatrical manager and critic, and is applied to what is construction in no real sense at all, but means merely a kind of technical dominoes, destructive of life and reality, wherein everybody makes pat entrances and exits according to a feeble system of cues. The technical master of that craft is usually an inferior actor or acting-manager, who picks up his unconsidered trifles (if possible unacknowledged) in the way of story and thought, to dress them out in theatrical (not dramatic) frippery of his own. His English is of the stage conventional, not of the language human; and he is ever ready with his manuscripts at the stage-door, while the real dramatist shrugs his shoulders, and writes a novel or an essay. No matter how often the mere playmaker fails with the public, the managers are so thoroughly conventionalized that they still believe in him. If anybody brings them a play in English, they gaze in terror on the unknown tongue. And a man like Reade ends by writing plays but rarely, and when he does produce them, by producing them for himself. It is the experience of many authors who still believe in drama as a fine form of fiction, and in humanity and English as its essentials, but know that between them and their best critics and friends the public (as being humanity in the aggregate how could they be otherwise) there is a huge gulf of "expert" nonsense widening every day. The Times, proceeding on the usual lines, accuses Charles Reade of ignorance of construction. It is the mere tool of the art; and a great architect might as well be accused of knowing nothing about circles and straight lines.

Now Henry Byron, whom we have coupled in this article with Charles Reade, because theirs were among the best-known names of English stage-writers, knew and followed these foolish rules too well. So unfair and impossible are the critical judgments passed upon the unlucky playwright, that Byron was constantly reproached for using the very tricks with whose absence Reade was reproached. Holding of drama the views that we do hold, we sympathize more with the former reproach than with the latter. And if we hold it not ungenerous to say so now, it is because a better time could scarcely be found to point out the contrast between the dramatist and the playwright. Moreover it enables us to call direct attention to the high and delightful qualities to which, in Byron's case (probably because of his over-knowledge of what the French call la ficelle, as distinguished from true dramatic construction), full justice was never done. The world, in its growing greyness of tone and thought—if thought indeed it be, and not the merest affectation of it—cannot afford to ignore its few and restful humourists, especially those in whom, as in Byron, the humour was not more spontaneous than it was pure. In comedy after comedy, in scene after scene, it fell from him in an untiring succession of fun and good-nature, which to the work-tired soul was an unfailing delight. Only the old spirit of carping home-depreciation could so extol as it does indifferent foreign humour at the expense of our own Byrons and Burnands. As a punster (in his best shape a true wit) Byron had no superior, living or dead; and his best sayings, better and more untiring than his best writings, are a possession for ever to his friends. We do not care to quote any of them just now, while the sense of his loss is fresh upon us; but we hope that among his many allies some one qualified for the work will be found to collect and record them as far as it can be done. A nation's pleasure is poorer for the loss both of Byron and of Reade; and it is but a proper tribute to their memory, so sadly united, to say that no men ever gave truer proof of warm and kindly hearts than those two worthy inheritors of the undying traditions of English letters, or left warmer and more regretful friends behind them.

THE "UNIVERSAL PROVIDER."

MR. AUBERON HERBERT'S very clever letter to the Times on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill deserves more attention than it is likely to receive. For this comparative neglect Mr. Herbert has himself to thank. He is so often to be found crying "Wolf!" that, when the animal is really there, his natural exclamations pass unheeded. Mr. Herbert's general dissatisfaction with both political parties, and his habit of promiscuously imputing evil motives to all politicians, have almost destroyed the influence which he might otherwise have exercised. If a man ostentatiously pines for intellectual solitude, the world, which is good-natured and occupied with other things, will leave him in the enjoyment of his isolated position. It would be both useless and ill-bred to chase John the Baptist from his wilderness, or to assure him that, after all, his opinions are not peculiar to himself. But, apart from personal considerations, the important point is, not whether an acrid critic wishes for supporters, but whether what he says is true. People who do not agree with Mr. Herbert are not necessarily, as he seems to assume, idiots or hypocrites. It so happens, however, that he talks a good deal of sense in a paradoxical form, and that much of it is at this moment singularly opportune. The particular Bill which Mr. Herbert assails in his letter is no doubt exceedingly well meant. It is directed against juvenile prostitution, against brothels, against solicitation in the public streets. The objects are most excellent, and it is warmly advocated by bishops and other serious people. Nevertheless it is, as Mr. Herbert points out, based on no principle, or rather on a confusion of two principles. Much of it is directed against public nuisances, and open disorder, things which no one will deny that it is the business of Parliament to put down. Other portions of it can only be defended on the supposition that the Legislature ought to suppress vice—a doctrine which leads by irresistible logic to the inference that right and wrong can be determined or distinguished by a Parliamentary majority. The Radical candidate who promised to vote for the abolition of the Decalogue if Her Majesty's Government brought in a well-considered measure for that purpose is generally supposed to have been imperfectly acquainted with the anglicized Greek word for the Ten Commandments. But, according to ideas, or shadowy simulacra of ideas, which are very popular just now with a section of the Radical party, morality is really a branch of municipal law. A Bill was once brought in to amend the law of evidence, and on the back of it was the name of a member of the present Government. It provided that a prisoner might give evidence on his trial, but that his omission to do so should not prejudice him with the jury. This touching tribute to the omnipotence of Parliament is scarcely a caricature of some notions which now prevail. A great many people talk and write as if a vote of the House of Commons could alter facts, and the law of gravitation could be repealed by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled. There are politicians quite capable of moving that ginger be no longer hot in the mouth as an amendment to the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair on going into Committee of Supply. If Dr. Johnson had been suddenly transplanted to Petersburg or Constantinople, he would probably have acknowledged that the difference between one form of Government and another was worth more than half a guinea. But there was truth in his exaggerated declaration. Men cannot be made sober or moral by Act of Parliament. They cannot be made comfortable by legislation, or taught prudence and self-control by Artisans' Dwellings Acts. These are truisms. But if Mr. Malthus still gazes upon this sublunary scene, he may well smile at the indignant denunciations of his famous formula, and at the cheap remedies which are gravely proposed for the miseries of mankind.

All the Georges in San Francisco cannot make the soil inexhaustible. The most impassioned rhetoric, the most fervent appeals to the intentions of Providence (which mean the writer's own) will not aid the increase of subsistence, or make men multiply more slowly. Brand-new houses, built at the expense of taxpayers very few of whom are rich, will not make their inhabitants sober and frugal, or prevent them from marrying when they cannot afford it. Mr. George may talk nonsense till Doomsday without putting an additional piece of bread into anybody's mouth. E pur si muove. The conditions of human existence will not be changed because a number of fashionable and philanthropic persons take an interest in the "dwellings of the poor." Yet the Radical optimist goes gaily on. To do him justice, he probably never faces the logical conclusions from his premisses. He does not think of looking beyond the moment when his favourite project shall have become law. Shut up public-houses and there will be no drunkenness. Make solicitation illegal, and there will be no prostitution. If a thing is unlawful, of course it cannot be done, and so there is an end of it. All this is very cheerful and consoling to some minds. It is a pity, however, not to carry the principle one step further. There is a certain document, styled rather tautologically the Queen's Proclamation against Vice and Immorality, which is read at the opening of all Assizes. Why not turn it into an Act of Parliament, and thus make everybody well behaved at once? The modern Radical of this particular type has, perhaps, forgotten that there were laws against usury, and that there was a man called Jeremy Bentham. It was supposed that, if high interest were prohibited, it would never be exacted. Bentham argued, and experience proved, that the nett result of this prohibitory law was to make interest with bad security rather higher than before. For, besides the risk of the borrower not having the cash, there was the chance of incurring penalties, and for that compensation had to be paid to the money-lender. The latest theory appears to be that, if the sale of strong drink is forbidden on Sundays, people will cease to consume it in excess between Saturday and Monday. There is something very seductive about Sunday closing. It has a religious sound. It makes for a decent observance of the day of rest. It looks philanthropic and respectable, and then it cannot be such a very great hardship to shut up public-houses one day out of seven. There are a great many otherwise sensible persons who resemble George Eliot's Mr. Brooke in shrinking from anything like a principle. Mr. Brooke opined that human reason might carry you too far—over the hedge, in fact. So he pulled up. These worthy persons also pull up. They belong to the same type as Cardinal Newman's Moderate Churchman, who believed in baptismal regeneration, but thought that babies were much the same after being christened as before. They would not for worlds lay down the proposition that the State ought to decide when people should drink, and how much, and whether they ought to drink at all on Sunday. On the other hand, they would recoil in horror from the principle that there is a province where the will of the individual ought to be supreme, where his choice should be quite unfettered, and where the law can only interfere ineffectually and at a serious cost to personal convenience and national independence. A Sunday Closing Bill just suits them. It is neither one thing nor the other. It only prevents people from doing what nice people would never want to do.

An intelligent American, on being asked what was the tendency of the New England liquor laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drink to all except bond fide travellers, replied that they "tended to a considerable deal of bond fide travelling." Outraged liberty has her revenges, not occasional, but constant; and if Parliament, as has been shrewdly remarked, were to decree that all men should be virtuous, the courts would soon declare the majority to be so "within the meaning of the Act." That is perhaps the principal consolation of humble believers in personal freedom, now so hopelessly outnumbered in Parliament and on the platform. A despotism tempered by physical and moral impossibilities is less formidable than it seems. The Irish magistrate's very indecorous advice to the accused publican is capable of indefinite expansion. We can all "defy the polis" in our own quiet way. Another source of consolation is the inbred dislike of Britishers to being driven. The political party which goes in for a programme of high-handed restriction and incessant interference all round gathers for itself a store of unpopularity which it will have to face in the long run. The present Opposition has already perceived this truth, and is beginning to make use of it, though "with timid and faltering steps," as Lord Randolph Churchill would say. Even in the ranks of their adversaries the old "Why the devil shouldn't he?" style of Liberal is destined to reappear; for he is a perennial type, which survives the "countless generations" of faddists, who "depart and leave no vestige where they trod." Nothing, indeed, can be more alien to the old school of secular Liberalism than this fashionable worship of the omniscient state. We should feel quite ashamed to repeat against it the unanswerable argument which exposed the fallacy of the analogy between the paternal and the Governmental relation. The pious and respectable Nonconformists who only call themselves Liberals because they hate the Church of England are doing a work which Conservatives may regard with perfect equanimity. Their narrow intolerance, their puritanical hatred of amusement, their love of vexatious and petty molestation, their total inability to see any reason why they should not make illegal anything which they think wrong, are causing an amount of public resentment of which they are little aware. The liberty which they claim for themselves they are the first to deny to others. They resent the superior position of the Church, and they are indignant at one small part of the restrictions imposed upon marriages within the degrees of affinity. If the Church were disestablished, and the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill passed, it is not easy to see what would remain of their Liberalism. But it is by no means difficult to estimate the amount of freedom which they would leave to the English people, if they had their way. The "coming slavery" which Mr. Herbert Spencer has graphically described would very soon be here. Taverns closed, probably also theatres, ginger-beer the only drink, drab the only wear, the liberty of individual choice limited to the selection of the particular Little Bethel it was least irksome to attend—the picture is indeed an attractive one. Perhaps before that ideal is realized there will be some one to say in behalf of the long-suffering inhabitants of these islands, "We like not the fashion of your garments. You will say they are Liberal attire, but let them be changed."

EMANUEL GEIBEL.

THE English newspapers which have commented on the death of Emanuel Geibel have scarcely understood the real nature of his literary position, and even German critics may readily mistake it. So great a chasm lies between the Germany of his youth and the Germany of his old age, so vast a change has come over the national ideals, that Geibel, who was much younger than Victor Hugo and younger than Lord Tennyson, seems to belong to a far more distant and unfamiliar generation than they. To comprehend his writings, we must recollect that he was the last and in some respects the most characteristic representative of the silver age of German poetry, the Shirley of the group that followed Goethe and Heine, as the Caroline dramatists followed Shakspeare. He has nothing to do with the political poets who, whatever we may think of their politics, certainly betrayed their purely poetical birthrights. About 1845 he was violently affected and disturbed by the wave of political discontent, with Herwegh and Freiligrath, his intimate friends, on the crest of it. But his nature, though excessively sensitive to superficial influences, swung back like a plant when the wind has passed over it; and in the midst of the political excitement Geibel unconsciously returned to the loves of his youth; his gentle humanism, his soft and thrilling melodies; and when he should have been addressing the intolerable verities, his clear voice was heard above the tumult:—

> O wie floss mir beglückt der Tag,
> Als ausrastend ich weilend
> Unter deinen Cypressen lag, > Naxos, blühendes Eiland!

With all this, his heart remained German to the core, and his pure song was none the less powerful because he held it aloof from the crowd. The German nation, which was slow to take him into observation, gradually formed a passion for his poetry, and this passion was only fed and sustained by the few political actions he performed. His attitude towards Schleswig-Holstein at the beginning of his career, his refusal to remain at Munich when to be a Bavarian meant something less than being a German—these things were not forgotten; and during the last years of his life Geibel lived at Lübeck, in a sort of sacred retirement, regarded with something of the same deep personal respect with which Mr. Whittier is regarded in America.

To discuss the actual value of Geibel's verses it would be necessary to go into the very difficult question of the quality of German lyrical verse, when it is not quite of the first order. The native tendency to song, to vocal accompaniment of a tune, is of doubtful advantage to German poetry, as an art. It is so easy to secure a lilt, to be naive and touching with a lyrical simplicity, that the poet is tempted to remain satisfied with improvisation. The wonderful magic of Heine has tempted later and less gifted singers to think that they can emulate his inimitable cadences. Yet Geibel was a real artist. He was undoubtedly influenced by Heine upon one side; his notes were brought out and expanded by the melodies of the Buch der Lieder; but he bore upon the surface of his genius the marks of other masters. The grace of Chamisso, the tenderness of Uhland, the plastic and versatile force of Platen, all combined to make him what he was. Indeed, it may be that criticism will eventually determine that Geibel was less an individual voice than a combination into one sweet and pure nature of much that was fine and harmonious in the various singers of a whole school.

The earlier part of Geibel's career, while he still walked among the elder companions of his school, is by far the most interesting to the student of literature, and we are able to follow this with unusual exactness. In 1869 Herr Karl Goedecke published the first volume of a biography of the poet, which really was an autobiography. This brought us down to the year 1852, and was to have been promptly succeeded by a second volume extending to 1868. This second part of the Life of Geibel has never, however, appeared, and the interest of the volume which exists is scarcely sustained to the close; for the main charm of Geibel's career consists in his relations to his contemporaries before he entered his thirtieth year. No doubt Herr Goedecke will now issue his long-promised continuation, and we shall find much in it which is worthy of attention. Until, however, he proves to us the contrary, we shall persist in thinking that Geibel's career subsided into something like comfortable commonplace after the King of Prussia secured him his pension in 1843. We may, then, turn over Herr Goedecke's earlier pages somewhat leisurely in a brief survey of the poet's adventures.

Emanuel Geibel (not von Geibel) was born at Lübeck on the 18th of October, 1815. There is very little of a curious kind related about his childhood, except that he fancied that the sight of tall sea-going ships among the quaint red walls and blossoming trees of his picturesque birthplace gave him an early tendency towards travel. He began to write verses at eighteen; one of the earliest pieces of his which have been preserved celebrates the hope of German unity in just the same mild and confident note of patriotism which he preserved to the last. The poet who was to sing so tenderly and passionately of love began by the inspiration of boyish friendship. His earliest subjective pieces are addressed to schoolfellows and fellow-students—some, like Ernst Curtius, to be identified with him in later life. In 1833 the Buch der Lieder came into his hands, and was promptly and voluminously imitated. His earliest verses, moreover, bear marked reminiscences of Kugler and Uhland. He went to Bonn in 1835, with the intention of training for the Church. His father was a pastor; and neither he nor his mother had any sympathy at all for Geibel's literary work, regretting what they considered his idle ways, even when he had attained distinction and public reward. It was characteristic of his nature that, with great sweetness and apparent ductibility, he possessed a steady and persistent will. He did comparatively little at Bonn, except make up his mind. He dropped theology altogether as a profession, and prepared himself for concentrated study of the humanities; and, thus prepared, he went to Berlin in 1836.

At Berlin he began the literary life. Rumohr gave him a letter of introduction to Bettina von Arnim, who talked to him a little about Goethe and a great deal about herself. He began to find himself within the influence of Eichendorff, who was just then a romantic power in Berlin. Already, from Bonn, Geibel had sent verses to the Musenalmanach, which Chamisso was editing in a sort of afterglow; and the young poet's great desire was to meet this veteran of letters. Hitzig contrived to introduce him, and one dark November morning Geibel found himself received in the gloomy room where, surrounded by globes and charts and scientific instruments, the old poet was solemnly playing at being a wizard and a seer. Chamisso, who rarely accepted a new acquaintance in those days of his decline, gave his friendship to the enthusiastic and charming lad, who began to be more and more spoken of as a coming man. In 1837 Geibel received the singular honour of being the only student who had ever been received into the Literarische Gesellschaft, a club of distinguished men of letters which met every Monday evening Unter den Linden at the Café National. Hither Geibel was taken by Chamisso, and here he met Eichendorff, Freiligrath, Kugler, and others whose names are now less well remembered than these, but who then were lights in literature. He began to give his thoughts mainly to the study of Greek poetry, and drifted further and further from the bourgeois ideal which the sober family in Lübeck set before him. The parents pressed him to prepare for a career—to bend himself to a clerkship or to read for a profession. He gently declined, to the amusement of friends like Bettina and Chamisso, who began to look about them for some better way of bread-winning. If he had remained in Berlin, there would have been nothing for him but journalism, and for this, too, he professed a mild and firm objection. Happily Prince Katakazis applied in December 1837 to his German friends for a tutor for his boys, and Bettina von Arnim moved heaven and earth till she had secured the post for Emanuel Geibel.

To go to Greece under such auspices was an exquisite pleasure to the young poet, whose friend Ernst Curtius was already settled in Athens. He set out in April in the old-fashioned leisurely way, leaving a volume of his poems behind him for publication. No sooner had he started southward than the lyrical impulse came upon him; each stage of his journey was marked with a poem. Driving by moonlight along the road from Verona to Vicenza, he composed "Gute Nacht," one of the most exquisite of his early lyrics:—

Und wie nun alle Kerzen
Verloschen durch die Nacht,
Da schweigen auch die Schmerzen,
Die Sonn' und Tag gebracht;
Und säuseln die Cypressen,
Ein redlich Vergessen
Durchweht die Lüfte sacht.
Schlafet in Ruh, schlafet in Ruh!
Vorüber der Tag und sein Schall;
Die Liebe Gottes deckt euch zu Allüberall.

His post lay not in Athens itself, but at a country village, Cephissia, where for three years he was privileged to teach the sufficiently idle and unruly sons of Prince Katakazis. His duties as a tutor were easy; he was very kindly treated, and when his charges had gone to bed, he was free to lean out over the fig-tree that bloomed at his window, and, inspired by the outlines of Pentelicus and by the cicalas chirping in the maize-fields, to relieve his feelings in reams of musical verse. Moreover, every fortnight he was allowed to ride off to spend a Sunday with his friends in Athens, where Curtius was, and Count Baudissin, who had been Tieck's partner in translating Shakespeare. Several things combined to make this the most fertile period in his career. The publication of the posthumous poems of Platen fired Geibel to new refinements of metrical form; the death of Chamisso made him realize that Freiligrath was the only living rival whom he had to fear. Suddenly came a letter breaking to him the news that the MS. of his poems, which he had left behind him, had been completely destroyed in the fire of a printing office at Magdeburg.

Far from deploring this accident, he rejoiced to think that so many of his crude early efforts were hopelessly lost. He would write other verses, and better ones. At last he fell sick of a fever, and was sent to the Piræus to be nursed. As soon as he was convalescent he started with Ernst Curtius for a voyage through the Cyclades, and this was perhaps the high-water mark of his intellectual activity. On their return, late in 1839, the two friends prepared for publication their first public essay, the Klassische Studien of 1840. Early in that year Geibel went home to Lübeck, and presently published the volume of Gedichte, dedicated to Clara Kugler, which is now reprinted under the sub-title of Erste Periode. Of this book of songs and elegies the ninety-third, but by no means the latest, edition now lies before us. The success of Lord Tennyson's most popular books, a success almost unequalled in the rest of poetical literature, is quite put in the shade by the astounding vogue of this volume of Geibel's—a vogue still sustained without any visible decline after more than forty years. The oddest thing is that the book was distinctly unsuccessful at first. The reviews overlooked it, or praised it faintly; for three years it scarcely sold at all; and then a second edition was timidly issued. It had existed five years before it began to be discovered by the general public, and ten years before it began to be the rage.

The whimsical public never attached itself with the like enthusiasm to any other book of Geibel's, though he wrote many, and to an ordinary ear sustained the same rather facile melody through them all. At Eschenberg, in 1842, he began his series of romantic dramas with König Roderich, and was never tired of repenting the experiment; but none of his plays, except perhaps Brunhild, enjoyed a definite success. Against the one hundred editions of his boyish poems he was glad to lay the four editions of his mature lyrics, his Spätherbstblätter, and among the volumes which divided the latter from the former each earlier one was more successful than its successor. The secret of the charm Geibel possessed lay without doubt, as we have hinted, in the purity, simplicity, and melody of his songs in an age when everything in German verse was tending to become turbid, involved, and harsh.

THE MILESTONES ON THE DOVER ROAD.

THE Dover Road occupies a proud position. It is no mere road to anywhere, to be mentioned with slighting, as when one says, "You turn up Goswell Street to go to Lincolnshire"; it may even deny, with flatness, that it either begins or ends at Dover; and as all roads led to Rome, so the roads of many travellers in all ages have led through Dover, as did that of one particular traveller—a foreigner of some distinction, as the phrase ran—with whom we are now concerned, and who embarked on board Captain Meriton's packet at Boulogne on Thursday, the 11th of April, 1765, on a trip to London. This skipper was employed the whole year round conveying to Dover, or even direct to London, cargoes of bottled wines which, on account of the enormous duties then levied on the wines of France, were imported by the merchants only according as they were wanted for actual consumption. The Methuen Treaty with Portugal, too, which was not abrogated until 1834, was in full force.

> "Let him drink port!" the English statesman cried;
> He drank the poison, and his spirit died.

The number of sail on the Channel—they had long been windbound—was "prodigious," the water seemed covered with them. With a soldier's wind most of them, including our skipper, made Dover three hours too soon, and had to anchor for the tide, while the miserable passengers who had been waiting in great numbers from long before the equinox had a bad time. Three or four crowded French craft from Calais and Dunkirk went ashore, but our traveller retained his faculties sufficiently to fortify his mind to the point of resignation to death, and even to philosophize, verifying from himself and those around him the saying of a captain in the French navy, that dwellers inland are much hardier afloat than those of maritime places, who from always looking on the sea develop an instinctive, exaggerated, and perhaps inherited dread of it. This is the radical cause of seasickness, a malady mainly of the nerves. If there be anything in this French captain's theory, your sailor's genuine land-lubber is the dweller in ports with whom he oftenest rubs shoulders. It may even be doubted whether it is quite clear that land-lubber (which, oddly enough, is not mentioned in Skeat) is the original or only term. Howell, in his Instructions for Forraine Travel, talking of fantastic fellows "like Sir Thomas Moore's Traveller," says they "may bee termed land-lopers, as the Dutchman saith." Here we have the same Dutch word looper, a runner, which is in "interloper"; and this sea-term, like so many others, may come to us from the Hollanders, may even have a direct reference to the landsman's want of his sea-legs, and need not, pace the etymologists, be connected at all with the Welsh llob, a dolt.

The Custom-house officials were lenient, but a crown had to be paid for passing each traveller's baggage as "droit de vicomté," which was farmed by an innkeeper of the town. The sole inhabitants of Dover were sailors, ship-captains, and innkeepers, and there was not a church or chapel in the place. The disproportionate size of the vast signboards of the inns, the height of the triumphal arches on which they spanned the streets, and the ridiculous magnificence of the ornaments which loaded them were worthy of all wonder when compared with the little postboys, or rather children of twelve and thirteen years of age, who were starting every minute in sole charge of postchaises. All the inns were crammed with new French arrivals, the coaches and the posting being quite insufficient for the rush, and our traveller had to go into the kitchen and take off the coals, with his own distinguished hands, one of the many tranches de bœuf there grilling. It is evident that the term "bifteck" had not then been invented. Nearly forty years later, Grimod de la Reyniere, in the Almanach des Gourmands for 1802-3, said it was worth while crossing the Channel to make the acquaintance of what the English called beef'steak, and Beauvilliers, who published his Art du Cuisinier in 1814, even then treated it as a novelty, telling how to prepare a "véritable Bifteck comme il se fait en Angleterre," and explaining how the English choose to make their biftecks that piece of the beef "qu'ils nomment Romesteck." Here the famous restaurateur who, according to Brillat-Savarin, spoke all foreign languages "autant qu'il était nécessaire à son commerce," seems to have got a little mixed; confusing beef with poultry, and the pope's-nose with the Eternal City. Our traveller put himself to bed at six in the afternoon, as a wise precautionary measure, for all the inmates were constantly playing Box and Cox with the four-posters, and at three in the morning he was called upon to turn out in favour of a new arrival. He held firm however in spite of a vigorous siege until five. Dover was so crammed that the strict rule of no coaches on Sunday was broken through, and he managed at last to set out on that day—three days after leaving Boulogne—with seven others in two conveyances called "machines originales ou volantes"; perhaps The Flyer or The Original, which, drawn by six horses, did the twenty-eight leagues to London in a day for a guinea a head; passengers' servants being carried outside for half-fare.

The English coachmen, one and all, who were changed with each relay of horses, astonished our traveller by their coats and capes, and their kind ways with their horses; the whip serving merely to keep the driver in countenance, like a lady's fan in winter-time. This Sunday journey had its advantages; there were no excisemen anywhere on duty, so the foreigners escaped all questioning and searches, and the only highwaymen encountered hung in chains—in periwig and full costume—on the gibbets along the road. But then there were disadvantages too. Foreseeing the absence of the "guagers," the boots of the coaches had been crammed with brandy-kegs for the wayside inns, and this caused frequent stoppages, much to the exhilaration of the coachmen and postillions. And then, to crown the humours of the road, the natives somewhere between Canterbury and Rochester had chosen Sunday as a handy, clear, coachless day on which to move a windmill and perfect windmill, chiefly consisting of whitewashed wooden trellis-work, in quiet security along the king's highway. This monstrous lumber the coaches found in possession of a deep cutting, and their freight had a greatly more material contest with it than was ever begotten of the imagination of Cervantes. At length, by dint of long ropes and strong arms they managed to get the old butt of chivalry past a gap in the roadbank, through which the coaches were hoisted out of the road into the fields where, more phlegmatic than the Don, they turned the obstacle's flank, and proceeded. Nowadays we can only hear with bootless regrets of the forests—"bois de haute futaye"—along the route, which still, in 1765, looked as well managed as the reserves in the best-kept forests of France. All that has gone to feed the "forges" or ironworks of the Weald, which can be traced back into the first century at Maresfield, and still lingered as late as 1825 at Ashburnham. And more than that, if the recent infernal borings for coal under the chalk were to succeed, Brighton would find itself to-morrow in the midst of a "black country," for the iron-ore is there—all that is lacking is the fuel. But, like our traveller's coaches, we have gotten a little off the Dover road and must try back. Although writing in premacadamito times, he considered the road of broken flints good and well-kept in spite of exemption from forced labour, a privilege as old as Roman times; for Aurelius Victor, in recording Vespasian's vast roadworks, says, "tot tantaque brevi confecta, intactis cultoribus." The turnpikes at every village were the machinery that still kept the roads passable in the last century, and there was a footway of two or three feet in width, with a whitewashed paling that could be seen at night by the coachmen. Great numbers of waggons loaded with corn and hay were met going to the ports, and it may be noted in passing that the price of the quartern loaf was 7*d.* that year (1765: it was 12½*d.* thirty years later), so that the previous harvest must have been plentiful. The waggoners, dressed in good broadcloth, with stout overcoats to their backs, and their legs cased in comely boots, rode ponies; and so, with long whalebone whips, drove their splendid teams of well-groomed horses, harnessed to the ponderous wains by chain traces.

Our traveller was loud in his praises of the roadside inns, whether in village or in town. They were a little dear, to be sure; but the "lord Anglois," who took a pride in paying according to his rank, was as well served as he would have been at home, and with a cleanliness then much to be desired in the majority of the best private houses in France. The whole way from Paris to Boulogne there was but one auberge that could compare with the English inns—that at Montreuil; where, by the way, English travellers always made a point of stopping. The landlords of the English inns our somewhat distinguished foreigner supposed to be the depositories of all the election secrets and party tricks; but he never suspected the connexion of many of them with the "gentlemen of the road"; and one of them who piled his charges on a little too high had just then met with his deserts. His robber's-cave was at Canterbury; and when the Duc de Nivernois alighted there on his peace-making mission to London two years before—the Peace of Paris, which put an end to the Seven Years' War, gave us Canada, and enabled our traveller to make his journey—his host reckoned with him as with an enemy to be despoiled, and charged the Ambassador between forty and fifty guineas for his supper. Whereupon the gentlemen of Kent took the matter in hand, and removed the sessions and their own custom from the inn. The general run of travellers made it a point of honour to chime in; so Boniface was boycotted and sold up in six months. Rochester, with its one league-long street, occupied for the most part by sailors, ship-carpenters, and dockyard-men, was passed; and thence to London the banks of the Thames were marked out in the middle-distance by immense trees irregularly planted, whilst the masts and sails of the "flouques"—barges, no less—the coasters, and the ocean-going merchant-ships, showing amid the foliage, formed a picture charming nowadays only to the imagination of those who drop down with the tide between naked mud-banks.

Soon he found himself in the Old Kent Road, where poor Paul Bedford, in The Green Bushes, was always wishing himself safe back, and then turned off towards Westminster, through "Soutwarck," which he tells us—his English was limited to "Very good" and "Very wel"—was pronounced Soudric. This was a badly-built quarter, only two streets wide; inhabited almost entirely by dyers and tanners. Nearer Westminster Bridge all was country, with scattered taverns and pretty villas, which were increasing in number every day. Then he crossed the bridge itself, "a monument to which all Europe offered nothing comparable." It was towards evening; although the April sun was still on the horizon—it set at seven minutes to seven—the lamps on the bridge and in the roads near were all lit, and the wide and well-traced streets with their fine houses showed well in this best quarter of London. The river alive with boats of all sizes, the thoroughfares covered with carriages, and the wide footways filled with moving crowds, offered to the stranger's gaze a spectacle which he said Paris could show him, but in the best streets of the Quartier Saint-Germain, or the Place Vendôme, and there only, if those quarters were as well frequented by the people as by carriage-folk. It is worth remembering that Johnson, who went to Paris with the Thrales ten years later, speaking of the "Place de Vendôme, a fine square, about as big as Hanover Square," says "nobody but mean people walk in Paris"; and he further notes that "near Paris, whether on weekdays or Sundays, the roads are empty."

Chance led our traveller to lodgings in the house of a M. Mertyne, cook to the King, who came originally from Chaumont, in Champagne, his real name being Martin. He had left the French army for the kitchen of the Duke of Cumberland, whence he passed into the King's palace, and he now rented a house in a quarter near Westminster, where he let his scantily furnished first floor for a guinea and a half weekly, the second going for half that sum. Is it necessary to add what the name of this "quarter" was?—it was "La place de Leicester Fields"—where, having safely housed our visitor, we take leave of him, at all events for the present.

CONCERTS.

THE last concert given at the Crystal Palace had a somewhat miscellaneous, but pleasing, programme. It opened with the Symphony (No. 2 in D, Beethoven), one of the most charming examples of the composer's early style, of which a most admirable performance was given. This was followed by the "Prayer" from Rienzi (Wagner), sung by Mr. W. J. Winch, whose first appearance at the Crystal Palace concerts we noticed some few weeks back. In this "Prayer" Mr. Winch not only showed all the merits which we have previously pointed out, but also a strong, yet delicate, dramatic feeling. He was also heard in two German ballads, the charming "Madchenlied" of Raff, and a very pretty song, "Murmelndes Lüftchen" of Jensen, both of which he sang with excellent taste and admirable vocalization. Miss Hilda Coward was the other vocalist, who sang "Bel Raggio" (Semiramide) with considerable fluency; and also sang the song from the incidental music to The Merry Wives of Windsor of Sullivan, with which the concert concluded. In this she showed herself to have the very rare power of singing words as distinctly as they can be spoken. With less nervousness, and a little more careful training, Miss Coward will no doubt prove an excellent singer. The orchestra were again heard in the Quartet Variations for Strings on the song "Death and the Maiden," by Schubert. There is always a certain doubt as to how far it is justifiable to expand a quartet for a large band, and the experiment should certainly never be tried except with an orchestra in perfect order. But this particular work is too short, and perhaps too slight, to attract quartet-players in general, and Mr. Manns may well be thanked for giving his audience an opportunity of hearing so beautiful a piece of true musical poetry. Perhaps in order to give it full effect a thought more care might have been bestowed on its rehearsal; for, in spite of the high point of perfection to which the band has now been brought, which enabled them to give an almost perfect performance of Beethoven's Symphony, in this particular work there was here and there a slight want of unanimity which tended slightly to destroy the effect of perfect unison which ought to exist in each of the parts of an expanded quartet. Miss Amina Goodwin made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace as a pianiste, and we believe that this is one of the earliest of her appearances in public. The first piece in which she was heard was the Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra (No. 2 in D), Mendelssohn. In this she at once made her mark. She seems to possess a perfect command over the instrument, admirable execution, and great fluency; and, in spite of the defects of the instrument upon which she played, it was easy to see that she had considerable power of producing a singing tone. The most remarkable point in her performance was a certain grip and power; indeed her playing bears the same relation to that of the general rank and file of pianoforte-players that the playing of an experienced chef d'attaque does to that of the rank and file of violin-players. Perhaps this very power may lay her open to the charge of occasional "thumping," but experience and the musical instinct with which she is obviously endowed will soon tone down this slight blemish on her playing. She chose for her solos the "Consolation" of Liszt, which thoroughly brought out her powers of manipulation, and the quaint "Danse des Cosaques" of Rubinstein, which enabled her to show her perfect feeling for rhythm. As we have before said, the concert concluded with the Prelude, Song, and Dances from the incidental music to The Merry Wives of Windsor. All that could be done for this music by band and conductor was done. Sir Arthur Sullivan's work has been too often heard for it to be necessary to enter into any detailed criticism of it on this occasion; but the grace of the Prelude and Song, and the commonplace character of the Dances, were again fully impressed upon the hearers.

On Good Friday one of the monster concerts was given in the Handel Orchestra. With the band of the Scots Guards, the Crystal Palace orchestra and chorus, and the following strong team of vocalists, Mme. Marie Roze, Miss Clara Leighton, Mme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. The programme was entirely sacred music. Mr. Sims Reeves, for whom an apology was made, appeared, and, in spite of obvious indisposition, sang two numbers of the programme. There is but little to notice in the general performance at this concert except that all the vocalists, in spite of the enormous space they had to fill, succeeded in pleasing their audience. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the concert was the proof that Mme. Marie Roze gave of the enormous advance in her art which she has made of late years. This was chiefly shown in the "Inflammatus" from Rossini's Stabat Mater. Mme. Marie Roze succeeded in making her voice heard throughout the enormous area without any apparent effort and with full command over her powers, so that she was able to produce the most delicate effects even on this large scale. The only other point of real musical interest was the opportunity of observing how perfectly Mr. Manns can, by a complete change of his style of conducting, control a large mass of instrumentalists and voices as well as he can control his ordinary and familiar orchestra.

THE BEGGAR STUDENT.

THE Alhambra opened on Saturday with a version of Millöcker's comic opera Der Bettel Student, entitled The Beggar Student, written by Mr. W. Beatty-Kingston, with ballet music by M. Jacobi, the conductor. Until recently, when Mr. Carl Rosa contemplated adding this opera to his repertory, Herr Carl Millöcker was quite unknown here, although The Beggar Student has been repeatedly heard in America, and several other works of the composer have been successfully produced at Vienna. As now presented, the opera has undergone considerable transformation and amplification; but, with every allowance for all changes, and for the transposition of the principal vocal part—written for a tenor, and now undertaken by Miss Fannie Leslie—it cannot be said that the music surpasses the average of operetta compositions. It can only be accepted as a comic opera with the emphatic qualification which a distinguished critic applied to Klopstock when that poet was described as the German Milton—it is a very German comic opera. Beyond a certain tunefulness, it possesses none of the characteristics of this essentially French art; the comic element is of the slightest, and Herr Millöcker is very far from displaying the gaiety and charm of Lecocq or the unfailing freshness and vivacity of Planquette. His finales are not worked out with the elaborate art nor the skilled instrumentation which might be expected of a German composer, while his melodies, with one exception in the second act, are deficient in character and spontaneity. These defects, which might prove fatal to the opera if produced on any other stage, are minimized at the Alhambra by the pomp and circumstance of two admirable ballets and the pageantry and splendour of an imposing spectacle.

The plot of The Beggar Student is almost identical with that of The Lady of Lyons, with the advantage of a less despicable hero than Claude Melnotte in the person of the Student, Simon Romanovich. General Ollendorf, commander of the Saxon forces occupying Cracow, being affronted by Laura, the beautiful daughter of the Countess Palmatica, meditates revenge; knowing the pride of the latter will not permit her daughter's marriage with any one but a Polish nobleman, he resolves to humble her by entrapping her into forming a mésalliance. He accordingly liberates from prison a wild young Student, Romanovich, and one Conrad Malitzki, otherwise Count Opalinski, and supplies them with money to prosecute his fraudulent scheme. The Student, as Count Kibytski, and Conrad, as his secretary, easily ensnare the ladies; the marriage is about to be celebrated when the Student's supplies fail; and, overcome by love and impecuniosity, he confesses his shame in a letter to Laura, the contents of which Ollendorf dexterously prevents being divulged until after the wedding. The scene when the Student meets his bride, believing she knows his antecedents, and stupefied by her magnanimity, is the most striking in the opera; the final situation, when the exposé occurs, and the unhappy pair are surrounded by the mob of prisoners, and hear the gibes and taunts of Ollendorf and his friends, is realized with dramatic force, and forms a brilliant and highly effective ensemble. As a mere tableau, nothing could be better conceived than this powerful situation; the acting of all concerned is admirable, the grouping excellent in composition, and the realization is not less notable for the skill with which complex details are harmonized than the picturesque art with which they are individually presented. It is precisely in this animated finale that the composer fails to give full significance to the dramatic situation; a commonplace trio and noisy chorus of prisoners emphasize the confusion, but express nothing of the piquancy and humour of the scene. A short fourth act reveals the triumph of the Poles and the downfall of Ollendorf and the Saxons; the Student is ennobled for his services in the Polish cause, and the curtain falls on a magnificent military ballet.

Miss Fannie Leslie, as the hero, sang and acted with grace and vivacity, exhibiting sound judgment in moderating, on her assumption of the part of the Polish Count, the animal spirits which so well became the graceless Simon Romanovich. Miss Marion Hood's impersonation of Laura was characterized by finish and refinement, and she sang the most original number in the opera—the pretty and attractive air, "Joy and grief are close allies"—with much sweetness and dainty expression. Miss Irene Verona, as Stephania, sang with excellent effect in a love duet with Conrad, and Miss Madge Stavart sustained the part of the Countess with dignity. Mr. F. Mervin's rendering of the boastful General Ollendorf was a thoroughly consistent and humorous study; and Mr. Aynsley Cook, as the Jailor, and Mr. H. Hallam, as Conrad, were efficient in unexacting parts. Interest in the music of The Beggar Student is almost nullified by the splendour of the spectacular display and the graceful dancing of Mlles. Pertoldi and Palladino. The ballet of sleigh-drivers, with their bugles and bells, combined with pierrots, jugglers, and the motley throng of the Cracow market-place during a fair, is a scene of wonderful animation and ingenious arrangement. Excellence in this direction may—at the Alhambra—be allowed to atone for any artistic deficiencies in Herr Millöcker's music.

THE YACHTING SEASON.

THREE new cutters, belonging to what is commonly called the first class, are to come out during the season, which will begin a month hence, and we doubt not that they will have wonderful speed and weatherliness in light breezes. But, despite this considerable addition to the racing fleet, it can hardly be denied that the melancholy critics who maintain that the sport of yacht-racing is declining are right, and that very likely this year's matches will do nothing to arrest its decadence. It is dangerous to prophesy about untried vessels, but little is risked by saying that, not impossibly, the new ships may, after a time, banish from racing waters all competitors in their own class or all competitors but one, and that there may be, during the latter part of the season, a series of matches between a few yachts similar to those which in former seasons have been so much complained of as monotonous and uninteresting. The number of contending vessels can of course be increased and some variety given to matches by following the plan so widely adopted last year, and allowing the forties to contend with larger craft; but this proceeding gives the owners of the latter occasion for complaint, and moreover the second class, i.e. the so-called second class, is by no means so strong as it was last year. It is indeed a curious proof of the uncertainty which attends yacht-racing that, whereas in 1883 the racing of the Tara, Annasona, Silver Star, May, and Sleuthhound, was the great feature of the season, it has in 1884 been doubtful for a time whether there would be two forties to race, and that at present it seems not improbable that, at a good many regattas, sailing committees will have to do without the class which, more than any other, has been encouraged with a lavish hand. Only to a small extent, then, will it, in all likelihood, be possible to reinforce the first-class yachts by their very unwelcome sisters.

It seems strange that there should be such a marked change with regard to forty-ton cutters, inasmuch as last year it seemed likely that they would in the end altogether overpower the larger ones, and, considering the great number of prizes which were, with effusive liberality, thrown open to them, it would have been natural to expect that six or seven would contend this season, and their comparative disappearance, showing, as has just been said, the fitful condition of this great sport, is a painful symptom of decline. For that decline, which we fear can no longer be in any way disputed, various reasons have been assigned, the principal one being the enormous expense of building and of sailing a modern racing yacht. The necessity for huge expenditure goes far, no doubt, to debar many men from racing, and is one of the causes, therefore, of the constantly increasing weakness of the racing fleet; but it is not the only cause. As we have before said, when speaking on this subject, the diminution in the number of racing yachts is to a certain extent traceable to the preference now shown for steam yachts. Whether that preference and the change that it has caused are due, as is sometimes alleged, to want of energy and want of sailor-like feeling, we do not wish to consider. It is sufficient that the change has taken place, and there can be small doubt that it has both directly and indirectly affected yacht-racing. It may fairly be assumed that a good many men who, in former days, would have built and raced large sailing yachts now build steamers, and it seems clear that, owing to the increased use of steam, the market for sailing cruisers has been much diminished, and that it is not now nearly so easy as it formerly was to dispose of a yacht when her racing career has come to an end. The use of steam has then checked building, and must continue to check it, for though it so happens that three enterprising owners have had racers constructed this winter, it is not the least likely that many men will be able to disregard the risk of having on hand, at the end of a few seasons, an unsaleable vessel which has cost a large sum of money. The fact is a painful one to admirers of the famous sport, but it would be useless to lament over it, as nothing is the least likely to modify it or to retard the change which is due to steam. Whether, however, other causes which have tended to alter yacht-racing by diminishing the number of competitors might not be removed by judicious legislation is a very different question. That, owing to the cost of modern racers, the sport should be confined to a few, is very much to be regretted; but, unfortunately, it can hardly be hoped that any new code will altogether do away with the evil. Those who complain of matters as they now are sometimes seem to think that the Yacht-Racing Association or the Clubs can devise rules which will put the man who can spend a good deal and the man who can only spend a moderate sum on a par. All that can be said is that, if the Association or the Clubs can achieve this result, they will do more than any legislative body that has yet existed. If, however, no new rules are likely to be entirely successful and to work a complete and radical change, there is reason to hope that some good might be effected by judicious alterations, and that, by giving some chance to vessels which now have none whatever, and by preventing yachts of a certain type from having an absolute monopoly of success, more competitors might be attracted to racing waters, and matches might be made more varied and interesting. What now gives success, and has given it for some time past, is, to put the matter briefly, lead. Formerly when men were speaking of a fast craft they talked of her lines, of her bow, her run, and so forth; now what is usually heard of a yacht is that she has on her keel thirty or forty tons of lead, as the case may be. Each year the great mass of metal down below becomes more and more the essential feature of a racing vessel, and each year naval architects grow more skilful in plastering it on. Some time ago it was found possible to put twenty tons of lead on to a twenty-ton yacht; later on to achieve a very similar result with a forty-ton yacht; and now it appears that a cutter of eighty tons or thereabouts, with a lead keel weighing more than seventy tons, is to be set afloat. In speaking of this vessel we do not desire to censure in the smallest degree her owner, or her very able designer, who have followed the only possible course open to them if they desired success under the present system; but is not the construction of a vessel of this type rather a reductio ad absurdum of the present system? What is the object of this and the other huge lead keels now placed on vessels? To give stability and sail-carrying power; and of course they make enormous sail area possible. Now sails are, of course, to a sailing vessel what engine and screw are to a steamer—her propelling power. What, we may ask, would be thought of a proposal to rate a torpedo-boat, in a steamer's race, according to her tonnage merely, without any reference to her engines? The suggestion would be scouted as a bad joke. Yet this is practically what is done with yachts. The immense sails which drive the vessel so fast through the water are not taxed for time allowance, neither are the lead keels which enable long narrow craft to carry such a great spread of canvas. Save in the very rare matches under the alternative rule of the Y.R.A., only the length and beam of the vessel are taken in account, while the propelling power is ignored. It is true that for a long time the system which ignored it, indefensible as it was in theory, did not in practice produce any bad results. With ballast inside, or with a moderate lead keel, the racing yacht could not fairly be called a racing machine; but, judging from the rate of progress lately, yachts will very likely be afloat before long which cannot be properly described by any other expression. Since it has, within a comparatively short time, been found possible to place on a vessel's keel an amount of lead equal to her nominal tonnage, it may be found possible to do even more; and if a so-called forty-ton cutter, with fifty tons of outside lead, is launched, will not the absurdity of rating her for time allowance at only forty tons against good sea-going ships be so patent as to make yacht-racing seem nothing but an expensive and elaborate farce?

One obvious means of remedying the evil, which, trifling formerly, now threatens to be so serious, has been often proposed. It has been frequently suggested that outside lead should be taxed, but no attempt has ever been made to carry out the proposal, for the very good reason that to tax lead would be extremely difficult, would entail considerable expense, and would give rise to endless disputes. Taxing the sails—i.e. ascertaining the sail area and rating a yacht by it—is on the other hand perfectly easy, while it is difficult to see how any vessel can be unjustly affected by it. Of the desirability of adopting this system of rating we have spoken before, but now that lead keels of greater size than ever are being fitted to yachts, it is certainly not superfluous to speak of it again. It has the enormous advantage of leaving the naval architect free to model his hull as he pleases, and its adoption may therefore set able men to the congenial work of discovering what form will go through the water best, in place of having to concentrate their intelligence on bolts and ties. It would probably tend to diminish expense, and, without destroying the chance of the regular racers, it may give some chance to moderately canvassed and moderately ballasted vessels, and may in consequence have the effect of bringing more yachts to contend at races. Very great, then, seem to be the advantages of sail-area measurement, and very difficult is it to see what legitimate objection can be taken to it. Towards adopting it one step has indeed already been made, but it was not made in the right way. The alternative rule given by the Y.R.A. last year is faulty, as it mixes up length with sail area, and thereby continues one of the worst evils of the present system, that of taxing one dimension; and only with considerable qualifications can length be treated as giving speed in sailing yachts. In simple sail-area measurement, not hampered in this way, a solution of some of the difficulties which now beset yacht-racing will very possibly be found, and it seems abundantly clear that some new method radically different from the present one must be adopted unless the small fleet is to become still smaller, and unless yachtsmen are willing to wait for the time when it will be noticed, as a remarkable fact, that a yacht has raced through a whole season without being strained to pieces by her lead keel.

MR. LAWRENCE BARRETT.

THE performance of Mr. Lawrence Barrett has a special interest of its own, apart from any interest that may attach to the play in which he is acting; for the American tragedian presents a remarkable example of the limits which keen intelligence, the most careful study, and some dramatic aptitude can reach without a touch of that magnetic power by which the great actor is distinguished. Mr. Barrett's features are expressive, his voice is full and agreeable, he is beyond all question a most earnest student of his art; what he lacks—and the want of it is very severely felt—is that little spark which illumines and gives life to an interpretation of character. We have seen the American tragedian—the title is not of our choosing—twice during his present visit, and to see him a second time is to note with greater assurance how elaborately the whole performance is built up, and how devoid it is of sincerity. The detail is very clever in itself, often very striking; but it is always Mr. Barrett whom we see, never Yorick; and, when attention should be most deeply absorbed in Yorick, Mr. Barrett is always most prominent. The actor seems to be so deficient in passion that we fear to prophesy his success in other and more natural parts; for it must be confessed that Yorick's Love, which Mr. W. D. Howells has very freely adapted from the Spanish of Estabanez, is an extremely artificial play. There are many works in the Spanish drama far more suitable for treatment on the English stage than this one—a version of which has been going the round of the London managers for some years past, by the way, and was at one time to have been presented by Mr. Hermann Vezin, to whom Mr. Lawrence Barrett bears some resemblance, both in person and method. The date of the piece is 1613. The leading incident is the appearance on the stage of the Globe Theatre of a husband, wife, and lover who bear the same relations to each other in real life as in the tragedy they are supposed to be acting. As every one who has a knowledge of stage history is aware, the first women ever seen on the boards were members of a French company which came to London in the reign of Charles I. The players looked for the patronage of their countrywoman Queen Henrietta Maria, but audiences were deeply set against the innovation. Prynne denounced the outrage on decency, as he regarded it, and it is recorded that the actresses were "hissed, hooted, and pippin-pelted from the stage." "Here the first time that ever I saw women come upon the stage," Pepys writes in 1661. Thus Mr. Howells sets chronology at defiance in the main feature of the story, though this might readily be excused if he had succeeded in turning it to real dramatic account. But in this he fails. When first the plot of the tragedy is discussed in Yorick's house by Master Heywood, the manager of the Globe, and when Yorick the comedian betrays his anxiety to play the part of the outraged husband, which belongs by stage custom to the tragedian, the shallowness of the artifice is made plain. The early betrayal of the whole plot, if it necessarily weakens the story in representation, enables an audience to concentrate attention more closely on the various studies of character revealed. In the present instance this is not fortunate, for the characters are tame and poor. Edmund, the adopted son of Yorick, and the lover of Alice, Yorick's wife, is a very ignoble youth; there is no intensity in his passion, nothing to palliate his treachery; and from the first he seems thoroughly ashamed of himself. The fault is in a great measure with the actor, Mr. Mark Quinton; and so far Mr. Howells is unlucky. Alice, again, is a feeble sketch; and here partly the author and partly the actress, Miss Marie Wainwright, must be blamed. She becomes almost hysterical at the first mention of the tragedy, in which she is to take the principal part, when she finds that it touches on the secret of her life. A woman, and still more an actress, should have more command of herself. Master Heywood, the manager of the Globe, is a very didactic personage. He is a survival of those well-meaning but tedious stage-moralists of whose utterances Joseph Surface's sentiments were in some degree a parody. Master Walton, the Iago of this play, is more to the purpose. There is a reason why the Iago should hate the Othello, as Yorick may be called, should seek to wound him in his tenderest point, and should sacrifice Cassio in his plan of vengeance. The analogy between the Shakspearian tragedy and the Spanish play is not close, for Walton is not jealous of Edmund, and the latter, who to some extent fills the place of Cassio, is not innocent, though what limit his guilt has reached is not shown. Estabanez has not adapted Shakspeare, therefore, or, if he has striven to do so, he has eliminated all the subtlety of the poet's scheme. Yorick's jealousy—too well founded—remains, and it is in the second act, where the Yorick shows > what damned moments tells he o'er > Who dotes, yet doubts, suspects, yet strongly loves,

that the actor is at his best. During his interview with Walton in the garden, which forms an extremely picturesque setting of the second act, Yorick's effort to be calm is well sustained. If there were more truth in the bursts of passion, when wrath can no longer be suppressed, by so much more would the scene be forcible in its quietude and fury alike; but his rage is never impressive. Reality in Yorick would, no doubt, have tended to conceal the unreality of the play. Mr. Barrett does not, however, take advantage of his opportunities. The penultimate scene is in the Green Room of the theatre. Alice has received a letter from Edmund and reads it, not knowing that Walton is watching her. He endeavours to obtain it from her, and while they are in dispute Yorick enters. Alice leaves, being called to the stage. The two men are left alone, Walton having snatched the letter from the girl's hand. Yorick demands the surrender of this paper, from which he can learn the truth. Here, it will be seen, is a plain and direct situation which an actor who had any tragic force could not fail to make effective; but Mr. Barrett has not this quality. Such a scene may be taken as a test of an actor's powers, and here the American player distinctly fails. Many actors who could not approach what Mr. Barrett does in the subsequent of the second act, would be striking here. Nothing but vigour is wanted, and that is just what this Yorick does not possess. "Be not too tame, neither," was Hamlet's caution to the players, and Mr. Barrett is far too tame. The last scene is the stage of the Globe Theatre. The delivery to Yorick of Edmund's letter by Walton, who should have handed his brother actor a blank paper, marks the point at which Yorick, in his assumed character of the Count Octavio, ceases to act Master Woodford's tragedy, and turns to denounce his betrayers, Edmund and Alice, no longer as Manfredo and Beatrice, but in their own persons. The break, where Yorick throws aside the assumption of Octavio, and, forgetting audience in the assurance of his wrongs, cries out upon the traitors, should of course be strongly marked. Unfortunately, Mr. Barrett again fails. He is cold and mechanical; there is no sign of the wrathful indignation which should consume him. Yorick has read the letter to his wife; has been shown the "living reason she's disloyal." Here should be the very torrent, tempest, and whirlwind of passion; but here it is not. The duel with Edmund is not a very striking specimen of stagecraft; nor is the manner in which Yorick stabs himself with Master Heywood's sword altogether well done. Disappointment is the feeling Mr. Lawrence Barrett chiefly awakens.

A word of acknowledgment must be given to the amusing representation of Master Woodford, the author of the tragedy, by Mr. Philip Ben Greet. He is a very amusing coxcomb. That so pert and self-satisfied a personage should have written a tragedy may be considered strange; but Goldsmith was not a wise conversationalist. Mr. Irish also exhibits humour in the performance of Yorick's old servant, Gregory.

OVERBUILDING IN SHIPS.

THE announcement that the Steamship Companies trading to New York have reduced to 4*l.* per head the fare for steerage passengers from this country to New York, and in proportion the fare from Germany to New York, affords fresh evidence of the depression in the shipping trade. That depression is by no means new. The Cunard Company, the oldest and greatest of those engaged in the American trade, is unable to pay any dividend for the past year. The Union and the Castle lines also are unable to pay dividends. At the meeting of the National Steamship Company's shareholders, about a month ago, it was stated that, from the middle of March to the end of December, the Company had had scarcely one remunerative voyage. And the accidents that have happened to one of its vessels have also disabled the Orient Company; while the Royal Exchange Shipping Company shows a loss on the working of about 20,000*l.* As a result, we find that the 10*l.* fully-paid shares of the Cunard Company are at present quoted at from 3*l.* to 4*l.*; the National Steamship's 10*l.* shares are selling at about 4*l.*; the Royal Exchange Company's 9*l.* shares are selling at about 3*l.*, and the Union 10*l.* shares are selling at about 5¾*l.* In the case of Companies which are not quoted in any Stock Exchange list there is understood to be in many cases even a greater depreciation in the value of their properties; while Companies which do not announce to the public the result of their working and private owners are believed also to have suffered very heavy losses. Partly this general depression is the result of the dulness in trade throughout the world; but chiefly it is caused by the too rapid building of new ships. For a quarter of a century the shipping trade has been passing through a series of revolutions. The application of steam to navigation led to the substitution of steam ships for sailing vessels. Then iron supplanted wood in naval construction; more recently steel is taking the place of iron. Again, the opening of the Suez Canal led to the construction of an entirely new type of vessels; and quite lately there has been an eagerness to build much larger and much quicker ships than owners were formerly content with. The shipowners of this country were the first to replace sailers by steam vessels, and they profited immensely thereby. They have acquired the greater part of the carrying trade of the world, and they have placed on a firm basis the naval supremacy of the country. As in this country we have greater wealth than anywhere else in the world, better appliances for turning out new vessels, greater skill and a more abundant supply of trained workmen, our shipowners have been able to add to the advantages they gained by their early adoption of steam, and each new improvement they have quickly adopted. Thus each year they have secured to the country a larger and still larger part of the carrying trade of the world. But, as in all movements of the kind, their eagerness to keep abreast with new inventions led them too far. During the past three years, the shipbuilding yards of this country alone have turned out about three million tons of new shipping, and at the same time there has been a very large construction of vessels abroad. The mere statement of the tonnage built, however, by no means fully represents the increase in the carrying power of the world. It is usually estimated that a steamer is three times as efficient as a sailing vessel; that is to say, it does three times as much work in a given time; but the various improvements that have been recently introduced in steam-vessels have made the newer types far more efficient than the older. The real increase of the carrying capacity of the merchant navies of the world is, therefore, much larger than is meant to be by the mere statement of the tonnage built. The trade of the world, no doubt, has also largely increased; but it has not increased as rapidly as the shipping; and thus shipowners find themselves in present with more vessels than they can profitably employ.

The wheat speculation in Chicago, of which we spoke last week, and the falling off in emigration from Europe, have also affected affected the Atlantic carrying trade, while the extreme depression through which South Africa is now passing has aggravated the losses of the shipping engaged in the trade to that country. But these are minor causes which will pass away by and by; the more permanent and deeper cause is, as stated above, the too rapid building of ships of late years. It is to be borne in mind, too, that each improvement introduced has rendered obsolete the older vessels. Companies and firms that had a practical monopoly of a particular trade in many cases were unwilling to undergo the cost of adopting new improvements; they endeavoured to maintain their position in the trade with their old vessels. This invited competition from newer people; and the older Companies and firms after a while found themselves with ships which they could not sell, and which were incapable of efficiently competing with their more quick-sighted rivals. In some cases they possessed great resources, and they have been able to obtain new vessels, though at a greater cost, and with the loss of their former monopoly. In other cases, however, the losses they underwent were so serious that they find themselves now in grave embarrassments. The obsolete vessels, however, are kept afloat. It is cheaper to do so, provided they earn their working expenses, than to lay them up and to lose their total value. They are unable to obtain employment except by constantly reducing rates, and by thus underbidding the more efficient vessels they are bringing down freights in all the trades of the world and causing losses to their more enterprising and more solvent competitors. No doubt there are excuses for rapid construction. New improvements are being constantly made, and if our shipowners are to hold their own, they must be foremost in adopting these improvements; but in very many cases mere speculators have induced ignorant people to embark in shipping ventures, the risks of which they did not understand. In almost every town throughout the country small tradespeople, clergymen, professional men, widows, and maiden ladies have been induced to invest in Shipping Companies of all kinds, and as they do not understand the management of shipping business, they are obliged to give absolute discretion over their property to persons who in many cases are quite unworthy of the trust reposed in them. In other cases people who ought to know better have been likewise entrapped. Merchants have been induced to think that it was desirable to form Shipping Companies owned exclusively by mercantile men, and which would be managed, therefore, in the interest of trade alone. The shipbuilders have been increasing their yards and adding to their workpeople as the rage for new ships grew, and whenever they found any stoppage in the orders coming in they were anxious to obtain employment on almost any terms. They therefore readily aided the speculators, and in some cases banks were equally willing to finance undertakings where solvent persons were unwilling to withdraw capital from their own businesses, but yet desired to buy new ships. In these ways the growth of our merchant shipping has gone on too rapidly of late years, and at the same time there has been a proportionately rapid growth abroad. In Norway and Sweden particularly the growth of the mercantile marine has been extremely rapid. The German merchant navy has likewise grown steadily, and the new French law for encouraging the building of ships in France has increased the French mercantile marine.

It is a necessary consequence that over-production should result in over-competition. The owners, finding themselves with ships which they could not employ profitably, in too many cases have bid for cargoes by offering to carry them at rates entirely unremunerative. This "cutting" of rates has gone on to an extreme degree in some trades, and has inflicted very serious losses upon shipowners. In many cases those who ordered the ships find now when no income is coming in that they are unable to pay the calls made upon them; their credit is diminished by the depreciation of their property, and they have not savings upon which to fall back. Shipbuilders often, therefore, are unable to obtain payment for the ships they have built, and as they require ready money, they have added to the depreciation by selling new ships for almost anything they can get. Shipowners and shipbuilders alike have thus very seriously suffered, and the probability is that the depression will continue for some time yet. After a while, of course, the natural growth of trade will overtake the supply of shipping, and employment will become abundant. In the meantime, however, it is evident that many of those who have gone into the business will be ruined, while it is clear that the least efficient ships must be broken up. The ships that are obsolete in type and too costly to work are a mere drag upon their owners, and yet by their competition they force down freights, and, therefore, prevent owners of better vessels from making a reasonable profit. Those ships must be got rid of in some way; and when they are they will so diminish the carrying capacity of the world that it will not be too much for the cargoes to be carried. If there should be a rapid recovery in general trade, the revival in the shipping business would be the quicker. In the American trade, for example, if there were to be a large increase of emigration from Europe and a large export of grain and other produce from America, the demand for shipping would increase, and the profitableness of the business would grow with it. So likewise a recovery in South Africa would soon improve the prospects of the vessels trading thereto. But, if the shipping trade is to be placed upon a permanently sound basis, it is evident that there must be a pause in the building of new vessels. At present there is a compulsory stoppage; but, if trade were to revive, the speculation in ships would probably revive with it, and after a little while we should have a return of the present depression. This, however, is not likely if the existing depression is left to work out its own cure. If the reckless speculators are ruined, and if the old and obsolete ships have to be broken up, a lesson will be taught which will be likely to be remembered for some time to come. Of course, if new improvements are made, they must be adopted; for our shipowners must maintain their superiority if the position of this country on the ocean is to be upheld. But the building of ships as a speculative venture ought to be discouraged, and by none can it be so well discouraged as by the banks of the country. They give facilities—particularly in Scotland—for these kind of ventures, which are contrary to proper banking principles, and which, if continued very far, are not unlikely to lead to losses on the part of the banks themselves.

REVIEWS.

ANNALS OF THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.*

IT is a pity that Mr. Brady's book should have been printed at Rome, for, like all English works published abroad—for instance, those of the late Mr. Charles Hemans—it is printed on wretched paper and disfigured by all sorts of clumsy misspellings and errata of various kinds. This is the more unfortunate as it is really a useful volume for purposes of reference. We say for purposes of reference, for it is too full of detailed statistics and reprints of official documents, epitaphs, and the like to be very pleasant reading. Its true value will be found in the record of the ecclesiastical arrangements of the Roman Catholic community in England from the Reformation to the present day. In the words of the preface:—

> This volume contains an account of the Archpriests, Prefects of Missions, Vicars Apostolic, and Bishops, who governed the Catholic Church in Great Britain from the time of the extinction of the ancient hierarchy in Queen Elizabeth's reign, down to the present day. The materials, with the exception of some documents from the Private Archives of the Vatican and from the Archivio di Stato in Rome, have been derived from the Archives of the Propaganda and of the English College in Rome, and from other authentic sources.

To preface such a work with a controversial chapter on the invalidity of Anglican Orders was obviously a mistake, even if the author had, as he has not, anything really new to adduce on a sufficiently well-worn theme. It was already notorious that "the Roman archives have uniformly ignored the State episcopate in the three kingdoms," and that the Holy See has always in practice treated Anglican Orders as invalid, while on the other hand "no formal or authoritative decision has ever been pronounced, much less has any definite declaration been ever made of the particular reasons upon which the rejection of Anglican Orders has been based," partly no doubt because of the very various and sometimes incompatible "reasons" urged by Roman controversialists—since it became impossible any longer to affect belief in the absurd Nag's Head fable—some specimens of which are reproduced here. One curious fact, not indeed new to those familiar with the history of the period, is mentioned by Mr. Brady, namely, that some of the Irish prelates in Elizabeth's reign had a habit of sending their candidates for ordination to the Roman Catholic bishops, instead of ordaining them themselves. But it does not at all follow that their conduct can only be explained, as he assumes, by a disbelief in their own capacity to confer valid orders. Considering the sort of men often appointed to Irish sees in those days, indolence or non-residence affords quite as plausible an explanation, the more so that, on his own showing, the descent of the Irish hierarchy appears to be unimpeachable. He tells us that "Hugh Curwen, Archbishop of Dublin, who undoubtedly himself possessed valid orders, and Adam Loftus were the founders of the modern Irish Protestant Episcopate," and that Loftus was consecrated by Curwen. To argue that because Loftus was consecrated two years before the canonical age of 30, he had probably never been ordained priest, and therefore could not receive valid consecration, is the purest and most gratuitous guesswork. After taking so much pains to secure the valid consecration of Parker, Elizabeth was not likely to go out of her way to perpetrate so strange and dangerous an anomaly in another branch of the Established Church. But on this controversy we cannot linger here.

In successive chapters Mr. Brady records the government of the English Roman Catholics under Cardinal Allen, under Archpriests, and under Vicars Apostolic, till the restoration of the hierarchy by Pius IX. in 1850, two supplementary chapters being devoted to Scotland. It was Dr. Allen who founded the famous Seminary of Douay, and organized the introduction into England of the missionary priests, chiefly Jesuits, on whose labours and sufferings in the reign of Elizabeth so much fresh light has been thrown by recent disclosures. He was a man of vigour and ability, and had certainly earned, by these as well as by other and more questionable services, the Cardinalate eventually bestowed upon him by Gregory XIV.; he died in 1594. The Holy See then appointed—under Jesuit instigation, though Mr. Brady does not tell us so—an Archpriest, instead of a bishop, who enjoyed quasi-episcopal authority without having the episcopal character, but the experiment did not prove a success. These officials were unable to compose the quarrels between seculars and regulars, which the Jesuits then as afterwards always steadily fomented, and there was a bitter contention about "the unlawful oath" which the first Archpriest, Blackwell, took himself and recommended those under his jurisdiction to take, but which Bellarmine wrote a treatise against and Paul V. condemned in a Brief. Blackwell handed over both treatise and brief to that "perfidious Protestant" the Archbishop of Canterbury, who not unnaturally gave them to the King. It is unfortunate by-the-bye that, in a work intended to be documentary and historical rather than polemical, Mr. Brady should habitually indulge in so much vituperative language. As to the "unlawful oath," which repudiated the rights of subjects to murder or rebel against sovereigns deposed by the Popes, Dr. Döllinger points out in his Lectures on Reunion the cruelty and injustice of forbidding English Catholics to obtain toleration by this easy method, the more so as "no express declaration of the Roman Court, explaining in what the soul-destroying character of the oath consisted, could be obtained by any entreaties, and many priests suffered death rather than take it." Campion, who personally was quite ready to profess allegiance to Elizabeth, was one of them. Mr. Brady might also have reminded his readers that there really were several plots for the dethronement of the Queen, and some to assassinate her, in which Jesuit fathers were mixed up. From 1623 to 1658 the place of the Archpriest was taken by a single Vicar Apostolic, being a bishop in partibus, and of those prelates there were two, of whom the first lived only two years; the second, Richard Smith, held office for thirty years, but left England at the end of the first five years, owing to the opposition of the Jesuits, and never returned. From 1655 to 1685 the English vicariate remained vacant, in spite of frequent petitions from the secular clergy to the Holy See to appoint a bishop or bishops to govern them. In 1685 John Leyburne was named Vicar Apostolic of all England, and three years later, at the urgent request of James II., three additional Vicars Apostolic were appointed, the country being divided into four ecclesiastical "districts," the London, Midland, Northern, and Western. Had not Innocent XI. been a wiser man than the King, James would probably have attempted to thrust Roman Catholic prelates into some or all of the English sees; he was very anxious to make Father Petre, Provincial of the Jesuits, Archbishop of York, but the Pope firmly refused, and "every letter that went from the Vatican to Whitehall recommended patience, moderation, and respect for the prejudices of the English people." The administration of the four Vicars Apostolic lasted from 1688 to 1840, and Mr. Brady gives a brief chronicle of the successive bishops in each district. Among them barely half a dozen names can be said to have attained any permanent celebrity. There were nine bishops in all of the London district, two of whom, both converts, may claim a word of notice here. Bishop Challoner, the fourth in order, who ruled from 1758 to 1781, was the author of several controversial and devotional works still esteemed among his co-religionists. It is worth observing that when in his time the first Roman Catholic Relief Act was passed, it met with bitter and strenuous opposition from those zealous champions of civil and religious liberty, the Protestant Dissenters, which found an expression in the too famous Lord George Gordon Riots.

The protestant sectaries, however, were bitterly hostile to any measure which tended to emancipate Catholics. They formed a "Protestant Association," with the object of petitioning for a repeal of the Relief Act of 1778. This conduct of the dissenting sectaries was the more disgraceful, inasmuch as they had already obtained an Act of Toleration for themselves, and had always been loud proclaimers of the doctrines of civil and religious liberty. Filled with envy and jealousy at the smallest indulgence granted to Catholics, they held meetings in many parts of London, and spoke and wrote the most atrocious libels against the Catholic religion. Great numbers joined this "Protestant Association," which had for President Lord George Gordon, a nobleman of little discretion, urged on by ignorant fanaticism.

From 1827 to 1836 Dr. Bramston held the London vicariate, being recommended as well for his knowledge and piety as "by his singular acquaintance with public affairs in England, and his experience and skill in business and the excellent reputation he bore among all ranks of people." He had also, though we are not told so here, the reputation of a wit, and many bons mots of his are still current in Roman Catholic society, of which one specimen may be adduced. A lady of his flock was constantly pestering him for advice about the marriage of her daughter. "Madam," he at length observed, "I must beg you to remember that my name is Bramston, not brimstone, and I don't make matches."

A still more notable personage in his way was Bishop Milner, who governed the Midland district from 1803 to 1826, a list of whose published works fills three pages of this volume. He was an active and able man and a sharp controversialist, always in hot water both with his episcopal colleagues and the laity of his own communion, as well as with the English Government, "said to be learned and zealous, but of small prudence, impulsive, variable, and quick to give hard words." Two questions were keenly contested in his day among English and Irish Roman Catholics, the Oath and the Veto, and Milner took the lead of the irreconcilables on both points. The former was the most important:—

In 1783 a Catholic Committee, consisting of five laymen, with Charles Butler as Secretary, was formed, with the purpose of protecting Catholic interests in general, and in especial for procuring bishops in lieu of Vicars Apostolic. This first Committee expired, and was succeeded, in 1787, by another Committee of ten laymen, to whom were added, in 1788, three ecclesiastics, namely, bishop James Talbot, Vicar Apostolic of London, bishop Charles Berington, coadjutor to bishop Thomas Talbot, Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District, and the Rev. Joseph Wilks, O.S.B., of Bath. The Secretary was the Rev. Charles Butler. This Committee drew up a document called the "Protestation," which was signed at last, after much difficulty, by all the Vicars Apostolic. Bishop Walmesley withdrew his signature, while bishop Matthew Gibson permitted his name to be affixed, if absolutely necessary, by bishop James Talbot, in sensu Catholico. The Committee next framed an Oath of allegiance, in which they styled themselves by the absurd title of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters." This Oath was condemned by all the four Vicars Apostolic, namely, by bishops Walmesley, James and Thomas Talbot, and Matthew Gibson, at a meeting held at Hammersmith, October 19, 1789, in which meeting were also present the coadjutor bishops, Sharrock and Berington, the Rev. Robert Bannister and Rev. John Milner. The Vicars Apostolic then issued an Encyclical Letter, demanding abandonment of the condemned Oath, and requiring submission to their authority.

Charles Butler, the Secretary of the Committee, wrote an Appeal in defence of the Protestation and Oath; and bishop Charles Berington signed this Appeal, and thus gave his approval to the Protestation and Oath, in opposition to the Vicars Apostolic. This Appeal was bound in a blue cover, and was called the Blue Book.

The Vicars Apostolic, William Gibson, John Douglass, and Charles Walmesley met at Lulworth, Thomas Talbot being absent from illness, and published an Encyclical, dated January 19, 1791, in which they condemned the original Oath, and an altered form of it, and declared that some recent publications, alluding to those of the "Committee," were "schismatical, scandalous, and insulting to the Supreme Head of the Church, the Vicar of Jesus Christ."

The Committee now published the second Blue Book, containing some letters, an Appeal to the Holy See, and a Protest against the Encyclicals of the Vicars Apostolic. This Protest was signed by bishop Berington. The Committee pushed forward their proposed Bill for Catholic Relief, which contained the condemned form of Oath, and entrusted the carriage of the Bill to Mr afterwards Lord, Mitford. John Milner acted as agent for the Vicars Apostolic, Walmesley, Gibson and Douglass, in their opposition to the Bill, and visited Burke, Fox, Windham, Dundas, Pitt, Wilberforce, and other members of Parliament, to urge the objections taken by the Vicars Apostolic to the Oath advocated by the Catholic Committee.

In 1792 the "Catholic Committee" gave place to the Cisalpine Club, which pursued the same policy. The proposed Government Veto on episcopal appointments was another question which divided the Catholic body into two parties, and Bishop Milner acted as the agent and advocate of the Irish bishops, who obstinately resisted the desire of the Holy See to come to a compromise. It was his influence, we are told, which prevented the elevation of the learned and accomplished Dr. Lingard—far the greatest scholar among his English co-religionists since the Reformation—to the episcopate. Lingard had formerly been his pupil, but "had not fulfilled his hopes"; in learning indeed he had exceeded them, "but not in piety, and his loose writing about Cranmer and the so-called Reformers gave offence to Bishop Milner." What this really means is that his honest exposure of the silly Nag's Head story, which had been handed down as a sacred heirloom of polemical literature, was an unpardonable offence. Of less celebrity than Milner but not undistinguished in their day were two bishops of the Western Vicariate, Walmesley and Baines, the first of whom was a mathematician of note and was consulted by the English Government on the alteration of the Style. Bishop Baines was a popular preacher and writer, and was the first among his brethren to appreciate and welcome the Tractarian movement at Oxford. In 1840 the English Vicariates were divided into eight, and ten years later came the establishment of the diocesan hierarchy, which created so great a stir and led to the abortive measure since repealed. Mr. Brady records the main incidents, and gives a full translation of the Papal decree of September 29, 1850, constituting the new episcopate. It is intelligible enough that he should not attempt to dive into the secret history, but still it is a little amusing to read e.g. that "on the 2nd of July 1862 Archbishop Errington was released from his connexion with the See of Westminster, and from the right of succession thereto," the fact being that Cardinal Wiseman, who only seven years before had extorted his appointment as coadjutor with right of succession, had resolved to get rid of him, and that, on his very naturally declining to resign a position he had done nothing to forfeit, Pius IX. arbitrarily deprived him. It is less intelligible, in a work published in 1883 and professing to be carried "down to the present day," that Mr. Brady should close his chronicle of the various new dioceses and their bishops without recording the deaths of Bishop Amherst in 1880, Bishop Brown of Newport in 1881, Bishop Brown of Shrewsbury and Bishops Danell and Chadwick in 1882, all of whom are spoken of as if still alive, while no mention is made of their successors. Nor is any hint given that the extinct "diocese of Beverley" was divided five years ago into the new dioceses of Leeds and Middlesborough. A page or two would have sufficed to supply all these omissions, but we have vainly searched the fifty pages of "Additions and Corrections" at the end of the volume for any reference to them. In spite however of these and other defects which have been noticed, the volume is a serviceable one, and supplies a want, not perhaps in the most adequate manner, but sufficiently for its purpose. We trust however that, if it reaches a second edition, some improvement at least in paper and typography may be effected.

FIVE NOVELS.*

THE Way of the World appears to be a novel with a purpose, and that purpose the not very amiable one of holding up to contempt a type which has obviously, for some reason or other, inspired Mr. Christie Murray with feelings of dislike. So apparent, indeed, is the aim that the only interest which the book possesses lies in the chapters devoted to the career of the person representing this type; and his character alone, unpleasant though it is, has the mark of a study, however exaggerated, from life. The adventures of Mr. Amelia, unattractive in body and misshapen in mind, from the moment that he leaves his mother's shop to enter the office of a country newspaper till he ends by being the unscrupulous editor of a society journal, are given in detail. A doubt sometimes crosses the mind of the reader as to whether even journalism is quite so black as it is painted here, and whether Mr. Murray, like Mr. Amelia himself when he picked up anecdotes of high life by listening to the talk of a butlers' club, has not accepted a garbled version of the facts which he has presented to the world. Be this as it may, and granting that Mr. Murray's facts respecting newspapers and their writers are correct, there is no mistake at all as to his ignorance of the peerage. It would seem to be a very simple thing for a novelist to consult the pages of Debrett before plunging into wild statements about the titles borne by the daughters of earls; but even this slight trouble Mr. Murray has not chosen to take, as this passage shows:—

"It was generally supposed that the late proprietor of the estate would marry a daughter of Lord Windgall's."

"Lady Ella?" inquired Kimberley.

"Oh dear no, sir, her sister, the Honourable Alice Louisa Santerre, who is four years younger. Only fifteen, I believe."

This is no slip of the pen or printer's error, for the two young ladies keep their titles quite distinct throughout the book. The romance indispensable to a novel consists here in the attachment of Mr. Kimberley, a lawyer's clerk at thirty-five shillings a week, to Lady Ella. At the opening of the story he inherits over a million and a fine estate from his cousin, the "late proprietor," who a year before his death had been engaged to the Honourable Alice, aged fourteen. It was a great pity Mr. Kimberley did not inherit his cousin's clothes likewise, for he immediately rigs himself out in garments only suitable for a Christy Minstrel. He is, however, extremely good-hearted and generous, and finally relinquishes his promised bride, Lady Ella, to the man she loves, one Jack Clare, together with 90,000*l.* and the reversion of the rest of his property. This Jack Clare, also a member of the aristocracy, who is supposed to be a very good fellow, is about as unreal, and, may we add, as little like a gentleman, as any of the rest. During an election in which his rival Mr. Kimberley is the candidate, Jack throws himself with violence into the opposite camp and has a vulgar caricature made of the would-be member and Lady Ella's father, his chief supporter. It was not Jack's fault that a portrait of Lady Ella was added, but surely it is strange for a man to recommend himself to, or revenge himself on, a lady by holding her father up to ridicule. His vulgarity does not, however, stop here, for when Mr. Kimberley civilly offers to show him the way as he is going clandestinely to take farewell of Lady Ella, Jack first takes no notice of the little man, and then informs him that he is a "pestilential little cad" (vol. iii. p. 16). Another peculiarity of Mr. Jack Clare's, which, however, is shared by Lord Windgall, Mr. Kimberley, and the ladies, is an extraordinary propensity to tears. In vol. iii. p. 17, Jack sees "things all blurred in the sunshine through his tears;" in p. 44 Kimberley's face is "besmeared with tears"; in p. 133 Jack gazes on Ella's portrait with "tear-dimmed eyes"; in p. 136 Lord Windgall has "moisture in his eyes"; and in p. 140 he repeats the performance. Indeed the gentlemen are far more easily moved than the young ladies. There are many minor characters in The Way of the World, but all of them are burlesqued, and even the young man Maddox, the victim and foil of Mr. Amelia, is too thorough a snob to be very attractive. Mr. Murray's book is certainly clever, but it is no less certainly dull. No genuine interest can be taken in persons for the most part unreal, especially as their fortunes flow into the ordinary channels, nor in the "sad repeated tale" of the pauper earl, the self-sacrificing daughter, the untutored but true-hearted millionaire. No plot is more outworn than this, and stock characters have seldom been more clumsily drawn than in The Way of the World.

Loved contains almost every fault a book can have. It is written in very bad English; it is vulgar; it is impossible; it is exceedingly dull. The heroine, Laura Stacey, was the niece of an old City merchant, and was an heiress and a beauty. When she was seventeen her uncle sent her to Paris with her governess for a year's "finishing," and her proceedings there were most remarkable. "She was not a weak, foolish girl," so she "sought out" the best masters, and "engaged by the month a charming miniature brougham" to take her for long drives in the Bois de Boulogne. Although she "usually took her governess with her," she "often preferred to go alone," and would then dismount and wander about the "exquisite little tangled paths." The Bois de Boulogne is not generally reckoned a desirable place for young ladies to wander about in, and Miss Stacey did not escape the encounters inevitable to the situation; but "with a few polite words she cut the conversation short," and went home. The self-possession of this young lady was truly amazing; nothing put her out. She received notes from strangers appointing rendezvous, declarations of love, and even presents, without the smallest discomposure, and merely returned the latter "in registered envelopes" when she discovered the owner's address. She likewise "went the round of the theatres," this time in company with her governess, whose knowledge of French must have been considerably enlarged by the process. One night at a première at the Vaudeville Miss Stacey perceived a handsome young Englishman by the side of a "fair Phryne." The young Englishman perceived her, and the next day wrote to say that he had once met Laura at her aunt's, and would like to call. For the information of those who have not found it out already, the author observes that "Laura was no prude"; and she consented not only to see Mr. de Vere, the friend of the "fair Phryne," but soon afterwards to drive and walk with him. The most curious part of this is that it never once seems to cross the mind of the author or any of the characters that there is anything unusual in this conduct. Even Laura's beloved uncle in London, "from whom her thoughts never strayed for long together," merely observed, in answer to her request to be allowed to come home, that some rumour had reached him that Hubert de Vere has been her "constant companion for the last three months in Paris," and asked if her "wayward little heart had been caught." He was soon undeceived on this head, and Laura went back to Russell Square, which showed the absence of a woman by a thousand touches—the "little knicknacks put out of sight, the absence of flowers, the blinds pulled up to the very top." The italics are our own, but the remark is characteristic. We have not space to follow Miss Stacey's adventures. In the course of a week or two her uncle died, and she was left mistress of 8,000*l.* a year, only to be retained if she married before she was one-and-twenty. She at once went to Scotland, with her aunt and her cousin, a good-hearted youth, who, in the elegant language of the author, "swaggered no end." He was once fond of embracing Laura, who, having "an innate dislike to meaningless slobbers" (we are again quoting from the author), had taught him better manners. In Scotland, where her house was crowded with guests, in spite of her uncle's very recent death, she had some love-passages with the heir to a dukedom, which came to nothing. As her twenty-first birthday approached, she became very uneasy at not having found any one to marry. Finally, however, her cousin Jack became acquainted with a young man in a hospital and in the very last stage of consumption, whom he persuaded to go secretly through the marriage ceremony with Laura. Of course the young man recovered miraculously, but refused to claim his bride, and left England. Equally of course Laura was so much moved by his letter of renunciation, that passionate love at once sprang into being, and she roamed over the world until she found him. We think by this time we have said enough to justify our opening observations.

In her novel of Zéro Mrs. Praed has apparently been misled by the belief that, as long as the scene is laid at Monte Carlo, no amount of prodigious events can be out of place. "Anything might happen under the Plantagenets," says a character of Miss Braddon's. "Anything may happen under the rock of Turbia," thinks Mrs. Campbell Praed. The opening events occur in the concert-room of the Casino, where the hero, George Warrender—a remarkably shadowy, though fascinating, being—encounters one of those deep-eyed and mysterious persons so numerous in fiction, so scarce, happily, in real life. When we are introduced to these two characters the plot of the story is soon disclosed to us. It is of no use for Mrs. Praed to tell us that Warrender has come abroad to seek distraction from the pain of his rejected love for Helena Kilsyth, the deep-eyed lady's sister. It is equally useless for the lady in question, Mme. Fano, to talk of her absorbing passion for roulette; we know that, before many days are over, we shall find them falling in love with each other over the green table and the rakes. The catastrophe is, however, to all appearance, delayed by the story of George Warrender's past life, and the description of his introduction to Helena Kilsyth, then a child of ten. Here the dates get rather confused. Warrender leaves England, and returns, as far as we can gather, in about a year and a half; yet in this time Helena has become a grown-up and saint-like young lady. No doubt there is some explanation of this; but it is a pity these things are not made clear beyond the possibility of mistake. After Helena has from religious motives rejected Mr. Warrender, her uncle and guardian dies, and she goes to Cannes to live with her highly revered mother and adored sister, both unseen since the days of her childhood. The situation must have been uncomfortable for all parties, and not the least so for the mother, who is forced to descend from her pedestal, and declines into a flighty, superstitious, nervous person (though charming withal), never happy out of the gaming saloon. The position is further complicated by a certain Colonel Cazalette, who is in love with Mme. Fano and has a hold over her mother. This Colonel Cazalette is a regular stage villain, and, finding Mme. Fano is out of his reach, resolves to marry her sister. We will not spoil the story by relating the conclusion, which, however, we must say, though worthy of a place in the world's annals, is unknown to history. We cannot help entering, too, a protest against the enormously long orations in which everybody indulges—a speech of a page and a half is quite an ordinary length. Mr. Warrender is perhaps the chief sinner in this particular, and we cannot refrain from quoting one of his harangues:—

> There are living forces with which we daily come into contact. Even if humanity were composed of irresponsible atoms, there would be play for design in its grouping. Mose, Fano, are you one of those feverish persons who make doubts out of certainties, and certainties out of doubts? Isn't all life a great why? We never not whence we come or whither we go; and if we did, the knowledge would not affect our present condition. Of what use is it to question that restless, long probing inner I which laughs at itself and pities itself? It strains after pure heights that the body cannot reach, and beholds with eyes that we cannot blindfold the pitiful contrasts and incongruities, the grim horrors, the grotesque mockeries, the bitterness, the sweetness, and the pathos, that make life so tangled a skein. It will never give me a satisfying reply; yet the very realization that there is this part of one, as well as the other, the scent of a flower, which loves, joys, suffers, may even sins, lets one above the brute level; and the exquisite happiness at times consoles me also for the pain I endure because of it.

Mrs. Praed has gained by her other books the reputation of a clever novelist, and we hope that in her next story she will choose a less hackneyed and more simple theme than gambling at Monte Carlo.

A Friend in Ten Thousand is really two novels joined together by the slenderest of chains: the story of Maud Temple and Mr. Fortescue, and the story of Miss Amaryllis Lillie, Mr. Foster, and Captain Vincent. By the time we have read half through the first volume, Mr. Fortescue and Maud have met, become engaged, quarrelled, married "another," been widowed, met again, quarrelled again, and finally have consented to make each other happy. It may be as well to say at once, so as to avoid misunderstanding, that all the men who figure in the story, except Mr. Foster, the Friend in Ten Thousand and the connecting link, are singularly devoid of all the characteristics which we are accustomed to consider as necessary to a gentleman. Captain Rupert Vincent, however, easily carries off the palm in this respect. His story, as told by his adoring fiancée, Miss Lillie, to Mr. Foster, who is anxious to marry her, is worthy of note. Miss Lillie relates how four years previously a new arithmetic master, late a captain in the Lancers, had come to her school, and, in spite of her remarkable proficiency in algebra, refused even just praise to his pupil. One day when they were alone she told him so, and in a paroxysm of rage he struck her. From that moment she worshipped him. We do not know which is the most singular. A captain in the Lancers striking a woman, or a woman who loved him repeating such a thing to another man. Indeed, we can imagine few women who, even from the best motives (such as Miss Lillie had), would care to tell of every word of endearment and every caress given them by an accepted lover to one who had been refused. The Friend in Ten Thousand justifies his somewhat cumbersome title first by taking a two months' run over the Continent at Miss Lillie's request in search of the missing captain, and when the search has proved vain, and Miss Lillie has consented to reward her friend's constancy, by bringing back the all-conquering woman-beater to her feet. It seems probable that this is a first novel; but, if so, we hope that Mrs. Harcourt may gain a little more experience before she again goes into print.

Omnia Vanitas is a flat, stale, and unprofitable account of a certain section of modern society, in which every man makes love to his neighbour's wife. The interest, such as it is, lies in Lady Lester, a femme incomprise, who, after leading a dreary life for some years with an unprincipled husband, falls violently in love with a roué. She is arrested on the verge of ruin, by learning some unpleasing facts about the roué's past and present life, and, unable to bear the shock, she dies of consumption or a broken heart. Perhaps this kind of book may entertain people who live like the characters, but assuredly it will be welcome to no one else.

COLLECTORS' MARKS.*

In the modern revival of an interest in art, collecting, and especially print collecting, has become not a fashion only, but almost a passion. There is this to be said for prints, that their variety, from the collector's point of view, is infinite. There are and have been some who took, or tried to take, an equal interest in every kind of art. But to most mortal collectors one branch only is possible, or at best one at a time. The same man may, at different epochs of a long life, learn all about such distinct artists as Dürer, Rembrandt, and Eisen, or Vandyke, Morghen, and Bewick. But this is uncommon, because both years and money fail. The many millionaires mentioned by Mr. Fagan who have accumulated great and universal collections have done it by deputy. Stringa collected for the Duke of Mantua. Flinck's gallery of drawings was bought whole by the Duke of Devonshire. The pictures at Dulwich were collected by Desenfans for Stanislas of Poland. But here the collectors had all the sport, so to speak, and the ultimate owners, though they may have had some pleasure in spending their money, must have otherwise had but little enjoyment. For them there was none of the excitement of the auction; no prowling about among print-shops; no turning over dusty portfolios in search of treasure. A recent collector, happening to be delayed by business in Paris, amused himself for three successive days in examining the stock of a dealer. On the third day he found and bought for a franc a print which, if he had chosen to sell it in the proper quarter, would have paid the expenses of more than three times three days in Paris. Of course such delightful experiences are rare. We who do not collect listen to them as the exceptions by which we should be warned, not encouraged. Yet the finder of a prize unquestionably obtains a wonderful amount of enjoyment for his expenditure; and even if no prize be forthcoming, there is pleasure and profit, in the way of experience, in the mere pursuit. It needs rather a good memory and a sharp eye than a long purse to make a collection. In fact, the great typical collections have been formed by men who were far from wealthy, except in knowledge. Tiffin and Benoni White and Young Ottley were never rich men; but their prints fetched large sums after their death. They had collected with prudence and care, well aware that sooner or later good things must become valuable. People who can trust their memories, who can keep cool as they bid, who can recognize a "state" at a glance, and, above all, who know where to stop, can hardly lose by forming a collection, however limited. But there are many collectors who have few or none of these qualifications; and it is not surprising to find that very often they discover, when it is too late, that what they have bought is worth, at the most, no more than they have given for it.

This is the commercial view of the matter; and, though it is a low one, no collector, however enthusiastic and æsthetic, should neglect it. There is, of course, a higher view. In order to know what a great artist intended it is most necessary to see his work, so to speak, in undress. The drawings of Raphael or Michael Angelo would, of course, if we had not their pictures, tell us but little of their genius. But without the drawings we should only be able to guess at the means by which they attained their unapproachable excellence. When we see that Raphael, or Raffaello, as Mr. Fagan, no doubt rightly, calls him, when he was going to paint such a commonplace subject as a "Madonna and Child," took infinite pains with his preliminary studies, we obtain a higher idea of his greatness. If an ordinary modern artist "made a bit," as we say, by painting a particular group in a particular way, he would certainly after a time, if not after the first time, condescend to sketch no more, and would turn out slight variations of his first pictures as long as dealers would buy them. This is not true of all artists, nor of any great artist. The late sculptor Foley had occasion, at one time or another, to make twenty life-size or colossal statues of one subject. Yet no two are alike. There is a change of position, or dress, or expression, or all three in them all. The drawings of great masters, like Foley's plaster studies of Prince Albert, are therefore not only beautiful and interesting in themselves, but are in the highest degree instructive. In prints similar points may be observed. "States" should be the student's chief occupation. The states of one of Rembrandt's etchings or of one of Turner's mezzotints are most useful. They show what the great artist aimed at, and what means he took to attain his end; and they show the modern artist, who thinks he can "knock off" a plate in a few days and never touch it again, that the greatest men were seldom or never satisfied with the first proof, but went on improving and altering and changing till they got what they wanted at last. It is a remarkable fact that we do not find Dürer's engravings in states. He finished his print, and there was no more to be done. But we find by his innumerable drawings and paintings in body colour and in "grisaille," that he too studied his subject, and altered it, and rubbed it out, and began again, until he had got it as nearly right as he could get it, before he finally and unalterably committed it to the copper. His pupils, especially the Behnms, went differently to work, and we have states of nearly all their prints, and the last state is often, not better, but worse, than the first; while real proof states—unfinished impressions, that is—are of great rarity. It is the same with too many of our modern etchers. They invent states. They purposely stop short of completeness, take a number of so-called "proofs," which prove nothing except remunerative, and then put in a little more work, and prove again. Of course, if half the etchings now poured forth by the thousand are thought valuable by the collector of the future, all these "proofs" will be gathered and collated with care; but we may well think that very few of the artists on copper of the present day will be the object of any great solicitude on the part of our descendants of the twentieth century. "Knocking off" is the bane of nine-tenths of English work at present. We see it among pictures as well as among engravings. No doubt we have reached a high degree of culture, and the average excellence of the work annually turned out is wonderful; but, with two or three remarkable exceptions, and not more than two or three, our artists are content with the most elementary studies of form, composition, and harmony. When some Mr. Fagan of a hundred years hence comes to record the collectors' marks of the time succeeding our own, he will find few prints and fewer drawings marked as worthy of a place in the same portfolios with the Italians and Germans of the fifteenth century, the Flemings of the seventeenth, the French of the eighteenth, or even with the modest Bewicks of the nineteenth.

Mr. Fagan's book is small and compact, and suited to the pocket of the collector. It consists first of an arrangement of all the chief names, not exactly alphabetical, but in such a form that the searcher will most readily find what he wants. Appended to this dictionary is a series of engravings, 668 in number, of the marks which various collectors and museums have used or still use to record their ownership of a print or a drawing as the case may be. There are a good many marks whose origin is unknown, and in some cases the same is variously attributed to different people. It seems, for instance, that the letter C stamped on some old prints is usually presumed to have belonged to the celebrated Queen Christina of Sweden; but it is also claimed for Richard Cosway, the portrait-painter. A set of five stars, which are often found stamped on fine drawings by the old masters, has been usually assigned to Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel; but Mr. Fagan gives reasons for supposing it to belong to the brothers Lanière, who in the reign of Charles I. took their collections to England, and were employed by the King to obtain works of art for him. A lion rampant within an oval border is supposed to be the mark of Prince Rupert, a great amateur, often—but erroneously—said to have invented mezzotint. Where a mark cannot be identified with certainty Mr. Fagan has left a blank space, on which the reader, if he is fortunate enough to find out about it, may record his discovery. There are interesting particulars as to celebrated sales, both English and foreign. In most instances the sum-total of the amount of the sale is added, and either the auctioneer's name or the place. Here and there also, especially with regard to the sales of prints and pictures at a period more or less remote from the present time, an extract from some contemporary record makes the book more complete and useful to the collector. Some of these entries are curious. We have, for instance, accounts of the three famous Mariette collections. It is very common to find, especially on prints of remarkable excellence, the name "P. Mariette" generally written across the face of the impression. This was the earliest of the family, Pierre. Pierre Jean was another of them, and he attained to great celebrity in the last century; and in the years 1775 and 1776 his prints were sold for 357,000 francs, a considerable sum for such objects at that period. His father, Jean Mariette, was a professional engraver, printer, and seller, and was remarkable for his intimate acquaintance with different schools of art. The late eminent Egyptologist was a descendant of these worthies, and is said to have begun life as a draughtsman. Some of his French admirers went considerably out of their way lately to disprove the assertion that he had at one time taught drawing and Latin at a school at Calais, but the attempt was not considered successful; and it is difficult to see exactly in what respect such a story reflected any discredit upon Alphonse Mariette Pasha. There are many curious anecdotes interspersed throughout Mr. Fagan's beautifully got up little volume, and he must have exercised great self-restraint not to have made it twice as large by adding to their number. He gives many quotations from foreign catalogues and notices of sales, from which we may take a single note. It is from a summary of the history of the French national collections: "Des familles de collectionneurs émigrent; le gouvernement confisque leurs portefeuilles et les envoie au Louvre. Nos armées d'Italie et d'Allemagne ramènent de leurs conquêtes, des toiles, des dessins. Les commissaires alliés de 1815 décimaient hélas! ce glorieux butin de nos victoires, et enlevaient le meilleur." This very characteristic, if somewhat unprincipled note, is supplemented by another on a different page. Speaking of the great collection of drawings accumulated by Francis II. of Mantua, Mr. Fagan adds that about 1797 it was seized by the French and conveyed wholesale to the Louvre, one drawing only being returned, "hélas!" in 1815.

LETTER-BOOK OF GABRIEL HARVEY.*

GABRIEL HARVEY'S "Letter-book," which Mr. Scott has edited with great care, shows us glimpses of the writer's life before his celebrated controversy with Nash. The letters and other scraps cover the years between 1573 and 1580, while Harvey was for the most part residing at Cambridge. Though excessively long-winded, pedantic, and filled with conceits wholly destitute of humour, Harvey's letters are not without interest. They give us a few peeps at English existence as it was just three hundred years ago; they reveal to us college Fellows intriguing, squabbling, criticizing each other, and dabbling in verse composition; in short, living as Fellows of colleges always have done. It is some comfort to notice the absurd puerility of the affairs which seemed of importance to Harvey; the smallness of the squabbles, the pettiness of the gossip. Men, or at least University men, have surely grown somewhat more manly since Harvey was kept waiting for his Master's degree. They may unite into sets and cliques, and have their Academic loves and hatreds. But few or no modern students would think it worth while, or find it necessary, to inflict on their Master such epistles as Harvey's letters to the Head of Pembroke Hall. Strife between the Dons and the Master of a college is still nothing unusual; but, undignified as it always must be, it was more undignified in Harvey's time than in ours. He complains that students were anxious to learn to be men of the world. The lesson is always a hard one for the student, who sees but a little corner of the universe through a microscope, and thinks that everybody is listening to his quarrel with another learned person about irregular verbs or the name Achilles bore among women. But a little worldliness has gradually leavened collegiate life; the old mediæval rules have died out, and though Oxford especially remains fond of a tempest in a college teapot, the quarrels are no longer so portentously childish as they were three hundred years ago.

The first letters in Mr. Scott's edition are concerned with the opposition to Harvey's obtaining his Master's degree. Harvey's style, as his editor remarks, is very curious, and his letters are useful to the student of the English of his period. Though full of learning and learned allusions, he is also rich in slang, and a perfect Sancho Panza for proverbs. He begins by complaining to Young, Master of Pembroke Hall, of the "furtherance which injuriously and spitefully hath bene offrid unto him." It was his year "to commens master in," and, as a rule, every one was permitted to take his degree, "unles there be some wonderful great let to the contrari." Yet when Harvey's "grace" was put up, Mr. Osborne denied it, and Mr. Nevil and "Sir Lauhern," Harvey's opponents, kept making delays, and saying "there was no time to talk" about the reasons of their opposition. It appears that Harvey was not "what thai call sociable," though he was "suer he never avoidid compani." Now Mr. Nevil had been unsociable, and indeed rude. "I passing bi him, and moving mi cap, and speking unto him, he hath looked awri another wai, nether afording me a word, nor a cap." Nevil's second reason for refusing Harvey his degree was "that I could hardly find in mi hart to commend of ani man." If this fault is so grievous, but few young dons would ever become Masters of Art, for the Junior Fellow is of his nature captious and critical. Nevil urged the inconsistent plea that Harvey was "always in his extremities," either praising too highly or dispraising too much. This is characteristic of Mr. Swinburne's published criticisms, and perhaps accounts for that scholar's delay to clothe himself either with a bachelor's or a master's gown. Next the foes of Harvey maintained that he had preferred "Mr. Lewin before Mr. Becon" as an extempore speaker. What an extraordinary set of reasons these are for refusing to give a man his Master's degree! An example of contemporary slang comes out in this queer controversy. Harvey had been praising some man's scholarship, when "strait was Mr. Nevil on mi top, and said he plaid the very mudy then, that had so much learning and shoud so little." Again, Harvey was accused of "making but small and light account of his fellowship." Once more (and this is comparatively interesting, as it illustrates the studies of the time) Harvey was called "a great and continual patron of paradoxis, and a maiu defender of straung opinions, and that commonly against Aristotle too." The old orthodox repute of Aristotle had not yet waned away. Harvey's defence was that his ideas were derived "out of Melanchthon, Ramus, Valerius, and Foxius." As to Aristotle, he was only so far sceptical "that I cannot strait wai take it for scripture what soever he hath given his wurd for." Yet another charge was Harvey's habit of wearing a cap or hat in very cold weather "at problem"—that is, we presume, at lecture. His defence has some characteristic examples of his style:—

> Indeed not long after mi first cumming I must needs, and do willingly confes, I having bene veri sore sick, and at the self same time waring a charcher, feeling mi hed sumwhat could (for it was in the deadist time of winter), and, faring lest I shuld take could and kast mi self in to farther sicknes, did presume so mutch of other mens patiens as to put on mi hat; and no man did one seem to note it, or to think ani thing in it, that I could heer of. And a while afterward I, having thus bi reason of sicknes usid mi self to a hat and a karcher, culd not abide ani while to be barched, without sum prasent hed ache: and therefore twise or thrise that winter and not above, uppon the cruellist cuuld nihts, did after the same manner. No man al this while for ouht that I culd lern did one sai black was mine i for it. The next winter, uppon a sharp frosti niht or two, being not greatly wel nethir, I was so hardi as to do as mutch; and so was M. Nevil him self too one, by his leav, being then but batchelar as wel as I. The secund time M. Nuce veri freudly, I thank him, gave me this caveat in mine are, that it was not the custum that bateelurs shuld be coverid, and that it was offensive unto certain of the cumpani.

As an example of his unsociability, his opponents declared "that I wuld needs in al hast be a studdiing in Christmass when others were a plaiing, and was then whottist at my book, when the rest were hardist at their cards." It is a notorious fact in human nature that we resent no crime more than the refusal of others to play with us. People once engaged in a round game are of a persecuting spirit, and intolerant of schismatics who decline to take a hand. But even the "whottist" common-room gamblers at loo would scarcely refuse the hard-reading man his degree. The quarrel after the first letter loses itself in the sands of time; it is enough to know that the Master took Harvey's side, and got him his degree. Though not a very sympathetic character, he certainly seems to have been hardly treated by the "iolli fellows" of Pembroke Hall. Harvey is very fond, by the way, of this word "jolly," which he uses in an ironical sense. In a letter to his father he gives an account of his victory, how he first got his "grace ad visitandum," as we call it:—

> That is, to visitt all ye Masters in the towne of five yeares, whereunto we ar inioined by statute, which is all that can be dun at ye secund meeting. That afternoon and ye next day wholy, and uppon Weddensday in ye morning, I trudgid upp and down ye towne a visiting, as gossups in sum plâces do a gaddinge.

But Harvey's troubles were not yet over. He was giving a Greek lecture when "Mr. Proctor, being calid down out of his chamber bi Mr. Osburn, as I lerned sins, commith swelling in, like sum greater man than the Junior Proctor, and commaundith ye schollars from the table, saiing in his Proctor's vois that I should read no lecture there." At that time the duty of the Proctor's bulldog seems to have been to carry a great chained-book with the statutes of the University. "If he would but take the chaindl book in his hand, whitch his man carrith after him, and take the pains to run over the title concerning the Proctor's office and charge, I beleev he should find his authoriti wil scars stretch so far as to order, or rather disorder matters at his pleasure, and to others shame, at private collegis."

After his complaints of ill treatment by his college and the Junior Proctor, we have Harvey's letters to Edmund Spenser. The poet had published, without permission, a copy of Harvey's "Verlayes" (virelais), his first attempts at English verse. Nefarious attempts they are, though Harvey's indignation and sarcasms are probably the expression of mock modesty. "Whether these letters ever passed between the friends," says Mr. Scott, "or whether they are the mere creatures of Harvey's imagination, it is now quite impossible to decide." We incline to believe that Harvey acted like Mr. Toots when he indited letters to distinguished persons and answered them himself. The great idea on which Harvey harps in these epistles is that Spenser, having published his poems, should lend him his beard to conceal his blushes. He professes that English composition is unworthy of his status at Cambridge.

> What greater and more odious infamye for on of my standinge in the Universitye and profession abroade then to be reckond in the Beaderoule of Inglish Rimers, esspecially beinge occupied in so base an obiecte and bandelinge a theame of so slender and small importance?

He thus enforces his demand for Spenser's beard:—

> And herein onlye to save trothe and to be playne, thou maist make me sum litle peece of amendes if so be your good mastershippes worshipp woulde deigne the vouchesafynge me by the next carrier that cummith downe to Sterbridge fayr ether so reasonable quantity of your valorous and invincible currage or at the leste the clippings of your thrishonorable mustachyoes and subboscoes to overshadow and to coover my blushinge against that tyme.

Perhaps the most important part of this volume to a student of University history is Harvey's account of the books men were reading, "Aristotle's Organon is nigh hand as little redd as Dunse's Quodlibet." There was a taste for Philbert's "Philosophy of the Courte," and for Castiglione's "Il Cortegiano," in Hobbs's translations. Plutarch in French and the stratagems of Polyænus and Philippe de Comines were popular, "and I know not how many outlandish braveries of the same stamp." There was also much interest in political philosophy, which was studied in the best authors. Aristotle's Economics and Politics "every one hath by rote. You cannot stepp into a scholler's study but, ten to one, you shall likely find open either Bodin De Republica, or Le Royes Exposition uppon Aristoteles Politiques, or sum other like Frenshe or Italian Politique Discourses." The Prince of Macchiavelli was a great favourite, and his Discourses on the first ten books of Livy.

Harvey's verses are a proverb for badness. He amused himself with writing English verses which may be more readily scanned perhaps than Mr. Matthew Arnold's fragments of, or translations, of Homer. This is the only praise that can be given to the essays of Harvey, whereof we offer a specimen:—

> See Venus, archegoddess, howe trimly she masterith owld Mars.
> See litle Cupide, howe he bewitcheth lernid Apollo.
> Bravery in apparell, and maiesty in hawty behaviour,
> Hath conquerd manhood, and gotten a victory in Inglande.
> Forse Bellona, she lyes enclosd at Westminster in leade
> Dowtines is dulnes; currage mistermid is outrage.
> Manlines is madnes; beshrowe Lady Curtisy therefore.
> Most valorous enforced to be vassals to Lady Pleasure.
> And Lady Nicity rules like a soveran emperes of all.
> O tymes, O manners, O French, O Italish Inglande.
> Where be ye mindes and men that woont to terrify strangers?
> Where that constant zeale to thy cuntry glory, to vertu?
> Where labor and prowes very founders of quiet and peace,
> Champions of warr, trompetours of fame, treasurers of welth?
> Where owld Inglande? Where owld Inglish fortitude and might?

Ould Mars and Ould Ingland sound rather Irish.

People who like "scandal about Queen Elizabeth" or her period will find it in Harvey's amazing account of how a young married nobleman wooed his own sister. The lady, though cautious, seems to have been in a coming-on humour at times, and the particulars of the courtship must be read in the plain-spoken text of Harvey. The nobleman is always called Milord, and writes the "maide" loving letters, which she (though she would fain be honest) cannot help answering. "'Tis not rite and proper, your man tells me, that can content Milord." And Miss Harvey ends with this curious posy, all out of her own head:—

> Yours as she may,
> And not as you say,
> Though it greeve ye.
> Yours as she can,
> And not as you scan,
> You may beleeve me.
>
> And thus I pray you stay.
> Youre M.

How "mi young lord fell to swaring" (and no wonder) may be read in the original, and how he presented Miss Harvey with "13*s.* in testers and shillings." Finally, a letter of Milord's fell into Harvey's hands, and it may be hoped that he stopped a flirtation which was more than perilous. Miss Harvey was clearly in danger, more through vanity than anything else. Here the interest of Harvey's Letter-book ends; there are no more grains of historical gold in the mass of pedantry.

SOME BOOKS OF TRAVEL.*

We believe we may say that we have read Mr. Little's book conscientiously. We have no quarrel whatever with his political views, which he expresses freely, and we believe him to be a very well-meaning person, and even in a certain sense not ill informed. But he has apparently practised the very worst kind of penny-a-lining English till he can write no other; his judgment appears to be a non-existent quantity, and his egotism and maladroitness are something phenomenal. He cannot tell the best known story (for instance, that about '47 and '48 in connexion with port) without spoiling it hopelessly. He informs his readers that he gave some gentleman who traduced the State a "sound thrashing," and the disgusted reader discovers that it was a sound thrashing "in the columns of the Natal Mercury." But the most unbelievable and pyramidal passage in the book is perhaps the following:—

> Some portions of the foregoing chapters have appeared in the Journal of which I have spoken in the preface to this work, and they have received the most flattering and favourable notice from the leading Cape Journals—the Cape Argus, Natal Mercury, and Times of Natal, &c. I was heartily amused, however, to read an article occupying over two columns of space in a certain Natal journal upon my remarks concerning young Natal. The writer has unconsciously by his style of treatment given powerful testimony to my statements concerning the selfishness and want of breeding observable in too many typical Natalians. For, while he has not refuted a single assertion of mine, he has descended to the grossest personalities conveyed in the poorest jokes concerning my patronymic. Some score of times he alludes to me as "Little Mr. Little," and upon my adjectival appellation he has rung the changes by using all the synonyms at his command—"wee," "diminutive," and so on. Perhaps this undue anger, and this obliviousness of all the canons of gentlemanly behaviour, may be owing to the fact that "Little Mr. Little" was considered sufficient'y "big" to write the leaders for a Natal paper, the latchet of whose shoes the journal in question is not worthy to fasten. I will be charitable, however, as even the aforesaid organ accords me the place of honour in its leading columns, and thus gives the lie to its own contentions concerning my unimportance.

This, it will be admitted, is something out of the common, and, after it, it is vain to quote anything else, although Mr. Little is rather exhibited by it in his character of egotist than in his character of bad writer. In the latter, however, he poses impartially throughout almost all his pages, from the very earliest, in which he speaks of eating a sandwich slowly as "languidly patronizing your sumptuous repast." There is valuable information to be got out of his book, but it is information mingled with twice its quantity of trivial and irrelevant matter, and conveyed in a most excruciating style.

Miss Smith has written a very good book of its kind respecting a pleasant journey through Greece which she, her sister, and a friend took last year. The three ladies got on excellently, and have little but good to report of the Hellenes, always excepting the condition of their stromata, which appears to have remained unchanged since the days of Aristophanes. They did not go into any very out-of-the-way places, which the reader is rather sorry for. But still the regular Greek grand tour, though apparently more stereotyped than that of any other country, is also more interesting and certainly in proportion much less hackneyed. Miss Smith and her companions, who had prepared themselves systematically for their journey by learning ancient Greek according to the modern pronunciation (a thing likely to interfere with appreciation of the literature, but very useful for practical purposes), spent some considerable time at Athens, and then took the round by Corinth, Argos, Tripolitza, Sparta, Leuctra, Ithome, and Olympia to the convent of Megaspelion, the gorge of the Styx, and the coast at Vostitza. Then they crossed the Gulf, visited Parnassus, and returned to Athens by Chæronea and Thebes. Also while in Attica they "did" Marathon and Cape Colonna. Miss Smith's sister distributed tracts and copies of the Gospels, like George Borrow, and Miss Smith had arguments with the polite heads of convents on such light subjects as the worship of the Panagia, the doctrine of eternal punishment (on which she wishes that they could have heard that great preacher, Canon Farrar), and so forth. Also she indulged in much patriotic comparison of Aristomenes and Wallace at Ithome—a comparison which is rather hard on one of the pair; we shall not say which. Her sister, it seems, is, or was, going to be married to a gentleman whose initials seem not to be unknown to us, and we do not know whether he will thank Miss Smith for printing some of his verse-epistles to his betrothed. Finally, we are plunged into the extremest depths of hopeless difficulty by two remarks of Miss Smith's. She comments on the "strange fancy of the Greeks for giving their children heathen names," and she says that she thought Greek scenery the most beautiful in the world till she went through the St. Gothard Tunnel. These statements, we say, plunge us into what Dickens's Henerietta, who is, we regret to see, printed in modern editions Henrietta, calls an "unfarmable abyss" of speculation. But with some little eccentricities Miss Smith is an excellent travel-writer, and clearly also an excellent traveller. She sees with her eyes and with her understanding; she appears to be plucky without being foolhardy; and she can describe what she sees and does without, indeed, any very extraordinary elegance, but with a graphic pen which avoids alike slovenliness and fine writing. We wish she had gone into the less familiar parts of the country, such as the extremities of the Peloponnesus, Eubœa, Ætolia, and the border between Greece proper and Thessaly; but perhaps these are not places for ladies. On the route actually pursued the three travellers appear (insects excepted) to have met with no more annoyance than if they had gone on a tour through Scotland, and, except that they had to ride instead of driving, with little more difficulty of any kind. No doubt their linguistic accomplishments helped them on their way, and by giving them some other interest in the country than that derived from Murray or Baedeker increased their enjoyment. But this may be said of all countries possible to the traveller.

Miss Duffus Hardy writes with much more pretension than Miss Smith, and with much finer language, but (we frankly confess) in a manner much less to our taste. Her subject is also much less interesting; being merely the now beaten route of globe-trotters across America and back again, with a visit to Florida as a kind of bonne bouche at the end. We must also add that the author appears to our doubtless Philistine and old-fogeyish views to have done things that it were much better she had not done. We cannot think that an English lady is in her proper place when she visits the maisons de tolérance of the Chinese quarter in San Francisco, and if this is thought to be a harsh judgment it would be surely harsher to adopt the only possible alternative, and say that she is in her proper place. Neither do we like to hear of one of our countrywomen repeatedly trying to introduce the subject of polygamy in Mormon society, and being politely foiled. These objections are of course very antiquated, but they happen to express our sentiments, by which we mean to stick. Other people are quite at liberty to accompany Miss Hardy among Chinese daughters of marble, and to speculate with her on the particular causes which attract women to Mormonism if they like. She has done her best to attract and satisfy the general reader, not only by the above-mentioned fine writing, but by taking up such tricks as narration in the present tense and the like. Doubtless she will have her reward; and here also, if she likes it and her readers like it, we have nothing to say. But as there are readers, as in the other case, who may not like it, it is just as well to mention the fact.

Mr. Horatio Brown's series of Venetian sketches, most of which have appeared, it seems, in periodicals, is readable enough, and even readable not without pleasure. The wise will skip his "Proem: a Rhapsody on Venice." There are so many rhapsodies on Venice, and any one who wants them can find them so much better done than by Mr. Horatio Brown. But when Mr. Brown leaves off rhapsodizing, and comes to give the results of long and careful exploration into the life and ways of Venice itself, he becomes much more important. Many volumes, or the equivalent of many volumes, have been written about "The Gondola." But Mr. Brown writes about it in quite a new way. Instead of telling us for the thousandth time about Tasso, or doing a little bit of love and murder business, he tells us how and where they build gondolas, and how much they cost, and what they are made of, and how long they last, and so forth. Under "Home Life" there is little or nothing about stilettoes. But there is a great deal about the proper component parts of a Venetian wedding-feast, and an inventory of the furniture considered necessary by decent Venetians of the working class, and a comparative discussion of the merits of Venetian wines, and so on, and so on. Now all this is small beer, doubtless; but it is by no means unamusing small beer; and we could spare half a dozen of the ordinary books of travel for it.

The anonymous author or authors of A Jaunt in a Junk (by their own confession it was not a junk, and by their own description it was not in the very least like one) are pretty evidently novices in composition, and so deserve the mercy that all novices who are not bumptious and who do not write in very bad taste are entitled to. Also their proceeding, which was to voyage by themselves with a small native crew in a Bombay harbour-boat down the west coast of India, was somewhat original and not unpraiseworthy. But the record of that proceeding is much too long for any interest that it has, and it is made long by means of all sorts of digressions, from a dissertation on eating to a criticism (and not a very knowledgeable one) on Sir Garnet Wolseley's strategy at Tel-el-Kebir. Now this sort of Voyage en Zigzag may be a very charming thing if it is written so as to be very charming, but if not, not. This oracular, but absolutely justifiable and justified, statement may dispense us from any further criticism of A Jaunt in a Junk. With judicious skipping it is not unreadable.

None of the faults of taste already noticed mar Mrs. Cecil Hall's small and unpretending, but by no means valueless, book. We might have said of faults of taste at all; but perhaps there is a solitary one, the use of the absurd modern Gallicism serviette for the good old English word napkin. Otherwise the book is as free from nonsense as it can be. It tells briefly, and in the most unvarnished fashion, the experiences of two ladies who went out to Winnipeg to visit and comfort for a time certain male relatives of theirs; who stayed with them for months, playing the good housewife in the most practical fashion; then indulged themselves in a fishing tour in Colorado; and, finally, came home very much the better in all ways (except, perhaps, in complexion, we should say) for their journey. There is something extremely invigorating in the history of Mrs. Hall's and her companion's immediate accommodation of themselves to cooking and cleaning and clothes-mending, and the like. The reader conceives an immense respect for them and a comfortable conviction that the term "lady" is not here conventional merely. As for the total impression of this sketch of Manitoban life, it certainly shows that anybody who goes out with a moderate capital and chooses to work like a horse will get on. But, like all narratives of the kind, it suggests the inevitable reflection that, if not any one, a very large number of "ones" might live very fairly in similar circumstances at home. That gentleman farming in these days, when the gentleman farmer thinks he ought to live as if he were receiving the rent he pays, too often means bankruptcy every one knows. That professional farming with insufficient capital, and with a standard of living not indeed quite so high, but unduly high, means the same is equally clear. But why has not some one the pluck to try Manitoban living on English soil? This is an old enough reflection, and we could probably ourselves give the answer just as well as any one else could. But no one who takes an interest in politics as well as in agriculture can help thinking what a different farming community we might have in such a case from the agitating imitators of Mr. James Howard and Mr. Albert Bath, who are always scheming to "cabbage" the rights of the landlord and the parson, and from the speculators and incapables who ruin by turns themselves and the lands they unluckily find no difficulty in obtaining.

Tracks in Norway is but a little one, and its littleness pleads with the reviewer to spare it. But an unquotably coarse proverb of one of the Elizabethan or Cromwellian exterminators of Ireland is here in place. The nuisance of books of travel of the garrulous-extravagant kind is becoming nearly intolerable, and Tracks in Norway, which seems to show that the authors have read Three in Norway only too faithfully, is one of the worst of its kind. The Official, the Philosopher, the Judge, and the Savage, as the four persons guilty of this folly absurdly and tiresomely designate themselves, in imitation of an absurd and tiresome fashion, do not, so far as we can see, utter one good joke, give one memorable description, or visit one place that has not been often visited and described before. In private letters, or as a diary for personal reading in future days, their stuff would be not much worse than what most men have written in one or other of these two ways at some time of their lives—generally the undergraduate time. But when printed it becomes what it has been called above—nearly intolerable. The one and only excuse for the authors is that they have taken not quite one hundred pages to write themselves down, which at twenty-five each is not an exorbitant allowance. We have known authors who have managed to make the signalement of an individual personality of this kind fill twenty times as much.

HUMOUR, WIT, AND SATIRE OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.*

It may be safely predicted of this volume that it will prove popular, but not so popular as its predecessor by the same author on the social state of England under Queen Anne. In some respects it is a most useful book; it affords a glimpse here and there of the English country life concerning which Mr. Ashton's former book was, for the most part, silent; it contains a quantity of verse which is both instructive and suggestive; from its pages might be compiled a very fair picture of manners in the early part of the century; and, by the aid of the excellent Bibliographical Appendix the reader is guided in the direction of fuller research. This appendix contains a pretty complete list of all the collections of sports, riddles, drolleries, and "wits' recreations" published during the period treated of, from the pleasant conceits of Hobson, the merry Londoner, the "conceited jests" of Peele, the jests of Tarlton and Scogin, to Tom D'Urfey's Pills to Purge Melancholy, which appeared in the penultimate year of the seventeenth century. It is pleasing to find on looking through the list that even under the Commonwealth when, we are apt to believe, the country was plunged in the gloom of a fanatic religion, there was still some demand for the materials of mirth. "Jovial Poems," "Wit Restored," and "Pasquil's Jests, with the Merriments of Mother Bunch," all appeared between 1750 and 1760. There were, in fact, young people even then, and though the theatres might be closed, there was still telling of stories and singing of songs beside the fire. Let us, before we go any further, give Mr. Ashton the credit due to him of admirable patience and conscientious industry. Henceforth, those who wish to know what were the songs that pleased and the jokes which amused our grandfathers of the seventeenth century may, without any trouble of original research, consult the book, and so satisfy a laudable curiosity. Those who go farther and hunt through the original collections for themselves will assuredly fare worse, for they will have to wade through an astonishing mass of mud. To use Mr. Ashton's words:—"We do not wish to cast any slur either on the modesty or the morality of our ancestors, but their ways were not quite as our ways." In fact, it will be found that in the matter of coarseness the English live in a house with a great many glass windows.

* Humour, Wit, and Satire of the Seventeenth Century. Collected and Illustrated by John Ashton, Author of "Chap-Books of the Eighteenth Century," "Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne," &c. London: Chatto & Windus.

Mr. Ashton states that he has found great pleasure in his task. For ourselves we must own that the only pleasure we have ever derived from reading the old jests lies in the surprise of finding that all the jokes are ancient. Jokes, like stories, are limited in number; they have to be dressed up afresh for every generation; therefore they never grow old; it is not their age which causes mankind to yawn over an old collection of jokes, but the clumsiness of their antiquated garb. Take, for instance, the drinking stories, of which a nation of topers must needs possess a great quantity. Most of them are in this book. Every one of them has been told over and over again; there is the fellow who gets caught by a trailing briar, and thinks it is a friend dragging him back for a parting glass; this story, without much alteration, may be found wherever the humorous side of drunkenness is presented: Dean Ramsay is full of such stories; the man who catches hold of a post in the street and solemnly walks round it under the belief that he is walking straight down Fleet Street—the latest form of this tale is that of the one-legged man who sticks his wooden leg into a fire-plug and walks round it all night; the man who lies down in the fields in the moonlight and thinks he is in bed, and begs his companion to lay another blanket over his feet and to put out the candle this story is narrated among undergraduates to the present day; the man who was fined sixpence for swearing while drunk and threw down half-a-crown, taking out the change in good round oaths—these are all among the old friends whom we are pleased to meet in seventeenth-century dress; they will continue to reappear so long as men continue to drink—that is to say, for a great many generations yet to come.

It is a great pity that Mr. Ashton did not take an opportunity, which he will never perhaps get again, of classifying the jests and drolleries which he has republished. It would have been one step towards creating a Science of Laughter, as there is already a Science of everything else. For instance, it is curious to remark how the story of the dumb woman getting cured of her dumbness was thought funny enough to be told three times, at least, in the century, because it is given three times in this volume. If all the stories and songs about drinking had been placed together, and these again subjected to some kind of arrangement, some conclusions as to vinous enthusiasm and its nature might be profitably drawn. Thus there is first of all the simple drinking song, of which several are given by Mr. Ashton, the best of them being one called "A health to all good fellowes," beginning

Be merry my hearts and call for your quarts,
And let no liquor be lacking,
We have gold in store, we purpose to roar,
Until we set care a packing.
Then Hostess make haste, and let no time waste,
Let every man have his due,
To save shoes and trouble, bring in the pots double.
For he that made one made two.

This should be followed by the "John Barleycorn" verses, of which there are two sets; our loved old friends the "Leather Bottell," the "Bonny Black Jack," and a few others of the same kind; the drunken jests would come last. So with the songs and stories concerning women and the sorrows of matrimony, of which the seventeenth century was peculiarly rich; all these should have been placed together. Some of them are very good, especially that of the "Woman to the Plough and the Man to the Hen Roost," in which the farmer and his wife, after continually finding fault with each other, change their work, with results which are vigorously and humorously narrated. Then there is a dialogue between Thomas and John on women and wine, "to a gallant and delightful Tune well known among Musitioners." Thomas and John maintain opposite opinions. Saith Thomas:—

Women have hooks, and women have crooks,
So hath the wine, so hath the wine;
Which draws great lawyers from their books
More than the wine, more than the wine.
But if you'll believe me,
I'll tell you true
What good women are like unto.
Wine, wine, women and wine,
Thus may you compare them too.

John rejoins:—

Women have beauty and fair looks,
So hath the wine, so hath the wine;
Far surpassing the lawyer's books,
More than the wine, more than the wine.
But if you'll, &c.

There is, of course, the jealous wife. "Give me," says the husband,

Give me my yellow Hose again,
Give me my yellow hose;
For now my wife she watcheth me;
See yonder where she goes.

Were yellow hose worn by all apprentices? The singer clearly shows that by his yellow hose he means his 'prentice days. There is the story of the "seldom cleanly" housewife—which goes, perhaps, too much into detail. There is the song of "The Patient Man's Woe," which is, as might be expected, his unquiet wife:—

As soon as she is out of bed
Her looking-glass she takes;
So vainly is she daily led,
Her morning's worke she makes
In putting on her brave attire,
That fine and costly be,
Whilst I work hard in dirt and mire.
Alacke! what remedy?

The sorry figure cut by the wife is probably due to the fact that all the songs on matrimony were written by the men. One trembles to think what might be said should the women, now that they have the power, show a spirit of revenge. Another important class of "comic" stories is found in the numerous tricks, fourberies, and dodges of thieves and indigent wits. Our literature is rich in these stories, though they are not without resemblance to the corresponding French stories; one book alone, which might perhaps have been consulted oftener, The English Rogue, is a treasure-house of rogues' ways. Mr. Ashton has a few of such stories, but not many; and those not very striking for originality. There is, for instance, the story how Scogin defrauded the Alderman whom he had promised to pay the first time he met him, by taking care never to meet him. The story of the man who pretended to buy the load of hay and sold it as his own to the innkeeper has been told over and over again with variations; another old story is that of the cobbler who answers the questions meant for the chaplain; and the story of the Cunicatcher and the priest is also borrowed. Next, there are the epigrams, which need not be considered, because they are nearly all translations or imitations of Martial. The stories in which the devil plays a part belong to the early part of the century, and are survivals, together with those concerning friars and priests, of old Roman Catholic days. During the last half of the century, and for the whole of the following hundred years, Calvinism obliged people to treat the devil with respect; he was no longer to be laughed at as in the old days when there was a Purgatory for honest folk and priests to pull them out of that; after the Commonwealth there are no more stories about the devil among the folk. There are a few political songs in the collection, but not many; it would have been easy to fill this volume with the Roundhead and Cavalier poetry, but the field has been already pretty well worked. It is interesting, however, to be reminded of the deep impression made on the popular imagination by Prince Rupert, with his favourite dog and his monkey. There are two or three good lusty beggar's songs; it is curious how the picturesque side of the beggar's life, its lawlessness and its freedom, have always struck the mind of the people. There are three admirable beggar's songs in the book. The following is a verse from one of them:—

We beg for our bread,
But sometimes it happens
We feast with Pigg, Pullet, Conny, and Capons.
For Churche's affairs
We are no Man Slayers;
We have no religion, yet live by our Prayers;
But if, when we beg, Men will not draw their purses,
We charge and give fire, with a volley of curses;
The Devil confound you: good Worship we cry,
And such a bold brazen-faced beggar am I.

There are, next, the stories in which one man succeeds in insulting another, bringing him to shame, leaving him vainly seeking for a retort; this is a very large class of story; in fact, there are endless methods of calling a man Fool, Ass, Liar, Coward, Thief; anybody can do it who has the courage or the impudence. There is one in which it is a woman who is left wondering what she ought to have said:—

Two Sparks standing together in the Cloysters, seeing a pretty Lady pass by, says one of them, There goes the handsomest Lady that I ever saw in my Life; She hearing him, turned back, and seeing him very ugly, said, Sir I would I could in way of Requital say as much of you. Faith, says he, so you may, and Lye as I did.

Then there are the stories of liars and braggarts, of which we moderns produce little, not because liars are less plentiful, but because there is more knowledge, and therefore less scope for the imagination. The story showing the longevity of the raven will be remembered by all who were schoolboys, and read in a certain book of Greek Selections twenty or thirty years ago:—

Another fellow said that he had heard all their stories, and did think at first that some of them had been untruths, but now, says he, I am better satisfied; and I will tell you what I know upon my own knowledge. I was once in some company where I heard one of them say that to his knowledge a Raven would live a hundred years: so the next day I went and bought me one purposely to make a Tryal, and put him into a Cage and taught him to sing; and I think in my Conscience no Bird but a Raven could sing like him. Well, says he, I kept this Bird above a hundred years; nay, if I should say two hundred, I should not lie, and fed him all the time myself.

There are the University stories, in one of which occurs an Oxford version of the Limousin scholar; there are the jests of Tarlton, Peele, and Scogin, who smoke tobacco, go "a-domineering," try conjuring, are themselves taken in, and prove that "money is better than learning." There are the political songs, of which there were so many, but in this collection there are very few; and there are the songs in which Poverty finds consolation in Complaint, such as the "Poet's Dream," or "The Cause that the Mind Complains," and "The Poor Man Pays for All." As for those which cannot be classified, there are one or two in praise of the happy past, such as "When this Old Cap was New"; the country maid reckons her chickens before they are hatched; the sailor goes a-hunting just like Commodore Trunnion; there is the everlasting marriage market; there is the Curtain Lecture; there is the pig-faced lady;

there is the complaint of the ragged soldier; and there is the old Land of Cocaigne, here called Lubberland, where

> The rivers run with claret fine,
> The brooks with rich Canary,
> The ponds with other sorts of wine
> To make your hearts full merry.
> Nay, more than this, you may behold
> The fountains flow with brandy,
> The rocks are like refined gold,
> The hills are sugar-candy.

But the distinctive feature in the popular literature of the century is certainly its richness in political and religious satire; and this element is most inadequately represented in Mr. Ashton's volume; so far, therefore, the book is not a complete picture of the century; next, it is a mistake to present a collection of extracts without any kind of classification or chronological order as a picture of the century; there is so wide a difference between the mind of the nation at the end and that at the beginning of the century that the jests of Tarlton and Scogin seem absolutely out of place beside a ballad by Tom D'Urfey, and the conceits of Peele can in no sense be considered as belonging to a generation which loved the wit of Tom Brown, who was born in 1663, and died in 1704, so that he belongs almost entirely to the seventeenth century, and that of Ned Ward, who was only a year or two younger, and whose London Spy came out, unless we are mistaken, about the year 1698. But Mr. Ashton has already made so copious a use of these two masters of refined and dainty humour in his previous work, that he seems afraid to consider them as belonging to the seventeenth century. Strange it is that humanity will not conform, in matters of change, with chronology. In short, the seventeenth century demands three such volumes as the one before us; the first, to which the jests and conceits of Tarlton, Scogin, and Peele belong, together with the borrowed epigrams and the laborious riddles, ends about the year 1630. Then would follow a volume almost wholly occupied with political and religious satire; and the third volume would include the last forty years of the century when the materials for mirth must be sought partly in the comedies of the Restoration, and in such writers as Brown and Ward, but especially in Tom D'Urfey's unrivalled collection of songs, out of which about one in fifty permits itself to be quoted in full. The third volume, therefore, would be considerably thinner than the other two.

A TEA-PLANTER'S LIFE IN ASSAM.*

AT some schools one of the masters discharges the useful functions of a tutor in composition. He has no form of his own but he overlooks the Greek and Latin prose and verse of a number of lads, who afterwards show their amended exercises to the particular master to whom they are "up." In this way false quantities and concords are detected, crudities are suppressed, and time is saved. We could wish that young aspirants to literary fame had a similar candid and judicious friend to revise their essays. A censor would at once have perceived that Mr. Barker, unlike the hero of Canning's ode, had a story to tell about tea-planting in a jungly province, but that the earlier chapters might be profitably excised. The overland journey, the occupations by which the tedium of the voyage down the Red Sea is lightened, and first impressions of Calcutta, have been put into print scores of times. Pictures of ayahs, adjutant birds, barbers and water-carriers, with a palanquin and the façade of the Great Eastern Hotel, so long known as D. Wilson's, have been long stripped of any novelty or attractiveness. Few of the seventy-five illustrations have any special merit, with exception perhaps to the sketches of the tea-garden, the coolies' hospital, and the planter's own bungalow. And too much is made of domestic plagues and nuisances. Every one knows pretty well that mosquitoes suck blood, centipedes and ants sting, and jackals howl and frogs croak at night. Griffs have to put up with these torments as their predecessors did before them; but it is not necessary that they should take the public into their confidence and tell us that if prickly heat is annoying, it is thought by the medical profession to be a sign of rude health.

And yet there is something to be learnt from Life in Assam, especially at this juncture. The book is not equal to Colonel Money's Cultivation and Manufacture of Tea, which gained the prize awarded by the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India in 1872. But it throws further light on the tedious Ilbert Bill. In one of the most weighty official warnings delivered against that wanton and foolish measure, it was pertinently remarked that Englishmen in Assam, Cachar, and similar wild districts had by their own efforts obtained a very peculiar position. In other provinces English interests were doubtless important, but native interests were larger and more important still. In Bengal and Behar, for instance, Englishmen had done a good deal to manufacture indigo, to encourage the cultivation of silk, to build bungalows, to make roads, and to establish factories. But these gratifying results could hardly be weighed against the agricultural interests of millions of tenant-proprietors, the inland traffic on canal and river carried on almost wholly by native merchants, and the rights and privileges of the class of Zemindars. Hindus in Bengal had taken the lead in clearing the jungle, in extending the cultivation of the date-palm and the sugar-cane, and in making jute one of the chief staples of export. Not so in Assam. There, hardly anything had been done from the first Burmese War of 1824 after which we annexed the valley of the Brahmaputra, to the rise of tea cultivation in the last year of Lord Canning's administration. Then, when indigo collapsed, tea was taken up. Merchants and planters were invited to bid for grants of waste land and to cultivate the tea-plant, without overriding an ancient tenantry and without the necessity of taking leases of more villages than they really wanted from avaricious Zemindars. Calcutta responded to the call, and in the space of twenty years public Companies flourished, sunk, and flourished again. Individuals made a competence out of gardens of their own. Roads were cut through reeds and forests. Labourers were attracted by good pay from the over-peopled districts of Central and Western Bengal, and "Protectors" were appointed to see fair play between the employer and the servant. All this was done by British energy and intelligence, and the results fully justified the Chief Commissioner of Assam in remarking that, whereas in other provinces the native claims on Government were equal or far superior to the English, in Assam it was just the reverse. Natives had done nothing for material progress. Englishmen had been invited to do everything, and they had done a great deal. "Look well," said De Vaux in the famous scene in The Talisman where Saladin and Richard compete with each other in athletic feats of strength or skill; "Look well, it will be long ere your long jackanape's fingers do such a feat with your fine gilded reaping-hook there." Lord Ripon's abortive legislation is a queer corollary to Lord Canning's action. Already we have been warned that it will be difficult to expect co-operation in making roads and bridges, in discharging judicial functions, and in looking after schools and sanitation, from men who have created an industry, improved a province, and rushed in where native capitalists feared to tread. Mr. Bright might fairly apply his favourite epithets of stupid and foolish to any one who wished to deprive these pioneers of civilization of their very reasonable privilege, exemption, or anomaly of being tried on criminal charges by one of their own colour and race.

It is very true that, after all, the actual area covered by tea cultivation may not be very extensive. The clearance of the land from timber and brushwood entails a heavy expense. The plant does not become productive till the fourth year. It cannot spread with the rapidity of rice, jute, or indigo. A plantation of only 400 or 500 acres in full bearing is more valuable than three or six times that amount of Zemindary land. But Government can now rely on a number of energetic Englishmen dotting certain spots in each district with their bungalows, ready to denounce abuses, to repress crime, to forward local works, and to serve as centres of loyal action in times of famine, discontent, or aggression on the part of savage border tribes. The Anglo-Saxon may be high-handed and imperious, and may require to be warned, checked, and coerced at times; but it is idle to preach the doctrine of pure equality to men of his stamp and character, or to tell them that, as a reward for special enterprise and vigour, they ought to be sacrificed to a purely legislative crotchet.

When Mr. Barker explains the various processes of clearing, planting, hoeing, plucking the leaf, weighing, rolling, tea-firing, and packing, he is really worth our attention. If you cannot purchase a profitable ready-made garden, your only plan is to get a grant of waste land from Government and clear the ground yourself. The author is very indignant with the Indian Government for not creating freehold tenures. Leases are usually given for long periods at low and gradually increasing rents. The rules for such grants have been often altered since their first promulgation by Lord Canning, and the object of Government has uniformly been to prevent land jobbing, and not recklessly to give away the future increment of the State. Every planter knows perfectly well that at the expiration of his lease, long or short, renewal on equitable terms is an absolute certainty if he has only fulfilled some very reasonable conditions. And, if some over-zealous speculators make bad shots at sites, disregard facilities of transport, expect to make large fortunes all at once, or commit other errors, it is hardly for Government, as the Frenchman said of Providence, de réparer leurs sottises. On most sites there is some valuable original forest, which, when cut down, serves for the planter's bungalow, the coolies' huts, and the tea-house; or it may be used up for charcoal. Mr. Barker approves of iron houses for the manufacture, because, though trying to the human constitution, they are good for the tea. When the heavy timber is felled and the difficulty of labour has been met, much still remains to be done in the way of hoeing the land and making a nursery of young plants. The deeper the hoe goes, the stronger and better is the plant. The seedlings are put in the first available space, and are then transplanted as fresh ground is cleared. Rain is anxiously looked for when the seedlings are planted out. In their second year the trees are pruned. In the third a small crop of leaves may be gathered. In the fourth the garden will be in full bearing, and the yield increases till the eighth or ninth year. We are not told how many flushes of leaf may be expected in the twelvemonth. But from Colonel Money's and other works we learn that a succession of heat and moisture is favourable to growth. Cold checks the flushes, and Cachar and Assam, unfavourable to the planter, are more favourable to the plant than Kumaon and Kangra. Proprietors and managers should not be in too great a hurry to make a harvest of the first shoots. The plants will yield larger returns later on if gently handled at first. Plucking is an art; the leaves should be neatly nipped off by the thumb and forefinger, and the native women are probably as efficient as the men at this particular duty. The leaves are next weighed, and are then spread on bamboo frames covered with wire-netting, to be withered. This is the critical time, when much attention must be paid to evaporation and temperature. The leaf must get rid of its moisture and retain its suppleness. Rolling follows and is now generally effected by machinery instead of by hand. Then comes fermentation, under which the leaf changes from green to yellow, and from yellow to brown. Some planters pass the leaves through a revolving sieve, of which an intelligible sketch is given, but generally they are placed over a series of primitive ovens. This operation is trying to Englishmen and natives. The thermometer rises to 110° or higher, and the Assamese stands it better than the imported Bengali. Care must be taken not to burn or smoke the leaf, for a large out-turn may be ruined by a mixture of burnt material, just as a whole vat of indigo may be spoilt by the introduction of a few bundles that have been delayed and withered in transit from the field to the factory. The last stage is the packing of the tea in boxes lined with sheet-lead. Mr. Barker maintains that the tea must be again "fired" over the ovens and shaken down, not pressed, into the chests while still hot. We should have thought that heat might generate or retain moisture, but the author ought to know his own business. To send the produce to Calcutta steamers are available on the main stream; but the distance between the garden and the river must be got over in country boats or bullock-carts. It is quite clear that to make a new tea-garden productive a good deal of capital has to be sunk without return for at least three years. Nor must planters expect the ample harvest reaped by some predecessors twenty years ago. Blight is not unusual. Each imported coolie is said to cost ninety or one hundred rupees when landed in Sibsagur or Nowgong, as the English soldier costs one hundred pounds by the time he reaches an Indian Presidency or large military station. Now and then there is a glut in the market and prices fall. Mr. Barker complains of the charges of Calcutta brokers, but he will only raise a smile by saying that there are "few business men in Calcutta in the true acceptation of the term." It is creditable to Mr. Barker that he keeps most of his censure for big Calcutta houses, or for the centipedes, the moisture, and the heat. Beyond stating that coolies must be closely watched and moderately chastised if they shirk or scamp their work, there is nothing of the slave-driver in his phrases. We think that he took some time to adapt himself to his place, and that he lacked the expedients and resources familiar to Anglo-Indian residents, whether they live in a three-storied house or a thatched bungalow. It does not seem to have occurred to him that there are such things as night-punkahs which ensure refreshing sleep. His attainments in the vernacular are slender. He thinks he is talking what he calls "Assamese" when he is really mangling Persian. And perhaps by this time he may have remembered that Pigou is usually a firm that manufactures gunpowder and not the Burmese province annexed in 1852. Necessaries vitæ as the Latin for provisions is hardly to be found in Livy or Cicero, and we should like to know where he discovered that all Assamese were good Brahmans. We apprehend he meant to say that Assamese, like other Hindus, had the prejudices of caste. It is not surprising that he was rather discomposed at hearing that pious Hindus hasten the decease of aged relatives by taking them to the bank of the sacred river when in the last stage of fever or dysentery. The nearest official or fellow-planter of three years' standing might have explained to him something of that well-known custom. It was at one time doubted whether it might not just come within the category of those evil practices which, cloaked by religious sanction like female infanticide or suttee, ought yet to be put down with a strong hand. But after some discussion it was thought better to let the "anomaly" remain. For one or two Hindus who might possibly have recovered if they had not been exposed to the damp and heat of the river, a good many pass away in contentment and peace. It was not the author's intention to discuss caste and legislation but to show how tea is made; and this he has done, though his book will hardly lead others to select Assam as an enjoyable residence.

RECENT MUSIC.

THE attention of all choral societies should be directed to the two small books of Twelve Songs and Romances, for Chorus of Women's Voices, by Herr Johannes Brahms, which are published by Messrs. Stanley Lucas & Weber. Now that the complaint has become general that it is hard to get tenors and basses to attend the afternoon practices of amateur choral societies, these charming part songs for female voices will well repay the study which they deserve. With the slightest material to his hand, the composer has with his accustomed skill produced a series of masterpieces which fully sustain the great reputation which he has already gained, and has added another success to his name. It is hard where all is so good to indicate the best, but we may say that the delicious "Minnelied," which commences the series, the quaint "Barcarolle" and "Fragen" in the first book, and "Nun stehen die Rosen in Blüthe," "Am Wildbach die Weiden," and the fugal piece "Märznacht" are amongst the most interesting; but, in saying this, we find we have named six out of the twelve songs, and we are by no means prepared to affirm that the remaining six are in any way inferior to those already named. Indeed, each in its way is a gem indicating the master hand that has wrought it.

Songs of the Pyrenees, from the same publishers, is a very interesting collection of traditional Pyrenean melodies gathered together by Mrs. S. G. C. Middlemore, who has added to them very skilful accompaniments. Of the nine melodies, all of which are strongly marked with a character of their own and unlike any other national music, there are some which for simple pathos equal anything of their kind—notably the charming little lullaby "Dodo" and the serenade "Teresita Mia," while "La Boca di Pepita," the "Bolero," and the two spinning-wheel songs, "Le Beau Vaisseau" and "Rose de Provence," are songs which deserve to be better known. The English words, which are very happily chosen, are supplied by Mr. W. P. Blake. All lovers of national music will thank Mrs. Middlemore for her care in the selection and her judicious arrangement of accompaniments.

Mr. Wilfred Bendall's cantata, "Parizadeh" (Stanley Lucas & Weber) has for its subject a tale from the Persian of the Bahári Dánish, on the well-known subject of the fairy forced to marry a mortal who has possessed himself of her feathered disguise. Upon slight material, and to words which are not always the most poetical, Mr. Bendall has produced a work which gives evidence of much musical knowledge; and is, as far as we can tell from a pianoforte score, very pleasing and effective. Of the sixteen numbers into which he has divided the cantata, the first chorus, "The sun sinks low"; "The Descent of the Doves," in which what may be called the dove motive is introduced; the baritone song, "Not with base heart," a very telling song; the trio, "Adieu, my own sweet wife"; and the duet, "O weep not, my darling," will perhaps be the favourites when they are heard at Mr. Willing's concert on the 22nd of this month; while the "Dance of the Bayaderes" and the "Wedding Chorus" will doubtless become popular. In the soprano song, "He leaves me, we are parted," Parizadeh is made to exclaim—

> O! husband think what do you,
> My soul flies out unto you.

And the composer has accentuated the second syllable of the word "unto" by supplying it with a minim, which gives the phrase even a more grotesque effect than the librettist could have desired. The cantata will be welcome to the many choral societies who want new works not too difficult of performance. The same publishers send us also "Gondoliera," a very pretty and graceful setting of Emmanuel Geibel's words, "O komm zu mir wenn durch die Nacht," by Miss Mary Carmichael, which is certainly above the average, and deserves to become a favourite; "Tommy and Barbara," by Carl Th. Kuhne, cleverly arranged for one or two voices; the "Harvest Hymn" from Claudian, due to the ever-ready pen of Sir Julius Benedict, and already so well known that it hardly requires recommendation from us; and "Inclusions," by Miss Annette Leigh Hunt, a song of considerable merit, to words by Mrs. Browning. The "Two Sketches" for pianoforte by Miss Dora E. Bright are good specimens of musician-like work, the andantino being, perhaps, the more interesting of the two; while the "Mazurka" by M. A. D. Duvivier is an effective concert piece, which, in the hands of M. Vladimir de Pachmann, to whom it is dedicated, would doubtless command success.

Messrs. J. B. Cramer & Co. have sent us seven songs by Mr. James J. Monk, of which the following are the titles:—"What Care I for the Weather?" "The Evening Rest," "Love is a Wicked Boy," "Primrose Lane," "Snowflakes," "There is a Maiden," and "Home Recollections." They are all very pleasant drawing-room songs, and show that the composer is capable of writing melodious and effective music without overtaxing the efforts of the performers. Mr. Percy G. Mocatta's two songs, "My Maiden Messenger" and "Sweetheart Mine," published by Messrs. W. Morley & Co., are, like all his work, well written and pleasantly original without any undue straining for effect, but we hardly think he should have allowed the alternative of gender in the words of the second song, for the sentiment can scarcely be said to apply to a lad and maid equally. A very pretty set of waltzes, called the "Esther Waltzes," by Mr. W. R. J. McLean, also reach us from the City Music Publishing Company.

THE SILVERADO SQUATTERS.*

IT was with a couple of sets of impressions of travel—the bright and charming Inland Voyage, and, what is to our thinking an even better book, the delightful Travels with a Donkey—that Mr. Stevenson laid the foundation of his literary reputation. Since then he has broken ground in other directions, and appealed to the world in other characters. In this new book of his he resumes his first manner, and reappears as a picturesque and sentimental traveller, or rather (lest equivocation undo us) as a picturesque and sentimental squatter. Mr. Stevenson's touch is not, it may be, so light as of old; his manner is a thought less jaunty; his matter is scarce so personal and unexpected. But all this means no more than that he is an older man now than when he launched his Arethusa on the sleepy waters of the Scheldt, an older man than when he went donkey-driving in the track of Jean Cavalier. He has not altogether ceased from being the Fastidious Brisk of morals and travel. But he is only Fastidious Brisk at odd moments, and when he has nothing else to do; and in this way he contrives to make his performance more engagingly effective than ever.

Silverado is a deserted mining camp on the shoulder of Mount St. Helena, "the Mont Blanc of one section of the Californian Coast Range." Hither, in search of health, did Mr. Stevenson convey himself and his family—his wife, his stepson, and Chuchu, his dog. He came to Mount St. Helena on squatting bent; for the neighbourhood is a place of broken ventures and ruined enterprises, and teems with vestiges of the departed miner. To Mr. Stevenson (in the character of Fastidious Brisk) "there is something enticing in the idea of going, rent free, into a ready-made house"; and it was with an eye on the possibilities of Pine Flat, one of the innumerable Palmyras of plank-houses and log-huts in those parts, that he left San Francisco and came to Calistoga. At Calistoga, however, he fell into the hands of the local usurer and general merchant, an admirable Russian Jew, whom he calls Kelmar. "That was not what he called himself," says Mr. Stevenson, his mind full of Skelt and The Miller and his Men; "but as soon as I set eyes on him I knew it was, or ought to be, his name. I am sure it will be his name among the angels." Now of Pine Flat, on the Geysers' Road, Kelmar refused to hear. He laid hands upon Mr. Stevenson, dominated him as he dominated the country-side, and murmured to him of the superior enchantments of Silverado, in Lake County; and one fine morning the intending squatter and his wife, in company with four Hebrews (three of them of the female sex), and a "cluster of ship's coffee-kettles," were transported in Kelmar's waggon, among pines and oaks and madronas, a roaring gale in their teeth, and the road a wilderness of dust and leaves and broken boughs, up the flanks of Mount St. Helena to the Toll-House Hotel, and so to Silverado. There was but one house to be had. It was some way up a canyon, "walled across by a dump of rolling stones, dangerously steep, and from twenty to thirty feet in height," and so "entirely blocked, as if by some rude guerilla fortification," that the squatter and his party "could only mount by lengths of wooden ladder fixed in the hillside." Beyond these was a space of rubble and poison-oak; and beyond this "a triangular platform, filling up the whole glen, and shut in on either hand by bold projections of the mountains." The place was a solitude of abandonment and ruin: "a line of iron rails with a bifurcation; a truck in working order; a world of lumber, old wood, old iron; a blacksmith's forge half buried in the leaves of dwarf madronas." But in front it was "opened like the proscenium of a theatre, and we looked forth into a great realm of air, and down upon tree-tops and hill-tops, and far and near on wild and varied country"; and, what was more, on one side, opposite the forge, there was "an old brown wooden house." A bay flourished in the window; a poison-oak grew through a chink in the floor; it had but three rooms, and each of these was entered from a different level; the door was smashed, and there was not a window-sash in the place; it was a pell-mell of sticks and straws and rubbish, of sand and gravel, of ancient newspapers and red dust and "home-made boot-jacks"; in one room were two triple tiers of beds; in another, nought but rubbish and the uprights for a dormitory of the same type. The mine was hard by—a confusion of windlasses and shafts and "crazy stagings"; the mountain "was here wedged up, and there poured forth its bowels in a spout of broken mineral"; up the canyon the view "was a glimpse of desolation"; everything was "rusty and down-falling." Mr. Stevenson had imagined something vastly more civilized and entertaining—"a clique of neighbourly houses on a village green, all empty, to be sure, but swept and garnished; a trout-stream brawling by; great elms or chestnuts, humming with bees, or nested in by song-birds; and the mountains standing round about, as at Jerusalem." What he found was this "world of wreck and rust, splinter and rolling gravel, where for so many years no fire had smoked." But he had come to squat; and he squatted—camping, "like Layard, amid ruins" and the vestiges of prehistoric times. And he and his abode in this quarter of solitude for some time; and of what he saw and how he felt and whom he knew, this book is the record.

The greater part of The Silverado Squatters appeared in a popular American magazine. The book, however, is an improvement on the articles; the last state is much richer and better than the first. Among the additions, which are neither few nor inconsiderable, are some of Mr. Stevenson's brightest thoughts and happiest fancies and most delicate effects of language. Such, for instance, is the chapter called "Napa Wine." Another novelty, and a pleasant one, is the chapter which tells how the author of Will o' the Mill and the Apology for Idlers was moved to become a person in a novel of Mr. Bret Harte, and actually to "jump a claim." For this and other pleasant experiences we must refer our readers to the volume itself. It is not the best of Mr. Stevenson's works; but only Mr. Stevenson would have written it.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

WE have ceased to expect any end to the literature of Shakespearian commentary, and are bound to admit that its profusion is in a degree justified by the substantial value of a considerable portion of it. Shakespeare, as was anciently said of Menander, is the synonym of life; and, though "much is taken," yet "much remains" a subject of legitimate research to the earnest student. Dr. Hense (1) proves how many coigns of vantage yet remain about the eaves and cornices of the Shakspearian temple where the essayist may yet establish "a pendent bed and a procreant cradle." It is the general character of Dr. Hense's comments to occupy such outlying corners. They are rather illustrative than critical. The first discusses a point of no vital importance to Shakspeare, but yet of considerable literary interest—the degree in which he may have been influenced by Lyly, both in his treatment of the antique and the occasionally euphuistic character of his diction. The extent of Lyly's direct influence upon Shakspeare may be considerably overrated; we cannot think that so many points of resemblance would have existed if Lyly's euphuism had not become the language of the Court, which gave Shakspeare his most appreciative admirers, and whose circles he at one time frequented. After the days of his intimacy with Pembroke and Southampton we find few vestiges of euphuism in his dramas. The second essay contains a number of interesting parallels with the Midsummer Night's Dream, explaining numerous allusions in the play, and pointing out its influence upon its imitators, especially Drayton, Tieck, and Wieland. The subject of German indebtedness to Shakspeare receives more copious illustration in the third essay, where it is shown how much even the most independent and influential of German poets owe him. Wilhelm Meister is a bourgeois Hamlet without a tragic mission; Franz Moor in Schiller's Robbers is a compound of Edmund and Richard III.; Tieck's Octavian is an adaptation of the Shakspearian romantic drama, and so on. The other essays deal with subjects less capable of demonstrative elucidation—Shakspeare's feeling for nature, his faith in her sanity and morality, his treatment of madness, his theory of fate and supreme reverence for conscience, with some minor points. The author's criticism may sometimes seem over-ingenious; but he alleges little which is not fairly deducible from Shakspeare's text, though Shakspeare may not have had it consciously present to his mind. His view is always a thoroughly healthy one, and there is nothing on which he lays such stress as Shakspeare's essential sobriety and constant growth in morality and humanity, even more than in dramatic power.

The Christmas Carols of Austria and the Tyrol (2) have well repaid the editor's pains in collecting them. They are, as a rule, exceedingly beautiful, simple, naïve, melodious, everything which popular poetry of their class ought to be. Their tenderness and their fearless yet perfectly reverent familiarity are equally touching and amusing. It is impossible not to sympathize with Herr Pailler's regret at the disappearance of these beautiful carols and of the state of feeling which gave them birth. They are mostly collected from MSS. or fly-sheets, and are preceded by a very interesting preface. The first volume is exclusively devoted to the Carols of Upper Austria.

The execution of the various volumes treating of the nationalities of Austro-Hungary has varied considerably, according to the idiosyncrasies of the respective writers. M. Vilovsky's monograph on the Austrian Serbs (3), including the inhabitants of Dalmatia, Bosnia, and the Herzegovina, is one of the best of the series. Rather dry and methodical, it is very exact and full of information; describing successively the physical geography and geology of the districts where the Serb element preponderates, very dissimilar in natural features; their history, the national character and peculiar customs and traditions of the people, and the remarkable literary movement which has given the Servian a place among cultivated European literatures. As in the case of the companion volume on Roumania, M. Vilovsky's work suffers from the necessary exclusion of the most important section of the race, and the only one in the enjoyment of political independence; nor, for obvious reasons, do we hear much of the tendencies to political union which notoriously exist, and must one day be gratified. With these inevitable drawbacks, his book is very good, and gives a satisfactory view both of the present and the future of the interesting race of which it treats. An appendix, by Geza Czirbunz, describes the Bulgarian immigrants into the Banat, the only members of that race under Austrian dominion.

Dr. Rudolf Schubert's (4) monograph on the history of ancient Lydia as an independent kingdom is a careful and judicious performance. The historians—Herodotus, Xanthus, Nicolaus Damascenus—are carefully sifted, with an evident bias towards recognizing their substantial accuracy as far as possible, and rejecting mythical interpretations. Full use is made of Xenophon, Strabo, and other casual authorities; the possible historical foundation for such romantic stories as the murder of Candaules and Cyrus's treatment of Crœsus is carefully investigated, and, on the whole, we seem to have received as trustworthy an outline of Lydian history as we are likely to possess.

The "New Pitaval" (5) has reached the eighteenth volume of the new series under the direction of Dr. Vollert. Its reports of causes célèbres scarcely appear to us to be distinguished by the same precision and acumen that rendered them so celebrated in the days of Hitzig and Häring. The selection in the present volume is nevertheless interesting, including the case of the James band of highway robbers in Missouri, of Baron Nicotera's action for defamation against the Gazzetta del Popolo, and the remarkable matricide perpetrated by Marie Köster at Bremen.

Ernst von Plener is well known in Germany as the disinterested friend of the working-man, and the advocate of that special legislation for his protection which has been matured in England while the Continent has been discussing impracticable theories. He is, therefore, a very fit man to write the life of Ferdinand Lassalle (6), being at an equal distance from those who idolize and those who disparage this remarkable personage, the Alcibiades or the Bolingbroke of modern democracy. If his concise and impartial memoir has a fault, it is that he exaggerates the permanent value of Lassalle's contributions to economical science, and his influence on an agitation which would have taken nearly the same course without him.

Kant's "Metaphysical Principia of Natural Science" (7) have been left alone by most of his commentators, and disparaged by the rest, who have even pronounced them to abound with cardinal errors of dialectic and mere beggings of the question. Herr Stadler, however, thinks something may be made of them; on his success no one but a metaphysician, doubled with a physicist, could undertake to pronounce.

The last published volume of the Manual of Theological Science, edited by Dr. Otto Zöckler (8), includes homiletics and pastoral theology. The subjects are historically as well as didactically treated, and a great amount of valuable information is conveyed.

Herr Bestmann (9), under the form of an investigation of the initial stages of Catholicism and Mohammedanism, has written an interesting monograph on the question why Christianity has in general failed to attract the Semitic races. He attributes this in great measure to the inflexibility of the Christendom of the East and its divorce from the more plastic Latin Christianity, which would have found a way to gratify the monotheistic instincts of the Semites as it conciliated Hellenic polytheism. The essay contains many interesting particulars of the influence of Christianity upon Arabia in the age immediately preceding the advent of Mohammed.

A defence of idealism against materialism, with an exposition of the ethics and metaphysics of Kant, by E. Last (10), is the work of a lady, and, if we may judge by the photographic portrait prefixed, of quite a young lady. It does the authoress much credit, being terse, elegant, perspicuous, and free from every trace of polemical acerbity.

The results of Dr. Biese's investigation of the development of a feeling for the beauties of nature among the Greeks and Romans (11) do not materially differ from those of his predecessors in this interesting inquiry; but he has brought together an unprecedented number of passages indicating continual progress in the power of recognizing the minuter features of nature, and a continual approximation to the modern idea of sympathetic communion with inanimate things. To the very last, however, description and reverie remain the background of human action; antiquity never produced a Wordsworth. Some of Dr. Biese's citations do not seem quite to the purpose, and he has omitted three Greek writers in whom he might have found pertinent illustrations—Oppian, Philostratus, and Synesius.

"Spanish Nights" (12) is one of those sentimental rhapsodies about Spanish ladies and Spanish guitars which have been nearly extinct in English literature since Thackeray depicted Major Gahagan at the headquarters of General Cabrera. The author sits out by moonlight with Spanish señoras and señoritas, flirts desperately, excites their curiosity by tales of the blonde beauties of the North, and, by the help of cloaks, sombreros, fans, and balconies, makes out something bearing much the same relation to a story as the properties of a theatre do to a tragedy.

The exploit of Sir George Sitwell and Mr. Von Buch in London has been emulated by no less illustrious imitators than the Crown Prince Rudolph and the Archduke John of Austria (13), who have captured a ghost and established his identity with the eminent medium Mr. Harry Bastian. The folding-doors of the back room from which the spirit had emerged were suddenly closed by an ingenious manœuvre of the Archduke's, and, after the full verification of his identity, Mr. Bastian withdrew hurriedly from the séance without his boots, of which he had divested himself to render his movements more thoroughly spiritualistic. The Archduke now tells the history in an entertaining pamphlet, and rashly conceives that he has dealt a mortal blow at Spiritualism. We fear he will only have contributed to accredit the hypothesis of transmutation which, as Baron Hellenbach, Bastian's patron, told a reporter, "is very generally received in the United States of America."

The most recent parts of Trewendt's "Encyclopædia of Natural Science" (14) comprise the continuations of the special dictionaries of zoology and chemistry, both of which seem fully up to the usual standard. That of chemistry embraces several articles which might have been looked for in other divisions of the series, such as those on blood, lead, and agricultural soils.

Herr Ludwig Fritze apologizes for attempting a new translation of the Pantschatantra (15), after the standard version of Benfey, on the ground that Benfey's is part of a more extensive publication, and from his having been occasionally enabled to follow a preferable text. No particular apology seems needed for so really delightful a little volume as he has given us, conveying a clear, nervous, and thoroughly readable version of a book which he correctly characterizes as one of the most ingenious and full of thought as well as one of the most celebrated in the world. The garb in which the Indian sage's lessons of practical wisdom are clothed may indeed appear fantastic, but the object of relieving the dryness of didactic morality is better attained than it would have been by any other method. The snatches of verse interspersed contribute to the same object, and Herr Fritze's renderings of them are very terse and felicitous.

The historian of German literature is compelled to spend much time over its merely archaic phases. The fifth part of Herr Hirsch's (16) history, which cannot be accused of prolixity, only comes down to the Nibelungen Lied.

English literature is interesting from the beginning, but the German historian does not feel bound to investigate it so exhaustively as that of his own country. Herr Eduard Engel's (17) sketch of it is by comparison light and entertaining; he is genuinely interested in his subject, and his critical estimates are in general very sound. The third part of his history brings him as far as Ben Jonson, whom he judges much too severely. His essay on Shakespeare, on the other hand, is full of judicious remarks.

The fourth and concluding volume (18) of Lotheissen's "History of French Literature in the Seventeenth Century" is chiefly devoted to the great dramatists Molière and Racine, and to the eminent writers of the last days of Louis XIV., La Bruyère, Fénelon, and Saint-Simon.

A. W. Schlegel's courses of lectures on æsthetics (19), delivered at Berlin from 1801 to 1804, have for a long time been preserved in the library at Dresden, and it is surprising that they should not have been edited until now. They deserve publication; for, although containing little that can be regarded as positively novel, they form a compendium of the teaching of the romantic school, and tend to illustrate the position assumed by its leaders. The first part, now published, is entirely devoted to the theory of art. A portion is consecutive and complete; another exists merely in the form of notes.

The Slavonic nations are rapidly developing a school of fiction in many respects resembling the French, but so far devoid of that deplorable tendency to repulsive naturalism which has of late infected the latter. In lightness, dexterity of touch, graphic conciseness, and power of delineating persons and things, the five chapters of Ossip Schubin's "Between Ourselves" in the Rundschau (20) are equal to most French novels, save that the dialogue is less pointed and vivacious. On the other hand, the comfortless Bohemian château and its dilapidated master are such pieces of solid conscientious painting as one expects from the English school of novel-writing. Gustav zu Putlitz and Salvatore Farina contribute other stories of fair merit; but more interesting than any fiction is Otto Brahm's biographical sketch of the intellectual effort which, although partly baffled, resulted in the production of Heinrich von Kleist's noble dramatic fragment of Robert Guiscard. H. Brugsch has condensed the information at present available respecting the Mahdi into a good popular article. Professor Jolly, in imitation of Professor Haeckel, has started on a trip to India. Bombay is the first stage of his journey, and his experiences are pleasant, if not very novel as yet.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. DE LAVELEYE'S Nouvelles lettres d'Italie (1) are of a miscellaneous but decidedly interesting character. Dating as they do from last September only, the most Cobdenish contemner of the works of Thucydides can hardly regard them as ancient history. For the lover of personal details and for that order of politician who is not able to recognize political wisdom unless it is authenticated by the name of a person whom he has been taught to regard as politically wise there are numerous conversations with Italian statesmen of mark, notably Signors Luzzatti and Minghetti. For the general reader there are comments on the country, on its people, its manners, its mode of life, &c. Indeed, M. de Laveleye does not confine himself to Italy in his anecdotage. One of his best stories is of a friend of his in England who spoke enthusiastically of American competition. The Americans would drive England out of the field of manufactures, he said. Let them; England would then return to the state of things in Tudor times, and be a happy land with no Black Countries and no superfluous population. This is a very agreeable piece of optimism, and the political economist must feel himself a coward and a curmudgeon for entertaining and suggesting doubts whether the process of "shrinkage" necessary to get a population of five-and-thirty millions into a size suitable to Tudor conditions might not be long and painful. As to Italy itself, M. de Laveleye is rather less of an optimist than, if we remember rightly, he used to be some years ago, and he seems to be passing through the phase of discouragement which all Liberals, as distinguished from Radicals, are now undergoing. "Fish," he says, in melancholy mood, "cannot be got in the places where it is caught, and is not eaten in good condition in the places where it is to be had." It is true; it is pity; and it is a pitiful truth which is symptomatic of much in the political and economical world.

The Causeries (2) of M. Garreaud on early French and Franco-Latin literature were apparently delivered at a Viennese High School for Girls where the author was professor. A bad man (or, from the most charitable point of view, a good man in a bad temper) once remarked that a strong and invincible argument against lectures to ladies was the fact that the lecturers always published them. That is, we say, ill-tempered; but it is certain that the ordinary Concio ad Puellas is not strong meat, and that M. Garreaud in particular has not produced a book of very great value. Such value as it has it derives from the fact that it is less specialized than some more exact books on the same or kindred subjects. By separating French literature proper from the Franco-Latin literature which preceded it, and from such subsequent developments as Scholastic Philosophy, which continued to use Latin as a medium, precision and close connexion of subject are obtained at the cost of the loss of many valuable side-lights and of perhaps still more valuable vues d'ensemble on the thought and spirit which lie behind literature. M. Garreaud has aimed at avoiding this loss, and has to some extent succeeded in avoiding it. But, on the other hand, his book is far too much of a compilation and, what is worse, of a compilation from authorities who are by no means always well selected. He frankly owns that his first volume is very nearly abstracted from Ampère. Now Ampère is a very fair authority, but he is neither abstruse nor inaccessible in himself. On the other hand, Henri Martin and Michelet, who are constantly quoted in the second volume, are for the particular subject (literary history) hardly authorities at all. Moreover, constant quotation of and reference to a mere manual like that of M. Demogeot (excellent manual though it is) is certainly not the thing. If M. Garreaud has read his originals, he need not quote M. Demogeot; if he has not, he should not have written the book.

M. Fasnacht is a very well known authority in the theory and practice of French teaching, and there is no need to do much more than mention the second part of his Progressive French Course (3). To our own thinking, however, there is over-much detail in it. The best way to teach a language seems to us to be to make the pupil learn absolutely and by heart a grammar rigidly kept down in point of minutiæ, and then to set him to abundant and careful reading of original authors. However, this is doubtless a matter of opinion.

We have not here to gauge the theatrical merits of M. Aicard's Smilis (4), which indeed have been pretty well settled in general Parisian estimation some time ago. As a play to read, not a few of its speeches strike us as too long (a specially bad fault in a prose drama), and the dialogue too often falls into stilted and stereotyped phrase. M. Carcassonne's Nouvelles pièces à dire (5) contain a choice to suit various tastes. The serious pieces seem to us a little too much inclined to be "emphatic" in the French rather than the English sense; while the comic pieces aim, not always successfully, at the arch. But archness and emphasis probably please the amateurs of the monologue. In Ad memoriam (6) there is a fair command of verse, especially of that most stately of French measures, the Alexandrine quatrain, with alternate rhymes. But the phrase is a little commonplace; and it is surely rash of any one to go so closely in the steps of the Comédie de la mort as M. Chantavoine has done in at least one passage of his Rêverie.

A short, but interesting, preface by M. Jules Claretie introduces some of the tales of the late Paul Parfait (7), a journalist who died young, but left some work of merit in this kind.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

EVERY physician who has attained to distinction in his profession is entitled to think that his autobiography will be interesting (1). No class of men see more of life; and, without the least breach of their rigid professional code of honour, they can tell a great deal that is worth knowing. They are, or at least ought to be, the best witnesses to the facts of contemporary social life. Therefore the recording angel will not register the writing of these Memoirs of Life and Work in the doubtless brief list of Dr. Williams's moral delinquencies. Nevertheless, it is as disappointing a book as need be. The author has plenty to write, but unhappily he has no notion of how to set about it. His family circumstances, the dates of his entrances and exits from the schools of medicine at Edinburgh or Paris, are given in the jejune style of a biographical dictionary. The heavy octavo is padded out by the help of long scientific essays, often reprints, précis of articles contributed to encyclopædias, and records of the author's spiritual experiences narrated in the unctuous style dear to the religious world.

Dr. Browne's History of Roman Classical Literature (2) is in every sense of the word a very solid piece of work. It is one of those heavy octavos, bound in thick boards bevelled at the edges, which it is a penance for any child of this flaccid century to hold in his hands. As to its literary qualities, they also are solid in a good old-fashioned style. The facts have been carefully compiled and are stated with a brevity for which the student, if he is at all capable of gratitude, will thank Dr. Browne. The criticism, though doubtless orthodox, smacks at times of a manner now a little antiquated. There is something quaint about the author's solemnity when he says that in the Hecyra Terence has "endeavoured to rescue the relation of mother-in-law from the prejudice which too often deservedly attaches to it."

It is always pleasant to come across a book of travels (3) which is not wholly devoted to small jokes, vermin, and the author's dinner. We cannot say that Mr. Crawford has wholly neglected these stock subjects, but he does at least contrive to keep them in a properly subordinate place. Probably he was helped to follow the path of virtue by the fact that he had a most interesting subject. Mr. Crawford was commissioned to survey the proposed route of the railway across the Pampas and the Andes. He completed his task at no small risk, and in spite of many vexations; for the Argentine official seems as fond of putting everything off till to-morrow as the Spaniards of Old Spain. In the discharge of his labours he had some good sport, and saw much of the Pampa Indians, and the Argentine and Chilian troops of the frontiers. The book is well illustrated. One plate in particular is admirable. It shows the author being coursed by two wild bulls.

Here are two gentlemen who believe they know, and are prepared to demonstrate, "was die Welt im Innersten zusammenhält." The first is Mr. Edmund Lawrence (4), a somewhat patronizing imitator of Mr. Herbert Spencer. Like his master, he is sure "that human society is in its structure organic, and not mechanical." He is also persuaded that this proposition is quite new; and, after the manner of the school, he proceeds to prove it by pouring out scraps of information about things in general. The precision of his historical knowledge may be estimated by the assertion that the Empire of Charlemagne was a revolt against the political supremacy of the clergy. His accuracy in the use of adjectives appears in the statement that Jeroboam "borrowed from the Guelphic armoury" some weapon or other. Guelph and Ghibelline haunt Mr. Lawrence from title-page to colophon. Our second philosopher (5) is an American apparently of tender years. The "Disciple of Buckle" (the race still flourishes in the kindred literary atmospheres of Russia and the United States) has been inspired by the great Dr. Draper, who has stood on the "pinnacle of European Culture and Civilization," and seen floods of proper names flowing in every direction. He shows how Dr. Draper in some world of spirits took the poor benighted European Lessing in hand, and instructed him about Confucius, Brahmanism, and what not, out of Dr. Rhys Davids, magazine articles, and such recondite sources of learning. There is a deal of fustian about the dull politics, and a great parade of gabbling second-hand scholarship in the book.

Mr. Pope (6) writes as the spokesman of traders or agriculturists who have to send goods for short distances, and who think that they are overcharged by the Railway Companies as an offset to the favourable terms offered to more distant customers. To a mere outsider it looks as if the system must cut both ways, but there are doubtless individual cases of hardship. Mr. Pope is likely to prove an indifferent advocate of this cause at least, for in his indignation he grows incoherent in argument and style, besides wandering from his brief in pursuit of all sorts of fallacies.

A translation of Dr. Ebstein's Corpulence, and its Treatment (7) will be welcome to stout people who want to grow thin by some more pleasant process than "banting."

We can recommend Dr. Wise's Handbook for Wiesen (8) as full of practical details, and bristling with statistics, for the accuracy of which we must leave Dr. Wise responsible.

It is enough to mention the fact that Messrs. Griffith & Farran publish, under the title of You Should (9), yet another of their useless or superfluous little books of manners. The firm had a happier idea when it decided to issue a selection from Lord Chesterfield's Letters on the subject of Manners and Speech (10). He was entitled to talk about it; and, little as we like snippets, we think this book deserves encouragement as compared to its companions.

In oblong form and on livid blue paper Messrs. Field & Tuer publish two more or less funny little books. The first, Journalistic Jumbles, by Mr. F. C. Williams (11), contains some really laughable examples of the misprints and other absurdities to be found in newspapers. The second, Decently and In Order (12), shows young clergymen how not to blunder over the Church Service.

We have to notice a pretty Beaconsfield Birthday Book (13), and a very amusing and handsome volume (14) of the same kind, the materials of which have been taken from Mr. Lewis Carroll's Aliciad.

Our reprints include Mr. Verteuil's Trinidad (15), Sir H. Thompson's Food and Feeding (16), a third edition; and a fourth edition—"revised, and partly re-written"—of Mr. Streeter's Precious Stones and Gems (17).

The Desk Hong List for 1884 (18) has been published.

Mr. Forbes is always at his best when he has to compress a narrative of fact into a limited space, and has no room for fine writing. It is under these conditions that he has written his "Succinct Record" of the Life of General Gordon (19). The book makes no pretence to originality, or to be anything but a compilation from the works of Mr. Wilson, Mr. Hake, and Dr. Birkbeck Hill. Mr. Forbes has sifted his authorities well, and sketches the history of the General's campaigns with the lucidity to be expected in a writer who understands war. He continues the story down to General Gordon's arrival at Khartoum. We are glad to see that Mr. Forbes does not think himself bound to renounce the right of criticizing his heroical times.

EGYPT.

MR. GLADSTONE'S promised and much-talked-of statement of Thursday having turned out to be no statement at all, the present comfort of Englishmen in reference to matters Egyptian is pretty nearly reduced to that of an old proverb, if not of an old song. With the PRIME MINISTER defining as a position of "no danger, military or "other," a position which the UNDER-SECRETARY for FOREIGN AFFAIRS had ten minutes before defined as a position of "very great peril," it is impossible to look to official persons for any trustworthy or intelligible statement of facts. With Mr. GLADSTONE giving accounts of the intentions of the Government in the style of Captain JOHN BUNSBY, and, on being invited to explain these explanations, excusing himself in the style of Mr. SILAS WEGG, it is impossible to look to official persons for any trustworthy or intelligible statement of opinion. What Mr. GLADSTONE actually did say has already been interpreted in diametrically opposite senses by his commentators; and perhaps the wisest commentator is he who recognizes and accepts the fact that Mr. GLADSTONE really said nothing in any way binding or definite. Therefore it is necessary to fall back on the proverb. When things are at the worst they are supposed to mend—a supposition which is a compliment to the good nature, if not to the equity, of Providence. That things are as nearly as possible at the worst with Egypt is past denying. The very newspapers, which in their leading articles tell us that everything is at the best and for the best in Khartoum and Berber, print, with laudable impartiality, on the same page, and with the same advantages of type and "lead," statements from their authorised Correspondents in Egypt that "the situation is "truly desperate." After this, argument, which has long been useless, becomes absurd. No Government, unless it were put to the utmost straits, could consent to use or to countenance the lamentable subterfuges and prevarications which have characterised the answers of Mr. GLADSTONE in the House of Commons during the present week; and no Government, whatever its nominal majority in the House, can long bear up against the damning consensus of testimony, Conservative and Liberal, English and foreign, on the spot and away from it, which the Government of Mr. GLADSTONE has massed against itself in this matter of its monstrous Egyptian regiment. The summoning of Sir EVELYN BARING home is of itself a confession of failure; and no possible facing it out in the Houses of Parliament can void that confession. Indeed, the process of facing, as has been noted of the elders in similar cases, simply makes things worse. When a Prime Minister of England is driven to draw a distinction between being "hemmed in" and being "surrounded," and when defenders of Ministerial policy in the House of Lords have to plead that it is too late to take measures which they have been pressed to take for months, the game is over. It is not over, no doubt, for the unfortunate persons who have trusted to the rotten reed of Ministerial pledges, or for the interests of England, which are suffering, and must suffer, from the blind obstinacy and the selfish folly of a crew of party politicians. But it is over as regards argument between intelligent persons as to the state of the facts. The rei are practically confitentes; it only remains to see whether they can be prevented from escaping the punishment of their guilt.

As to the actual situation, the description of the Cairo Correspondent quoted above may be accepted without any hesitation. It is "truly desperate." One of the best men in the service of the Egyptian Government, HUSSEIN PASHA, is evidently wavering in consequence of the obstinate refusal of the Cairo authorities (that is to say, of the English Government) to listen to his appeals for succour. Agents of rebellion are at Berber, at Korosko, probably at Assouan. The reported Shendy massacre (which to Mr. GLADSTONE seems to be a matter of such small importance that when asked about the condition of Shendy he says nothing of it because his interrogator did not specially mention it) shows the complete command which the insurgents have of the river. At Khartoum General GORDON is divided between thoughts of sending his companions, if possible, across the Equator, and thoughts of enlisting Turkish or English mercenaries or volunteers to do the work which the craven Government of England will not, and the helpless Government of Egypt may not, afford him means to do. The reckless waste of blood in a corner of the Eastern Soudan has produced as little effect as if it had been literally and formally poured into the sand. It is said (and it is also contradicted) that as first-fruits and a somewhat cheerful first-fruits of Sir EVELYN BARING'S absence, his locum tenens Mr. EGERTON, NUBAR PASHA, and Sir EVELYN WOOD, have resolved on an expedition to Berber. It will probably come too late, and it will probably be useless if it does not include English troops, but it is at least the resolution of men. There is absolutely no reason why it should not have been taken, and carried out with efficient troops, not merely a month ago, when it would have enforced and improved General GRAHAM'S costly and now totally useless victories, not merely two or three months ago, when it would have saved Sinkat and Tokar as well as Berber and Khartoum, and would have made the Souakim expedition unnecessary, but five months ago, when it would have saved all the Soudan that was worth saving and have prevented massacre and disgrace without end. Or rather, to speak more precisely, there was one reason, the reason which in a dozen different ways brings mischief on England, and that reason lies in the obstinacy, the selfwill, the refusal to recognize facts and to discard his own crotchets, which are more and more becoming the chief intellectual and moral characteristics of Mr. GLADSTONE.

But Mr. GLADSTONE, it is said, and he says himself, has come to an important resolution about Egypt. No one out of the Cabinet knows exactly what that resolution is, and it is only known as a quasi-certainty that the time-dishonoured instrument of a Conference is to be resorted to for settling that limited portion of the present distress of Egypt, which depends upon purely financial difficulties. From this Conference no good is to be expected; and, save by accident, none can possibly result. Held in face of the recent declarations of the Government as to their Egyptian policy or no-policy, it can only encourage those Powers which have designs on Egypt to put forward claims consonant to those designs, and those Powers which have no designs on Egypt to extort more or less damnifying conditions as a price of abstaining from countenancing the designs of others. No country can come before a European Conference on Egyptian affairs in a more pitiful plight than England comes in at this moment. She has had for very nearly two years the undisputed control of Egyptian affairs. There have been unofficial grumbles against that control; but grumblers and silent folk alike have abstained from the very smallest overt act calculated to tie English hands. We have not annexed Egypt that we have in more than one sense not protected it; but we have done acts than which no annexing Power could possibly have done more decisive acts as far as sovereignty goes, and which no ordinary protecting Power would think of doing at all. We have occupied the country; we have turned its domestic administration topsy-turvy; we have issued orders as to its foreign policy and its management of its dependencies; we have motioned Prime Ministers into office and out of office; we have sent military expeditions to this part of its territory, and extraordinary Governors-General to that; and Europe, if it has not exactly adopted the full Homeric formula of "praising us and bidding us go "on" (it would have been a very odd Europe if it had done the former), has refrained most scrupulously from interfering with us. Suddenly we throw ourselves on Europe to help us out of the financial difficulty which is partly of our own direct creation, and which in the lapse of time since our virtual control began, the men of business of the first country of business in the world, with the wealth and credit of the richest country in the world at their backs, ought to have been able easily to stave off, if not to cure. Why should we expect Europe to show us indulgence after this confession of flagrant incapacity? How can we expect that part at least of Europe will not make the most of the occasion so rashly given? France, it is certain, had no rights in Egypt other than vaguely prescriptive, and, it is demonstrable, has forfeited and terminated the prescription by her refusal to share in the suppression of ARABI's revolt. We have her resignation; it is recorded and recognized, if not in form, yet in fact, by every Chancellerie in Europe. Yet, partly in lightness of heart, partly from the sheer blundering of our rulers, we offer her an opportunity of re-entry, a chance of getting the resignation cancelled, a certainty of being able to make some kind of stipulation where at present she is estopped by her own act from any claim. But, it is said, the Conference is to be strictly confined to financial matters and the law of liquidation. Chansons que tout cela! If England had appeared before Europe with a clean balance-sheet for Egypt, and a "state" of the country showing that it was well administered, free from domestic trouble and foreign enemies, on the way, at least, to steady and self-acting government, she might, no doubt, have dealt with Europe as one having the cards in her own hands. She could have said, "Take my terms, or I shall convert "and redeem the debt as I please, and you may make the "most of losing a good milch cow." But at present England is simply begging Europe to come and help her out of the result of her own bad management, to take part of his money responsibilities off a steward so incapable that the estate under his care has become wholly bankrupt and half-ruined in his hands. That is the attitude into which celebrated men of business like Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. CHILDERS, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, experienced diplomatists like Lord GRANVILLE and Sir CHARLES DILKE, men of weight and sense and practice in affairs like Lord HARTINGTON and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, have brought England in the spring of this year of grace 1884, two years after fortune had thrown into England's lap the greatest windfall ever known since CLIVE shook the pagoda tree into a lap more grateful and more capable nearly a hundred and fifty years ago.

THE LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.

THE LORD MAYOR can scarcely hope to defeat the Government on the second reading of the London Government Bill; but he is perfectly right in taking the first opportunity of challenging the principle of the measure. The Committee appointed by the Corporation confined its Report to a sweeping and all but unanimous condemnation of the Bill. Although many of its special provisions are in a high degree objectionable, the strongest reasons for rejecting it lie on the surface. The scheme is politically dangerous, and it has no tendency to promote municipal efficiency. Since the details of the Bill have been published it has obtained no additional support, nor has Sir W. HARCOURT's skilful and pleasant speech conciliated opposition. Mr. FIRTH is perhaps not well advised in continuing a chuckle over his success in obtaining the support of the Government to the doctrines shared by himself with Mr. BEAL. The silence of all the other metropolitan members, with the exception of his colleague who is a Cabinet Minister, ought to suggest a doubt whether the municipal revolution is popular. No public body, and, it might almost be said, no person interested in local administration, has up to the present time expressed approval of the change. Mr. LLOYD, who describes himself as Honorary Secretary of the Municipal Reform League, represents a wholly political organization, having himself first taken part in the movement as secretary to a number of Radical Clubs or parochial Caucuses. According to his own account, one meeting in support of Mr. FIRTH and Mr. BEAL was attended by 5,000 inhabitants of London. It would be strange if a much larger number of Radicals could not be found to denounce any established institution. It is not stated whether any Vestrymen were found to join in the agitation, or even any considerable ratepayer. It is highly improbable that any member of the Metropolitan Board of Works was present; and only one Common Councilman shares the opinions of which Mr. LLOYD professes to be the official exponent.

No equally extravagant project of administrative centralization has been hitherto proposed. It is true that the term is ambiguous, as it may be applied to the combination of larger or smaller units; but municipal and parochial functions are ordinarily entrusted to communities less vast than great provinces or petty kingdoms. The Common Council is to have exclusive authority over four or five millions of inhabitants of the metropolis. The district Councils are expressly excluded from all independent share in municipal administration. The Common Council has absolute discretion to apportion the duties and rights of the subordinate bodies; and it might, if it thought fit, reduce their employment to a sinecure. No such extreme consequence of the Bill is likely to occur in practice; but the central Government of the Metropolis may probably engross all powers which could induce moderately ambitious candidates to offer themselves for seats in the District Councils. Probably the Common Council itself, finding the due performance of its functions impracticable, may devolve the management of municipal affairs on its paid officers; and indeed such an arrangement would perhaps be the least mischievous result of the Bill. The comparative success of the great provincial Corporations may be largely attributed to the ability of their town clerks, their surveyors, and their other permanent officers. It would be far more difficult to provide a competent staff to govern the metropolis in the name of the Common Council; but clever solicitors and engineers would be in all respects preferable to active demagogues. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT contended that the municipal government of London would not be more complicated than the administration of the London and North-Western Railway. The Directors and their officers have to organize and govern a few thousand railway servants, and to provide engineers and workmen, who, according to a fixed routine, keep the lines and the rolling-stock in a proper condition. The Directors themselves, though they are supposed to be chosen by the shareholders, are really self-elected, and, as a rule, they hold office for life. All their officers, without exception, hold permanent appointments, subject to the condition of good behaviour. The analogy with a Council chosen by household suffrage in every third year is remote and imperfect.

The letter of Mr. OAKEY HALL, formerly Mayor of New York, on unwieldy municipalities, fully deserves the attention which it has received. He records the failure of an attempt to amalgamate the City of New York with the great adjacent town of Brooklyn, and he states that in Boston and its neighbourhood several independent municipalities conduct the local administration to the public advantage and satisfaction. Mr. HALL, having been connected for five-and-twenty years with the municipal affairs of New York, would have no difficulty in furnishing ample illustration of the justice of his opinion. At this moment Brooklyn is engaged in a large measure of municipal reform which could scarcely have been attempted if the city had been united with New York. The object of the movement and the evils which it is intended to correct are not uninstructive. The exercise of patronage by the Aldermen has been so inefficient or corrupt, that the reformers now propose to give the Mayor the absolute disposal of all paid municipal offices. The City of New York itself is the centre of corruption and of all kinds of maladministration. Mr. OAKEY HALL well remembers the gigantic frauds of TWEED and his gang, and he has known judges exercising criminal jurisdiction who were the patrons, if not the accomplices, of thieves. The rates in New York are probably three or four times as large as in London; and the public convenience and safety are scandalously neglected.

When the London Government Bill has passed the second reading, the boast of its supporters that it is moderately and judiciously framed will be tested by close examination. An instructive example of the reckless policy of present and future change which finds favour with the Government may be found in the Forty-ninth Clause of the Bill. Almost unlimited powers are given to the Common Council in conjunction with the Local Government Board of altering in vital points the municipal constitution which is to be in the first instance established. The numbers of the governing body and the area of the Municipality are but provisionally fixed by Sir W. HARCOURT'S elaborate and ambitious measure. The Common Council is empowered by the Forty-ninth clause to frame a scheme for all or any of the purposes enumerated in the clause. The scheme, when framed, is to be submitted to the Local Government Board, which, after complying with certain forms, may approve the scheme, which is ultimately to be sanctioned by an Order in Council. "The scheme shall thereupon have "full effect, as if it were enacted by Parliament." In other words, Parliament is to be ousted of its legislative power over the most important parts of the organization which it is invited to create. Among the purposes for which the Common Council and one or two Government departments are to legislate at their joint discretion are the union and alteration of municipal districts and wards, and the alteration of the number of Common Councillors and District Councillors. If, therefore, the operation of the Act is not satisfactory to a Radical majority in the Council, acting in concert with Sir CHARLES DILKE or a successor of the same opinions, districts may be readjusted at their pleasure, so as to secure the necessary majorities in all the municipal districts, if only the Minister is not opposed by his colleagues in the Privy Council. The Americans, who invented the theory, the practice, and the name of "gerrymandering," have not yet ventured to give it legislative sanction.

Not only are special facilities offered for internal jobbery in the interest of political parties, but the framers of the Bill have with unparalleled audacity provided for the exclusion of contumacious bodies of citizens, and for the addition to the municipal area of outlying districts which may be recommended either by their taxable value or perhaps by their political conformity. A scheme may be framed, subject to the same nominal and illusory conditions, "for "including in London any neighbouring parish, sanitary "district, &c., and for excluding from London any parish "or detached part of a parish or place." The victims of metropolitan faction or cupidity may, if they think it worth while, petition the Privy Council against the scheme; but the Common Council and the Local Government Board will have no fear of being overruled. If Mr. FIRTH and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had been charged with the municipal organization of other great cities at home and abroad, they would, if they were consistent, have combined all adjacent towns, or have allowed the large and central communities to admit or exclude neighbouring districts at pleasure. Manchester and Salford, Newcastle and Gateshead, Liverpool and Birkenhead; and in America New York and Brooklyn, Boston and the suburban towns, would have been deprived of their present independence in pursuance of a fantastic love of local centralization. The Corporation, the Board of Works, the Vestries, and the better class of ratepayers may possibly protest in vain against a wanton revolution; yet even the most compact of Ministerial majorities may perhaps resent the proposed devolution of the legislative powers of Parliament.

TWO DISASTERS.

If we are to believe the irrepressible scientific persons who write letters to the papers, we have to thank the Island of Java for another benefaction. It lately sent a series of sunsets—or so the scientific persons said—which were made an excuse for inflicting insufferable boredom on a great many innocent people. They were, it seems, all because of the big earthquake of last year. Now that tiresome Dutch possession has sent us an earthquake into the bargain. Whether the earth quaked on Tuesday morning because it had done the same on the other side of the world some months ago, or only because the soul of England foresaw the defeat which was to befall a Heaven-sent Minister in the afternoon at the hands of the children of darkness, it is absolutely certain that there was an earthquake. Various persons, many of whom seem to have been in bed at half-past nine, have written to the papers to describe their sensations; and the traces of the commotion are visible in Essex. Happily it was on a small scale. No considerable loss of life followed, and it does not appear that any building in a sound state has suffered. An ancient church at Langenhoe has been reduced to a state which leaves it at the mercy of the restorer; and the stone steeple of a Congregational church at Colchester has been brought down, which may perhaps be accepted as a proof that this steeple, which was once before nearly brought down by lightning, is singularly unfortunate. The worst consequence of the disaster has been the loss inflicted on a number of poor people, who have become very proper objects of charitable assistance, which we may reasonably hope will not be withheld. Slight shocks of earthquake are by no means uncommon in England. People whose years are still comparatively green can remember three or four of them, and they have all been so gentle that they have produced no effect beyond a little mild excitement and a trifle of damage to the handiwork of the jerry builder. This last has been more severe; but, compared to the awful convulsions which have ruined towns in Italy and desolated whole districts round Sunda Strait, it is in all seriousness barely worth mentioning.

Whether they happen on a great scale or on a small, earthquakes are things which are beyond our control. There is nothing for it but to bear them with as much courage and as little talk as possible, and set to work to make good the damage they do. The other misfortune of the week is a far more profitable subject of speculation. In the first place, it cost the lives of three people under circumstances of great horror, and that is a much more terrible thing than the upsetting of iron steeples and brick chimney-stacks, or even of Norman church towers. In the second place, it could have been prevented; and, if people are wise enough to learn the proper lessons from it, they may diminish the risks of such things in the future. The disaster in the "Old Bell" Tavern tells, unhappily, no new story. The people in the house seem, as far as can be known, to have done all they could to make a fire certain at some time. It is supposed, with great probability, that the housekeeper laid the fire for next morning over a hearth covered with glowing ashes and in a grate hot enough to reduce the materials to the state of tinder. Then, with the kitchen and the house at large full of inflammable matter, the household went to bed over the trap they had laid for themselves. As every Report of the Fire Brigade shows, this very action is the cause of several conflagrations every year in London; and it might seem that a tavern-keeper, who knows that his house is full of spirits, would have the common prudence to see that it was not committed on his premises. But no advice or example will teach some people prudence. When the fire had once broken out, the master of the house did his best to save his servants. He warned them, and it was not his fault if they delayed to take his warning. The three women, who knew that they stood over a furnace, waited to dress; and before they were ready the fire had covered the lower part of the house. It does not appear that anything which could be done to save them in the circumstances was neglected. A good deal has been said about a ladder chained to a wall in the neighbourhood of the window at which they stood. It is supposed that this ladder might have been of some use, but as it was only fourteen feet long, and as the window-sill was twenty feet above the nearest rest, it might as well have been non-existent. Moreover, the window was right over the built-out kitchen where the fire began, and the flames made any approach to that side impossible. When a thing of this sort happens, which is five or six times a year, it is always said that it shows the necessity of providing houses with better means of escape for the inhabitants. Nobody will deny that a house cannot be too well or too sensibly built, but when the circumstances come to be inquired into, it is uniformly found that the fault lies with the folly of the people, and not with the structural defects of the house. Houses after all are meant to live in, and not to run out of. Besides, London already contains several hundreds of thousands of houses which could never, or would never, be fitted with special means of escape from fire, and what is wanted is something which will serve the dwellers in them. What that is it requires no ghost to tell. It is that they should realize the truth of the old adage that fire is a good servant, but a bad master. In the long run nothing will avail any human being but his or her own prudence and common sense. It is perfectly possible to feel the sincerest pity for the sufferers by the disaster at the "Old Bell" Tavern, and yet to see that they in all probability are to blame for their own misfortune. There is more profit in realizing the whole meaning of that than in throwing the blame on the ladders and the fire-escape and the staircase.

THE AMENDMENTS TO THE FRANCHISE BILL.

THOSE who are fond of somewhat abstract political speculations may be excused at the present moment for wondering whether it is wise of a Government to scheme for a great Parliamentary victory just before Parliament rises for the holidays. It is certain that the majority on the second reading of the Franchise Bill, which, according to Government advocates, was to crush all resistance and transform the Conservatives into a dispirited and paralysed mob, does not appear to have had any effect of the kind. At the only election since the Ministry have not indeed lost a seat, but have failed to gain one by an increased majority, in a borough notorious for see-sawing between parties. A heavy defeat has been inflicted on them in the House of Commons itself. During the extra-Parliamentary speechifying of the holidays the solitary song of triumph which the HOME SECRETARY tried to uplift at Derby fell somehow flatly on the ear, and the enemy raised a loud and cheerful counter-note in many different places. In fact, nobody in the political world seems one penny the worse or better for that tremendous majority; just as no one was converted to a worse or better opinion of the Government policy in Egypt by Mr. GLADSTONE'S furious onslaught shortly before the rising of the House. Perhaps that rising itself may have had something to do with this result, and the old caution about striking while the iron is hot may apply. Or perhaps (and a strictly impartial politician must give his readers or hearers the opportunity of an unbiassed choice) the great majority of the other day has failed of significance precisely because it was, and was known to be, insignificant; because a majority of the House of Commons in its be-Caucussed and be-Gladstoned condition has ceased, to the knowledge of the nation, to represent anything like the actual national will; and because the profound indifference to the subject which, rightly or wrongly, characterizes the mass of Englishmen extends to all manifestations of party discipline in reference to that subject. If this latter is the case, it would assuredly not be an occasion for unmixed rejoicing. It might, indeed, offer a better chance of getting rid of a mischievous and dishonest Bill, but it would show that the nation has an estimate of its present representatives which may or may not be in itself a true one, but which certainly does not indicate that all things are as they should be either in Parliament or in people.

The amendments already proposed are wanting neither in number nor in importance, though the device by which the Government has limited the Bill to unusually few and simple clauses necessarily restricts them in the first respect. As a matter of fact, however, every student of matters Parliamentary knows that the apparently interminable lists of proposals to leave out from the word "that" to the word "this," and to insert between the word "this" and the word "that," are more or less delusive. In practice many are quietly dropped, some are ruled out of order, others follow, undebated and unvoted upon, in the track of those already discussed and decided. In the case of the Franchise Bill there is no fear of there not being plenty of matter for discussion in Committee, on Report, and on the third reading, so as to give opportunity for those repeated divisions on which Mr. FAWCETT laid so much stress in his speech of Wednesday. For a prudent and practised man as Mr. FAWCETT is, that speech was perhaps a not wholly wise one. Mr. FAWCETT enlarges on the importance of increased majorities in presenting to the House of Lords a Bill which the House of Lords does not like, and is quite certain that if that House rejects a Bill so presented, the majorities will increase still further. It is not very easy to see the ground of Mr. FAWCETT'S confidence, and it is easy to see that by his argument and by his illustration of it taken from the Compensation for Disturbance Bill he has put, in a not improbable case, a weapon of strength and sharpness into his adversaries' hands. For there is no doubt that the Government will have to do all they know to maintain the majority of which they are so proud, and it is impossible to see how, unless some strange paralysis comes upon the Opposition, they are to increase it. The Conservative minority on that occasion included but a single Liberal vote, and the Government majority, besides the untrustworthy contingent of the Irish Nationalists, included many Liberals whose allegiance must have been pretty severely strained as it was, and who will be put to a still stronger test by such amendments as Mr. ALBERT GREY'S and by proposals for proportional representation. These latter proposals in their turn will estrange the Irish members if accepted. And it might very possibly happen that, if Mr. GLADSTONE adopted the course which his unwise advisers urged on him, and tried to drive the Bill through the Upper House by the machinery of an Autumn Session, the majority, instead of "reaching a hundred and fifty," might shrink to a hundred or to less—a result which, on Mr. FAWCETT'S own showing, would be nothing less than disastrous to the Ministry and their party.

Whatever amendments the Opposition and the Moderate Liberals may finally elect to fight seriously must turn directly or indirectly on three points—that is to say, on the delaying of the effect of the measure till redistribution is planned or till a fresh Parliament has been elected, on the exclusion of Ireland, and on the adoption of some of the proportional representation devices. Of the last-named it is not necessary to speak again at present. With regard to the other two, they are not so much independent as complementary. No Reform Bill which throws the franchise open to the lowest of the Irish people can be satisfactory, and no Reform Bill can be satisfactory which maintains the present unduly large representation of Ireland. The difficulty then presents itself that the present Bill is specially framed to do both these things. It can only be made tolerable, therefore, by practically turning it inside out, and converting it from a pure Enfranchisement Bill into a nearly pure Redistribution Bill, or else by suspending its operation till a period when possibly better influences may preside over the destinies of the country. No Government which had faced the question of reform from the point of view of national as distinguished from party interests could have had any difficulty in framing a measure as acceptable as any measure disturbing an existing state of things can be. The points which the framers of such a measure would have had before them are obvious enough. They are the positive reduction of the representation of Ireland, the maintenance of the present, if not a higher, electoral qualification, and the redistribution of the proportion of members left so as to give more weight to the numbers, intelligence, loyalty, and property of the North. As regards Scotland, they are the raising to a small extent of the total representation, and the allotment of more members to the large towns and populous counties. As regards Wales, the reduction of the representation by free grouping of counties and by the transference of some borough seats. As regards England, the grouping of many small boroughs, the disfranchisement of a few, the formation of numerous constituencies on the plan of East Retford and the Rape of Bramber, and the enfranchisement of some large towns. A measure directed to these points would have been a measure consistent with precedent, suited to the wants (if there are any wants) of the country, capable of being in similar fashion remodelled at any future time—in short, a measure of practical politics, which might be opposed by those who do not see the necessity of any reform at all, but which could not be treated as a reckless bid for the restoration of waning popularity by flooding the constituencies with ignorant voters, and facilitating redistribution in the interests of one party merely. But no ingenuity of amendment short of complete transformation can make the one Bill into the other. The postponement of the effect of the measure, however, and the exclusion of Ireland, would have the same practical effect, because they would necessitate the discussion of the whole matter again in connexion with the Redistribution Bill and the Irish Reform Bill, which would have to be separately carried in the next Parliament. Even the mischievous extension of household franchise to the country districts might be to a great extent parried by judicious arrangement of those districts after the fashion above referred to. The most convenient points to fight, however, will probably present themselves more clearly as the fight itself goes on. As the measure stands, it is, as regards Ireland, madness and as regards England a party trick; and it is difficult to imagine any alteration in it, except extension on its own lines, which would not be in fact, as well as in form, an amendment.

SHOT, OF COURSE.

THERE is little use in protesting against popular practices, but sometimes it is difficult to resist the empty pleasure of a grumble. The popular practice which at present vexes some minds comes from the natural instinct of the natural man to destroy all that makes life worth living. That is all. Among the things which sensibly add to the pleasure of life are the enjoyments derived from nature. Nothing can, unluckily, be more maddening, to the ordinary civilized Englishman, than the pleasures of nature. Solitude, unspoiled loneliness, trees and plants growing in their untutored way, birds and beasts living their own lives in their own fastnesses, all these are abomination. Thus we read in the papers that the country near Burnham Beeches is being polished into a civic ideal. Drives are cut, posts are erected, staring white placards marked "Lord Mayor's Drive," and so forth, direct 'ARRY where he should go. The place, it appears, is being converted into a semblance of Battersea Park. This reform may shock the "remnant" dear to Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD, but is sure to meet the wishes of the public. The change is made precisely in the spirit of the fellows who lately trapped and killed an otter on the Thames. To see a real live otter on the Thames would have been a pleasant excitement for oarsmen of sense and taste. They would have felt that, after all, England near London was less thoroughly denaturalized than they had supposed. They would have been happily reminded of days when wild on Thames the worthy beaver swam, and of all the sylvan past of over-cultivated England. But the local sportsmen soon "arrested that agency," as Mrs. HOMINY says. "None of that ere maudlin "sentiment," said they, and trapped the otter, and knocked him on the head. Doubtless they felt as happy as the Queensland planter will do when he shoots the last black fellow.

A still more pleasing example of British taste and humanity has just been revealed by a correspondent of the Standard. On April 20 he wrote from Chequers Court, near Tring, to beseech the public to hold their hands if they met two white storks. Mr. ASTLEY, who wrote to the Standard, had in his possession a pair of these beautiful, and in Germany sacred, animals. Most of us know the storks which make the quaint homely roofs of Strasburg more homely and more quaint. They are not shot in Strasburg, where the Alsatians show a lamentable lack of our famous sporting instinct. But Mr. ASTLEY'S storks escaped from his boundaries. He did not think they meant to migrate, and he had left them full liberty, in the hope that they would remain in England to rear their young. Vain hope! Mr. ASTLEY thought that the stork had a chance of being spared. He reckoned without his 'ARRY. On the very day of writing, April 20, Mr. ASTLEY was obliged to send another letter (from Oxford) to the Standard. The second epistle is worth giving in full; what Mr. ASTLEY has to say is so characteristic of our civilization:—

> SIR,—Since writing you a letter, asking you to kindly publish it, about a pair of White Storks, I have heard that one has been shot, and the other wounded, so there is now no good in its appearing in print. Apologizing for giving you this unnecessary trouble,
>
> I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
>
> H. D. ASTLEY.
> Etonian Club, Oxford, April 20.

The fate of the storks is only the last example of the meaningless desire of destruction which possesses uneducated people, and even people who should know better. What do they mean to do with the rare birds and beasts which are killed whenever they show themselves in England? A paragraph in the local journal, and perhaps a dirty, mouldy, ill-stuffed wild swan, or white stork, or eagle graces some dark corner of the slayer's house till it becomes an eyesore and is thrust into a lumber-room. No more pleasure than that is gained by depriving naturalists of a harmless pleasure and making the country more commonplace. Even if rabbits and hares do not go where their friends fear that they will, it is certain that other beasts are becoming wofully rare. In a yearly widening radius round London songbirds are trapped, strangled, and carried to town to sell by a ne'er-do-well set of "tradesmen," the birdcatchers. Even flowers are being exterminated. A rare fern is a red rag to the tourist in the Lake country; he cannot rest till he has uprooted and destroyed it. Even primroses are being extirpated, partly to be worn by omnibus drivers on "Primrose day." The primrose is not "a plant very hard to catch," like the mandrake as described by JOSEPHUS, nor can it protect itself by uttering awful yells when dragged out of the ground. Were it not for the game laws and private ownership, England would be deprived of wild flowers, and of every animal less tame than a costermonger's donkey.

FRANCE AND AUSTRALIA.

M. FERRY'S curt and peremptory answer to the representations of the English Government on the transportation of French criminals to the South Sea Islands closes the discussion for the present. It has been justly remarked that such a negotiation ought to have been kept as an official secret, but the disclosure of the request and the refusal was probably a calculated indiscretion. The unanimous approval of the Paris newspapers has probably satisfied the Minister of the accuracy with which he has estimated public opinion. His Government has probably no desire to provoke a serious quarrel with England, but it has found by repeated experiments that ostentatious disregard of English susceptibilities is always popular. The fault is perhaps not wholly on one side, for the tone in which French projects of colonial aggrandizement have been criticized on this side the Channel must be the more irritating, because it often represents a well-founded judgment. The display of French unfriendliness in Madagascar, in Tonquin, and now in the South Pacific, takes a more practical form. The animosity of centuries appears not to have been permanently abated during an unbroken peace of seventy years which has from time to time ripened into an apparently cordial alliance. In the days of LOUIS-PHILIPPE and under the Second Empire attacks on English policy were for the most part made only for purposes of domestic opposition; and they were answered by the organs of the Government. The existing Republic seems to have united all parties in chronic antagonism to England. The Journal des Débats is almost as systematically bitter as the Opportunist and Radical journals.

The late abortive negotiation was of a delicate nature, because a strong moral claim was not supported by any strictly legal right. As M. FERRY says in his note, with more truth than courtesy, the disposal of French criminals within French colonies is a matter of domestic policy with which no foreign Power is entitled to interfere. Nevertheless, the evil which is apprehended is undeniably serious, and among States, as among private persons, good neighbourhood requires the performance of many positive and negative duties which are not enforced by law. If the criminals who are to be sent to New Caledonia were afterwards strictly confined to French territory, there would be no ground for complaint of any penal system which the French Legislature might think fit to adopt. As M. FERRY well knows, the Australian colonists object to nothing in French domestic or colonial policy until it directly affects the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries. The English Government may well be excused for making diplomatic representations when it has itself yielded to precisely similar demands on the part of its own dependencies. New South Wales and Victoria were in the first instance told, after the manner of M. FERRY, that, as long as West Australia was willing to receive transported convicts, the other settlements had no right to interfere with the relations between the Imperial Government and one of its colonies. They replied that, although such adventures would be rare, if not impossible, fugitives might conceivably find their way by sea or land to Melbourne and Sydney. Their real objection, though it might be called sentimental, was still more earnest and unanswerable. They knew that Australia was commonly regarded by the world as a geographical unit; and that the reproach of being a depository of crime would not be removed as long as convicts were sent to any part of the continent or of the adjacent islands. If their remonstrances had not ultimately prevailed, there is no doubt that the Colonies would have seceded from the Empire. They have no similar menace to address to France, but they will not submit tamely to a grievous wrong.

The colonists may, perhaps, as occurs in most controversies, have injured their cause by exaggeration of their just demands. They had been warned by friendly advisers, and they are now reminded by angry French journalists, that some of them proposed virtually to establish a new MONROE doctrine in a region extending over fifty degrees of longitude, and from the Equator to the Pole. Neither the Imperial Government nor any official representative of the Colonies has preferred so extreme a claim. The French were asked, not to abstain from hoisting their flag on islands in the South Pacific, but to renounce the project of deluging that quarter of the globe with rapine, violence, and all the characteristics of that worst barbarism which belongs to the dregs of civilization. It would, in fact, be unnecessary, if it were allowable, to protest against genuine French colonization in a part of the world which will inevitably become English, or rather Australian. Convict settlements and military posts may be established and defended; but there will be little French emigration. In more promising colonies, such as Cochin China, the proportion of civil and military functionaries to resident traders resembles the following of the Highland chieftain who marched with four-and-twenty men and five-and-thirty pipers. The original MONROE doctrine, which was propounded when the United States were not much more populous than Australia at the present day, has constantly expanded as the power of the Union has increased, and it is now virtually operative from the Canadian frontier to the Gulf of Mexico. MONROE doctrines and similar claims depend not on international law, but on material strength. The American Government had no legal right to interfere with the form of government which NAPOLEON III. had established in Mexico; but as soon as the victors in the Civil War were at liberty to attend to matters of external policy, the mere intimation of American disapproval caused the retirement of the French troops and the fall of the Mexican Empire. Australia, though far less powerful than the United States, is also more inaccessible to a European force, and with its present and future territorial adjuncts, the inhabitants may hereafter be not less able and willing to exclude unwelcome neighbours.

If the French Government persists in exercising their responsible powers which are asserted in M. FERRY'S Note, the Australian Colonies may reasonably expect the sanction of the Crown to the measures of precaution which they may think it necessary to adopt. The proposed annexation of New Guinea, or of the part of the island which borders on Torres Straits, will become indispensable. It would be intolerable that foreign desperadoes should establish themselves, either under the French flag or as independent adventurers, in the immediate vicinity of the coast of Queensland. The local Government was too hasty in taking ostensible possession of the territory without Imperial authority; but all the other colonies have since approved of the same policy, and the Colonial Office, though it has hitherto withheld its assent, has intimated only a provisional objection to the scheme. Lord DERBY'S suggestion of some kind of federal organization as a condition precedent of the extension of colonial dominion, produced an immediate practical result. At the Conference held during the autumn at Sydney, both the Continental and the insular Governments were represented for the most part by their respective Prime Ministers. The scheme of qualified federation which was framed by the delegates has not yet been ratified by the Legislatures, and consequently it has not been formally submitted for the approval of the Crown; but there can be little doubt that the Colonies will agree to some arrangement of the kind. The Imperial Government is almost pledged to give favourable consideration to the project, and also to approve of the annexation or protectorate which will be the first demand of the federated or allied Colonies. In anticipation of the intended union, the several Governments will probably proceed without delay to make legislative provision against the apprehended risk of criminal immigration. M. FERRY cannot in common consistency object to their absolute control of their own domestic legislation.

It is possible that perseverance in an unfriendly policy may produce results which are certainly not contemplated by anti English politicians. The consolidation of the connexion between the Australian Colonies and the mother-country would be an almost certain consequence of a common fear of foreign encroachment. The North-American provinces remained loyal as long as France and England contended for supremacy on the Northern Continent. They rebelled within thirteen years after the peace of 1763 had confirmed the expulsion of French authority from Canada. There is happily no reason to apprehend any quarrel which would alienate the Australian Colonies from their allegiance; but such a misfortune would be impossible if they required the aid of England to defend them against French aggression. If M. FERRY or his successors wish to try the experiment of colonization in the South Pacific islands, they will best get rid of an obvious impediment by cultivating amicable relations with their predecessors in the enterprise and their future neighbours. Up to the present time they have done their utmost to alarm and irritate the great and growing communities which occupy the Australian continent and the islands. The evil and risk of hostile relations are not compensated by any prospect of political or social advantage. Transportation is the worst of all methods of disposing of criminals, except when, as in the early days of Australian colonization, they can be absorbed into a free population. The failure of the penal system in New Caledonia is notorious; and it is impossible to believe that the French Legislature would deliberately contemplate the alternative of allowing convicts to disperse themselves as freebooting adventurers over the neighbouring regions. The infliction of a rebuff on Lord LYONS and Lord GRANVILLE may perhaps satisfy French patriotism without the practical execution of unjustifiable threats.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON CHURCH.

OUR readers will remember that last summer the proposal was made, with the sanction of the Vicar of Stratford-on-Avon, to unearth the remains of SHAKSPEARE which lie in the parish church of that town. No motive could be assigned for what was generally felt to be a desecration except mere idle curiosity, and public protests against the proposed disinterment were energetically made in many quarters. The Vicar, strange to say, defended the proposal, and the Town Council, with laudable good sense, as vigorously denounced it. Eventually it was abandoned, and what, as was commonly thought, would have proved a public scandal was thus averted. It is, indeed, but seemly that a spot which not only all England, but the whole cultivated world, looks on with an especial piety should not be lightly or needlessly played tricks with. Mankind has, fortunately, not yet outgrown the instincts which lead it to guard with reverence and jealousy the graves of the poets and teachers to whom it owes much of its purest happiness; nor, so long as the writers themselves and their works are held in honour, is this ever likely to be the case. But it seems that the meddlesome spirit which prompted the unearthing of SHAKSPEARE'S bones is by no means extinct. In the Times of Tuesday last Dr. JUSSERAND, a Vice-President of the New Shakspere Society, writes to say that a proposal has been now made, and is not unlikely to be carried into effect, to enlarge the old parish church at Stratford. The ground on which, according to the correspondent, the "restoration" or enlargement is called for is in order that the religious services may "s'y développer avec magnificence." We are far from wishing hastily to prejudge a question on which it is possible that the public may hear a good deal said on both sides; but the levity with which it was last year proposed to tamper with the remains of our greatest poet does not at first sight predispose one to look with much favour at a proposal emanating from the same quarter to rebuild the church in which they lie.

It is not pretended, taking the facts as M. JUSSERAND states them, that the church is in any such state of dilapidation as to make extensive changes or repairs necessary. On the contrary, except for some vegetation which has accumulated on the roof, and which can be easily removed, all seems to be in good order. We are ourselves far from joining in the indiscriminate cry against all restorations which from time to time finds vent in the columns of the daily papers. Restorations are often necessary, even though much that is beautiful or picturesque is lost in the process. Old associations count for much; but in cases of clear necessity or evident expediency they must be sacrificed. The point is whether, in the present case, such necessity or expediency can be said to exist. So far as the information laid before the public goes, there appears to be none whatever. The church, as most of our readers are aware, is a handsome building, with a unity and harmony of design which structural changes would probably ruin. It is not pretended that the church is falling to pieces, though, even if that should ever be the case, the wisest plan would certainly be to reconstruct it on the old lines. It is at all times risky, even in the hands of the greatest architects, to alter the proportions of a building when they are already satisfactory. In all such cases to leave well alone is the best course. In the attempt to make a good building better the chances are not small that it will be spoiled. The pleasing impression of the parish church at Stratford-on-Avon does not lie in any decorative details, but in the harmonious effect of the whole; and such effects, as everybody knows, are easily marred by even slight changes of structure. Among other alterations, it is proposed, according to Dr. JUSSERAND, to enlarge the nave. It is obvious that this will change the whole character of the building, though in what way it will enable the Vicar to perform the service with more "magnificence" we are quite unable to imagine. It seems plain enough that a religious service can admit of any reasonable amount of magnificence without expanding the nave of a church to an abnormal width. What sort of service does the Vicar want to establish? Does he wish the choristers to walk six or eight abreast down the central aisle? And are the people of Stratford so enamoured of magnificent services that they are willing, for the sake of them, to sacrifice, as they would almost certainly have to sacrifice, the beauty of their historic church? We greatly doubt it. Next to Westminster Abbey, there is no ecclesiastical building in these islands that has greater claims to reverent treatment than the church at Stratford. Last year, when it was proposed to disinter the body of SHAKSPEARE, the public feeling of the town pronounced strongly against the proposal. Is it too much to hope that this will again be the case on this occasion? We grant that the proposed outrage was greater in the one case than in the other. But to have frustrated a greater act of Vandalism is no reason for not hindering a smaller. As Dr. JUSSERAND remarks:—"Il est "à peine besoin de rappeler ce que tout le monde "sait—que l'édifice, outre sa valeur comme souvenir, a une "réelle importance artistique. C'est un très-bon spécimen "d'église de petite ville aux XIVme et XVme siècles; or "on a déjà détruit ou restauré un si grand nombre de ces "églises que sans doute on devrait traiter avec plus de "respect les survivantes." We can hardly believe that the people of Stratford will suffer their church to be transformed without a protest, or that, in face of their protest, the work would be undertaken at all.

There may be other country churches of about the same date as that of Stratford-on-Avon which have been improved, and not injured by restoration. Where the building itself is dilapidated, or is tending towards dilapidation, then there is nothing to be done but to restore it. Restoration of the interior, too, may often mean the removal of hideous pews or organs foreign to the whole character of the edifice and the substitution of something more in keeping with it. But to alter the structure of a building of great architectural merit, and consecrated by memories dear to every Englishman, merely to allow a more ornate service to be performed in it, can hardly proceed from any other motive than the mere mania for restoration on its own account. It is against this that persons of taste and judgment will protest. If Dr. JUSSERAND's account is accurate (and we have not seen it called in question), the proposed reconstruction of the church is utterly unjustifiable. It is an act of vandalism against which public opinion in Stratford and throughout the country should protest, and which it can and ought to render impossible. Nothing but the structural weakness of the building can justify such a step; and even then, as we have said before, the old proportions should be preserved. Even if the church has become too small for the number of worshippers, the proper course to take would be to build a new church and not to enlarge the old. The Vicar should recollect that, besides the relation in which he stands to his parish, he is also, in a peculiar sense, a trustee for the nation. That he is not sufficiently aware of this fact is shown by the readiness with which he last year consented to, and publicly defended, a project which would have served no useful purpose of any kind, and which was in the highest degree offensive to the feelings of the great mass of Englishmen. The strong expression of opinion which that proposal called forth had the result that it was abandoned; and we trust that a similar expression of opinion on the present occasion will be attended by an equally satisfactory result.

THE CATTLE BILL.

MINISTERS have put their fortune to the test in the matter of the Cattle Bill; and, as was generally foreseen, the result has been to set them reconsidering their position for the fourth time or so in the course of their present official career. The majority of one hundred and thirty sung by Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT has failed them at the pinch, the Flowers of the Forest were a'wede away on Tuesday, and it is now proved to demonstration that the House of Commons is precisely of the same mind as it was when Mr. CHAPLIN's motion was carried last Session. In a somewhat different way the history of Lord CARLINGFORD's Bill will serve as a pendant to the history of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's measure. They have both shown how ill the Ministry can manage. The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE has made his bungles all out of his own head while the Cattle Bill has been forced on the Ministry, but both have been as badly conducted as need be. After turning a deaf ear to the House of Commons, as it would seem, in the hope that the whole matter would be forgotten, the Ministry was compelled to do something at the beginning of the Session. It framed a Bill which was to do just as little as possible, and when the House of Lords put the important word "not" in its right place in the first clause, Mr. DODSON was allowed or directed to ask the House of Commons to set it down four lines again. Meanwhile, there was much running to and fro to get up an agitation. The agitation would not come, and the Lower House remained of the same opinion as before. At the end of all their wriggling between the wish to do nothing, and the fear of the consequences if they took that course, the members of the Cabinet have contrived to bring the worst upon themselves by irritating some of their supporters without disarming their opponents, or hoodwinking the more independent part of their followers.

The economic arguments for or against the Bill have been so thoroughly discussed that it had become useless to repeat them, even in the House of Commons, where repetitions are more and more becoming the substance of every debate. On Tuesday night the question was openly argued as what it is, one of confidence. The Bill as amended in the House of Lords would make it incumbent on the Privy Council to obtain undoubted evidence that foot-and-mouth disease did not exist in any country before they permitted the importation of its cattle into Great Britain. As Lord CARLINGFORD drafted the Bill the Privy Council might admit cattle from any country as long as they were not sure that the disease did exist. It is to this form that Mr. DODSON asked the House of Commons to restore the Bill. This is not, as Ministers very well know, a mere distinction between Tweedledum and Tweedledee, as some very superior persons have discovered. It is much more like the difference between "you may" and "you must"; which, as every fourth-form boy knows, if he knows nothing else, are quite separate things. Still, if the House of Commons had full confidence in the Privy Council, it would not be very particular as to whether the "not" was in the thirteenth or the seventeenth line of the first clause. But that confidence is exactly what the majority of both Houses do not feel. They do not trust the Privy Council, and therefore they insist on tying it down to a well-marked duty. When Mr. DODSON got up to ask the House of Commons to amend the Lords' amendments, on the ground that they limited the discretion of the Privy Council with unpleasant severity, he was in fact advancing the very worst argument he could have chosen. His mistake was promptly pointed out to him by Mr. CHAPLIN, and he must have begun to realise its magnitude when Mr. J. HOWARD, who had thought the difference of little importance, declared that he meant to vote against the Ministry, because it showed such a very suspicious longing to have its hands free. The fact that a few Conservative members voted for them can have been a very poor consolation for Ministers, for it only served to emphasize the extent of the defection in their own ranks. It might be a hopeful sign if they had time before them. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL and the other Conservatives who voted in the minority have their reasons for not risking their popularity with the workmen in the towns. Their support perhaps shows that, under favourable circumstances, the long wished for agitation might be set going; but it cannot be waited for now, and even if it came it might prove extremely awkward. The Ministry was set on Tuesday afternoon between the devil and the deep sea. Mr. GLADSTONE grew very warm after the debate in his anxiety to prove that he was not disregarding the majority when he decided to wait and cast about for a compromise; but to anybody less gifted with the power of making subtle distinctions the fact appears obvious. Parliament has now said clearly enough in two successive Sessions what it wants, and Mr. GLADSTONE's Cabinet has to choose whether to yield or not. Whatever may be the exact form of the compromise offered, it can only be one of two things. Either it will be a surrender, which will be the wiser course, or it will be another attempt to shirk complying with the wish of the majority of the House. In the former case the majority may be trusted to be satisfied with having obtained the essential in any disguise, in the latter the Ministry will have turned a temporary check into a defeat which will have enduring consequences. Considering their astonishing management of the matter all along, it is at least possible that they may choose the least wise of the two methods of managing it now.

ENGLISH AS SHE WILL BE SPOKE.

WHEN the enterprising FONSECA published his celebrated Anglo-Portuguese Grammar, he intended to confer a real benefit on studious youth, at whom he dedicated her. Genius does not know its own ample powers. The distinguished Portuguese was really achieving immortality, and his grammatical examples were full of burning words more deathless than those which the poet is privileged to utter. In England people who knew not the intelligent Baboo thought, of course, that no one would ever write seriously in the Anglo-Portuguese style. But the native press of India, the press which speaks of "unveiling Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL's cui bono "in all its naked hideousness," proves that many thousands of HER MAJESTY'S subjects do actually speak "English as she is spoke." From Mauritius, too, from a Mauritian newspaper, we cull some flowers (of speech) that should not be allowed to blush unseen. Who knows but that, as our race expands itself through the Soudan, Borneo, New Guinea, and other fields over whose walls we are looking, English, as she is spoke by the educated aboriginal tribes, may not become the language of the future? The speech of MILTON, of GRAY, and of BYRON (to whom an American critic greatly prefers EMERSON) may become the speech of FONSECA. This new tongue, with such a future before it, deserves the gravest attention. Fortunately the latest example, that from Mauritius, includes both poetry and prose. As EMERSON is to MILTON, and his speech to MILTON'S, so is "M. M." (the writer of the following verses) to EMERSON, and Fonsecan to American.

The Mauritian poet M. M. (who, of course, is not Mr. MAX MÜLLER, though a very original linguist) starts quietly enough with a mere letter to the Editor:—

> DEAR MR. EDITOR [he says],—Previous to dropping my pen on this paper, I am glad to say that it is a work of paramount importance to occasionally look back on the past, and give an account of the profits and losses sustained in our constant undertakings. The question relative to the preservation of our health ought to be, I believe, a primary derivation in our incoherent minds.

Let us pause to consider the characteristics of the Late English thus revealed. New English, or Fonsecan, is obviously based on newspaper English. "A work of para- "mount importance" is one of the clichés that the writer of political "leaders" can seldom deny himself. "Primary "derivation" again seems to be derived from popular science. FLAUBERT would have revelled in it, FLAUBERT who said, wittily and wisely, that "we live in a time when art "is expected to be moral, vice to be decent, metaphysics to "be intelligible, and science to be popular." The Mauritian goes on to speak of the value of health. "We, the "thinking communities of this island, must, we allow "the term, consider health, through thick and thin, "sine qua non for the welfare of the Colony." He has got "thinking communities" from the Spectator, which thus "moulds the whisper" of peoples still to be. The "New Writer" goes on to say that he had seen a woman bathing where no such woman should be, and, "finding "no one at hand to put a dead-lock to this abominable "practice, I at once sent a boy" (the New Writer seems to be a schoolmaster) "to apprize her of her delinquency." Here a bit of eighteenth-century English appears, acquired, doubtless, in the New Writer's study of Dr. JOHNSON. Thus we have newspaper English, popular scientific English, and the English of the books in which our native friends are educated, all blending in Fonsecan. After some practical remarks, our friend drops into poetry; and here, we think, is the most instructive part of his toil. What question is more interesting than the English poetry of the future? The well of pure Fonsecan undefiled bubbles up and sings, καταβόμενον κελαρύζει, in the following fashion:—

HEALTH.

Health, a spring of good virtue,
Prolongs the lives of mankind;
When every thoughts we eschew
Off the often troubled mind.

Cure it cannot the victim,
Though he shall moan for the pain,
Unless the mankind to trim
Be in its dotal domain.

Can we not say, sir, to them,
Who are sitting on the Board,
To give a glance on the main,
Of the question we now hoard?

Yes. Let them judge the complaint
And send their men to put stop
To this delinquency unfaint
Of which here we are a crop.

In this lay we recognize the practical purpose of the educated native, conveyed in something of the obscurity admired in Mr. BROWNING, and with that wavering balanced hesitation between anapæstic and iambic verse which so pathetically marks some recent verse of "art that "is moral." Such, doubtless, will be the English poetry of the future; such the songs of the dark races blended beneath the Anglo-Saxon sceptre.

PROCURATORS FISCAL.

ON Monday night Dr. CAMERON did his best, with the help of Sir G. CAMPBELL and Mr. MACFARLANE, to destroy one of our few remaining illusions. He attacked the Procurator Fiscal. We have been long accustomed and even reconciled to the shortcomings of the Public Prosecutor south of the Tweed, but it had been an article of faith that in Scotland he was above reproach. Dr. CAMERON is of another opinion. He finds that there is much in the position and methods of proceeding of the Procurator which requires amendment; and thirty-five members of the House voted that Dr. CAMERON was right. Not that the member for Glasgow appeared in his favourite character of root-and-branch man. On the contrary, he expressed a sound Scotch admiration for the institution, and confined himself to complaining of the position of the officials who have to work it. In one respect Dr. CAMERON may feel sure of the support of the most Conservative lawyers. He insisted that the Procurators Fiscal are not, as a rule, sufficiently paid, and the reform he asks for is an increase of salary. There is certainly no actual or possible Fiscal in Scotland who is not prepared to approve of Dr. CAMERON'S argument so far. When it comes to accepting all his deductions the support will be less hearty, for, when stripped of the polite formulas which Dr. CAMERON felt constrained to use, his statement amounted to this, that the Procurators are compelled to hold a dependent position, and cannot be trusted to do their duty honestly. Out of the whole body only eight can confine themselves to their official duties. The remaining forty-four are compelled to act as solicitors, or to take to other business. In some cases the other business (and here we get to the source and origin of the evil) is that of factor or estate agent to a landlord. Now in Dr. CAMERON'S opinion, and still more in Mr. MACFARLANE'S, it is impossible that a Procurator Fiscal, who is also a solicitor or factor, can discharge his public duties in a satisfactory fashion. They were both prepared to assert that there is great discontent on the subject in Scotland, and to ask for the outlay of a little money to put things right. There is so much plausibility in the contention that a public official should confine himself to his office, that the support given to the motion is perfectly intelligible. The ADVOCATE-GENERAL himself, although he opposed the member for Glasgow, did not deny that what he asked for was reasonable. He only objected to the expense, and insisted that the present system works fairly well. He also made much of the very sound and very Scotch argument that the more a man has to do the more he does. If you wish, said the ADVOCATE-GENERAL, to get the best out of a man, keep his nose to the grindstone. A Procurator Fiscal who has only his office to attend to may have intervals of leisure, and so get lazy; whereas, if he is always at work for himself, he is kept in training, and his faculties are always sharp. On these excellent moral grounds, and also because reform means an outlay of money without any adequate return in the shape of a seat in the Cabinet for Lord ROSEBERY or a good, big, imposing Local Government Board, he asked the House to reject Dr. CAMERON's motion, and it did so by a majority of seventeen.

It is the nature of Scotch questions to interest nobody but Scotchmen; and so the question of the Procurator Fiscal's salary may be left to be settled by the members from the north of the Tweed and Mr. MACFARLANE. There were, however, one or two features in the debate which are worth looking at for their own sake. There was, for one thing, the appearance of that tremendous popular agitation which seems to spring up everywhere at the touch of the Radical member. Dr. CAMERON asserted that Scotland was burning to reform the national system of criminal prosecutions; and Mr. MACFARLANE, with the emphasis of an orator whose education has been finished in Ireland, spoke of "atrocious "oppression" and the sufferings of the poor man. It is very strange that we should hear of all this for the first time. When Scotchmen are intent on reforming something, they are not wont to be so quiet about it. To judge by what has been heard of late years, and even from what was said in the debate, Scotland has very good reason to be satisfied with the administration of the law. It is carried out rapidly and quietly. The punishment of criminals is not left at the mercy of accident or to a species of regulated private revenge. It is perhaps better that public officials should serve the State alone; but, without accepting the Spartan theories of the ADVOCATE-GENERAL, it is possible to find a good deal to admire in the Scotch system. There is probably not one of the Continental nations possessing essentially the same legal machinery as the Scotch which could rely on finding so many men to do, in addition to professional labours, the arduous work of a Public Prosecutor who is not a mere ornamental figure, and do it so well. Even the members who supported Dr. CAMERON protested against his sweeping general accusations, and voted for him because they thought the Procurators deserve better treatment, and because their actual position might lead to abuse. Except the member for Glasgow and Mr. MACFARLANE, nobody seemed to believe in the existence of any serious cause of complaint against the conduct of prosecutions. There is, however, no sort of difficulty in discovering what has aroused the zeal of these gentlemen. Some of the Procurators are agents to landlords, and of late certain crofters have found them unpleasantly active. Hence all this talk about atrocious oppression and the entrapping of innocent boys. In these times, when the whole administration of Government is undergoing a process of conversion into a big Radical machine, it probably appears a good thing to Dr. CAMERON to make the Procurators Fiscal wholly dependent on the State. There is a vague but natural conviction that in that case they might be trusted to stand by, under proper pressure, while the Highland crofters agitated for their rights in the way which proved so effectual to carry the Irish Land Act.

There is one other part of the debate which ought to possess an interest out of Scotland. Every now and then there is a call for Public Prosecutors in England, and there is at all times a steady grumble against the existing officer who bears that title, apparently as an ornament, and under restrictions which confine him to the harmless position of dummy. Englishmen who think that a Procurator Fiscal would be a useful officer here should carefully read Monday night's debate, and then ask themselves whether they want him as he is in Scotland, or whether, if he is not taken with all his powers, he is worth taking at all. The secret inquiries which the Procurator Fiscal conducts, and the wide discretion entrusted to him, might not be found to prove acceptable on nearer acquaintance. Here Dr. CAMERON has the advantage of expressing the common English view. It has become our habit, alone among the peoples of Europe, to take it for granted that the presumption is always in favour of the criminal. He is given every chance and every safeguard. The very detective police can scarcely be kept from announcing their movements from the housetops. It is a system which prevents occasional injustice at the expense of allowing the guilty to escape far too often, but it also saves us from a great deal of inquisitorial control. Scotch law has always gone on very different principles. It has pressed hardly on the accused, and has always supposed that the duty of legal authorities was to prove his guilt, and not to establish his innocence. The influence of English example has modified the working of the Scotch system very considerably, but a great deal of the old Adam remains. The whole control of criminal prosecutions is still in the hands of the State, and its agent the Procurator Fiscal considers himself as a species of authorized huntsman whose business it is to keep down the human wolves and foxes which prey on society, and also to keep poachers in the form of private prosecutors from trespassing on his preserves. Scotchmen are well content with this state of things. They find that it works smoothly, and are quite satisfied to see the Procurator Fiscal well armed. It is possible that even in Scotland the success of the system is largely due to the fact that the Procurators are not mere Government officials, but generally men of business who have ample means of knowing how much will be tolerated. These modifications which have been produced by time and compromise are, however, just the part of the Procurator Fiscal's office which it would be most difficult to reproduce in England.

HYDE PARK CORNER.

ON Monday evening Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE announced to the House of Commons the decision of the Government with regard to the DUKE's statue. It is to go to Aldershot, and a foreign artist is to be commissioned to make another for the arch. This decision will not be universally popular. We had got accustomed to the ugliness of WYATT's statue. The Duke of WELLINGTON sat for it, according to the Duke of RUTLAND, who, indeed, seemed to have proved the fact, though the Committee appointed by the PRINCE OF WALES denies it. Furthermore, the Duke of WELLINGTON liked it, and was proud of it; and we confess to preferring it on that account in spite of its want of artistic merit Another unpleasant feature of Monday night's proceedings was the evident anxiety of the CHIEF COMMISSIONER to shelter himself behind the PRINCE OF WALES. His ROYAL HIGHNESS, of course, is not a Sovereign with responsible Ministers, and in strict law there was nothing actually unconstitutional in Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's constant references. Still it is impossible not to observe the attempt to make use of the well-deserved and undoubted popularity of the PRINCE to ward off unpopularity from the FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS and his more exalted colleagues. Another curious point in the debate was the anxiety of several speakers to disclaim any objection to Mr. BOEHM as sculptor of the new statue on the ground of his being a foreigner. It is difficult to see why the fact should not be mentioned, and it would be impossible to object to Mr. BOEHM on any other ground. That he is a first-rate sculptor no one will deny. True, we have some artists as good as he is, and some whom critics look on as better; but in a national work of this character it is absurd to ignore the sculptor's nationality. When MAROCHETTI was commissioned to make the statue of Prince ALBERT for the Memorial, there was a similar disclaimer of prejudice against a foreigner; while a few outspoken people said plainly that it was immaterial, as the PRINCE was himself a foreigner. MAROCHETTI's failure, and the subsequent employment of FOLEY, gave, nevertheless, universal satisfaction. We have no FOLEY now; but we have good sculptors of our own race and country. Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's reason for employing Mr. BOEHM was very curious. After another reference to the PRINCE OF WALES, he said that three distinguished (English) sculptors had refused to enter into a competition for the honour of making the new statue. Did Mr. LEFEVRE seriously think three distinguished sculptors would entertain such a proposal for a moment? The excuse, the only one made for the appointment of Mr. BOEHM, amounts simply to this—three English sculptors of eminence refused to behave as if their reputation had not been already formed; and Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, finding competition impossible among native artists, appoints a foreigner without any competition. Our one source of comfort lies in the probability that Mr. BOEHM will produce a fine work, and one worthy of the DUKE's memory.

Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR, who apparently takes some interest in artistic questions, and who may perhaps be looked upon as a suitable person to rule at some future time in the Office of Works, made the best speech of the short debate. The question of the removal of the statue, he observed, was not merely an artistic one. It was rather one of historical association. He went on to criticise the new arrangements at Hyde Park Corner; and in answer to him Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's peculiar logic comes again into use. He is going to decorate the arch as its architect intended. The original drawings will be in the approaching exhibition of architectural drawings at the Burlington Club. To judge by them, BURTON intended at first to put a frieze round the plinth, and to add eight statues, four on each front. Subsequently a chariot was proposed for the top, and so in the engraved views of the time is always represented there. Which of these intentions is to be carried out does not very clearly appear, or whether they are both to be fulfilled. The arch was originally designed to make an entrance to the Royal Gardens; but the device of turning the roadway of Constitution Hill through was ingenious and successful. The whole operation has now been carried out, so far as the public is informed, without the superintendence of any architect or sculptor, certainly without the help of any artist of eminence. The narrowness of the majority in favour of the vote, and Sir ROBERT PEEL'S promise to bring the matter up again on the Report, leave a hope that Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE'S wild career may receive a check. A characteristic excuse was put forward for not replacing the DUKE—namely, the cost of the operation; but, as Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE made no reference to the similar cost of putting any other piece of sculpture on the arch, we may suppose that he reasoned, if it can be called reasoning, as he had done in the matter of choosing a sculptor.

THE BUDGET.

THE Budget was introduced by Mr. CHILDERS on Thursday evening in a speech shorter, on the whole, than such speeches usually are. Mr. CHILDERS has neither Mr. GLADSTONE'S power of lucid explanation, nor its opposite, in which unfortunately the PREMIER excels even more. The statement of Thursday excited little curiosity beforehand. But the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, by two proposals which he made towards the conclusion of his speech, contrived to impart to it considerable interest. The subject of light gold is in itself of importance, if in many cases, no doubt, of very little importance, to everybody. The subject of the rate of interest on the National Debt affects a large and increasing number of people. Mr. CHILDERS'S speech, then, may be divided into two distinct parts; and, without pronouncing any opinion upon them as yet, we may briefly indicate their drift, both as regards the account of the revenue and the new proposals.

The revenue for the past year has amounted to a total of 87,205,000*l.*, or 656,000*l.* more than the estimate. For the coming year the estimate is 85,555,000*l.* The expenditure for the past year has been 86,999,000*l.*, leaving a surplus of 206,000*l.* The surplus anticipated for next year is 263,000*l.* Mr. CHILDERS proposes to apply this modest sum in the reduction of the licence-duty on four-wheeled vehicles plying for hire, or, in other words, on cabs, and we may possibly in the remote future be able to find some kind of conveyance fit to drive in besides hansoms. This reduction is, however, specially intended for the relief of hackney-carriage owners at watering-places where the season is short. The Excise has produced 46,653,000*l.*, being 138,000*l.* above the estimate, though still showing a fall on spirits, the very open weather of the months of November, December, January, and February having, as the CHANCELLOR observed, had a direct effect on the reduction of the amount. On the other hand, the beer revenue has greatly improved. In 1881–2 it was 8,531,000*l.* In 1882–3 it fell to 8,400,000*l.* It has now risen to 8,488,000*l.*, or within 50,000*l.* of what it was two years ago. This is not unsatisfactory, even from the teetotal point of view. People have drunk more beer and less gin. As Mr. CHILDERS remarked, with a complacency all the greater because it was unexpected, pauperism has decreased. Artisans and labourers are doing very well. Bread is cheap; and although there is "much complaint among persons in easy circum-"stances," or, rather, among persons who were formerly in easy circumstances, "there is a steady increase in the "accumulations of the country which is best evidenced "by the growth of the Income-tax and the House-duty." No wonder that Mr. CHILDERS has, as he says, to deal with very conflicting circumstances. Railway receipts are low. Trade is depressed. Incomes derived from land, whether by landlords or farmers, are still in an unsatisfactory state. These are Mr. CHILDERS'S own words, but it does not seem to occur to him that it is his duty to face these circumstances. The Post Office has proved a disappointment, and the CHANCELLOR is disposed to put off cheap telegrams for nine months. The Parcels Post has not fulfilled expectations. Instead of bringing in, as was estimated, 340,000*l.*, it has only produced 155,000*l.* Such are the chief items relating to the past with which Mr. CHILDERS dealt, and they do not seem to present any features of exceptional importance.

With regard to the future, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER had two principal proposals to make which, it may be anticipated, will both encounter considerable criticism. The first relates to the reduction of the National Debt. The funded debt amounted this time last year to 712,699,000*l.* It now stands at 640,631,000*l.*, being a lower figure than it has ever touched since 1811. The interest is lower than it has ever been since 1805. This satisfactory state of things, coupled with the fact that, while Two-and-a-half per Cent. stock is at 91, and the old Three per Cent. Consols are at 102 and upwards, or, in other words, that the Two-and-a-half per Cent. stock is nearly at par, and the Three per Cent. considerably above par, Mr. CHILDERS sees his way to a grand reduction of the whole debt by a conversion of the Three per Cent. stock into two and a half. How this is to be done he explained not very clearly; but, no doubt, by the Treasury using its undoubted right of giving notice, the arrangement will be largely carried out while money remains so cheap and trade so depressed. The second proposal to which we have referred is for the improvement of the gold coinage. It appears that, since the redemption of specie payments in 1817, more than 300,000,000*l.* worth of gold coins have been put into circulation, and not more than 50,000,000*l.* formally withdrawn. Of the 90,000,000 sovereigns and 20,000,000 half sovereigns now in circulation in this country fully a half are light. Various proposals have been made and plans tried by which this state of things is to be remedied. Mr. CHILDERS reviewed them one by one, but rejected them all for various reasons, except one. The difficulty of course is obvious. Somebody must pay for the depreciation. The proposal that has hitherto been most favourably entertained is that the loss should be divided between the Treasury and the actual holder. But Mr. CHILDERS suggests taking the half-sovereign, converting it into a coin containing more alloy, and only representing half a sovereign as a crownpiece represents quarter of a sovereign, so as to make a saving by which the whole gold coinage may eventually be called in, and reissued in full without loss. The proposal is a debatable one, but it is only bad men who will see in it a sign that the Government, having already suggested the debasement of the franchise, now suggests the debasement of the currency.

FOOTBALL IN THE FIELD.

IT might be a nice question for the curious to decide whether the position that the game of football has within recent times taken among our national sports is due to an increase in the manliness or in the frivolity of our age. Popular in one shape or other the game has been in these islands from an almost immemorial time; indeed, it has a history to which the history of cricket is but of yesterday. The Greeks played it, and so did the Romans; the latter, in Rugbeian fashion, using their hands as well as their feet. It is supposed to have come into Britain with Cæsar, but the first mention of it in our chronicles is in the latter part of the twelfth century, when William Fitzstephen, in his History of London, writes of the young men of the city going on certain festivals into the fields to play the game after dinner. For some reason, shrouded in the mists of antiquity, Shrove Tuesday seems to have been held peculiarly sacred to the sport, and many who have still a fair share of their span of years to run can remember how on that day, in certain odd nooks and corners of England, a ball was kicked fortuitously about village streets to the great detriment of windows and the dismay of the more timorous inhabitants. In its early days the game was followed in very primitive fashion, and in a desperately rough one, without any of the intricacy and manœuvring of modern play; so that probably it was not only James's known aversion to hard blows that made him forbid his luckless son from joining in a sport which he has styled in his Basilikon Doron as "meeter for laming than making able the users thereof." Gradually these Shrove Tuesday diversions died out, and the game became relegated mainly to the playing-grounds of our schools and village greens, became to be regarded by universal, if unwritten, consent as the peculiar joy and privilege of youth—a game to be put aside, with other childish things, by those whose cheeks, as the late Mr. Calverley has sung, had become "partially obscured by whisker."

According to a writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica, it was the Volunteer movement of 1860, and the impetus thereby given to open-air exercise and amusement, that have caused the revival of football. But, whatever the cause may have been, of the revival itself there is no question. Thirty years or so ago, for example, the game was hardly known at the Universities, was at best pursued by some exuberant Freshmen, Etonians mostly, who had not yet outgrown their salad days. Now our "young barbarians" of Oxford and Cambridge kick away at each other's shins as keenly as they hit each other's bowling about at Lord's, or tug away at each other year by year from Putney to Mortlake. The county Elevens who compete for the challenge cup of the Football Association are chosen with almost as much care as for cricket; nay, it is whispered that professional players for the former are almost as much in demand as for the latter game, and get pretty nearly as well paid—which rumour, we may observe, if it be true, is a direct infraction of that rule of the Association which enacts that "Any member of a Club receiving remuneration or consideration of any sort, above his actual expenses and any wages actually lost by any such player taking part in either Cup, Inter-Association, or International contests, and any Club employing such player, shall be excluded from this Association." Nor is age now considered any bar to the active enjoyment of the game. Among the ranks of the "Old Etonians," and of other Clubs similarly constituted, may be seen players who get over the ground with an agility, and charge their opponents with a hardihood, perfectly astounding for their years. To watch some of these veterans limping out of a furious "maul," or rolling on the muddy turf, would give a stranger, no doubt, a high opinion of the vivacity and pluck of our countrymen; but to one of philosophical bent—such a one, for example, as Mr. Max O'Rell (who has indeed branded the game as "fit only for savages")—the spectacle might also have a ludicrous side. He might feel inclined to exclaim with the poet,

Ah! tell them they are men!

A man does, we venture to think, seem a little out of place in a football field.

The Encyclopædic writer, to whose learned dissertation on the game we have already owned our debt, does indeed make one statement to which we must venture to demur. Winchester and Harrow, he says, are "the chief exponents of the game wherein kicking alone is allowed as a means of propulsion." Eton "plays a hybrid game in two different ways, 'at the Wall' and 'in the Field,' the latter being a sort of mixture of both kinds of play." Mother Eton has been a good deal harried and mocked in these latter times, poor thing! But surely so baseless an imputation as this has never yet been cast upon her. We had always thought the game as played "in the Field" at Eton was the purest form of football known, the most essentially foot-ball of any. On no excuse whatever may the hands be employed, except to touch the ball, when it passes behind the goal lines, to save or get "a rouge." Even the rules of the Association game, which may be described as a sort of compromise between all rules, are more lenient; for by them the goal-keeper may in defence of his post make use of his hands in any way save in carrying the ball; he may stop it with them, or hit it away, or throw it away. But in the Eton field even that last resource is denied; even in the sorest straits, by the feet, and by the feet alone, must the goal be saved. In their broad principles the Eton and Association games have no very material difference. But whereas in the latter the game is begun by a free "kick-off," and the ball, when it passes out of play, except behind the goal lines, is thrown in at will by a player of the side opposing him who kicked it out, in the former the game begins by a "bully" formed in the middle of the ground, and, when the ball is kicked out, is continued by a bully formed opposite the point where it passed out of play. It was the contemplation of this bully, we may suppose, that led the writer in the Encyclopædia to discover an analogy between the wall and the field games. On either side are a "post" and two "sides," with others to back them up. These form down opposite each other, alternately under and over as at "the wall," and the ball is placed between their feet. This bully is mostly but a momentary affair, and the ball, if not carried through by superior weight, is turned out almost at once to one of the two "corners." Behind the bully stand the "flying-man," the "long-behind," and the "goals," and sometimes a player is taken from the bully to act as "short-behind." The game is a terribly fast one, as, except by the "behinds," no "cool kicking" is allowed; no player "up," that is to say, may kick the ball hard; he must "run it down," or "dribble it," as the phrase goes elsewhere than at Eton, keeping it as much between his feet as possible. To see a skilled player do this at top speed, winding in and out among his opponents, with the ball never more than a foot or two away from him, is a pretty sight, and it is prettier still to watch him "running it down the line" with all the players crowding round him on the watch for a "rouge"; as one enthusiastic Etonian has been heard to observe, "it is the very poetry of football!" A "rouge" is won when the ball passes behind the goal lines, but not through the posts, and is touched first by one of the side which has forced it over. But the player who forces it over must at the moment be in immediate contact with one of his opponents; otherwise the ball is "cool," and is quietly kicked off into the middle of the ground by one of the side over whose lines it has passed, and the same thing happens when one of that side is the first to touch it behind the line. When a rouge has been claimed and allowed, an adjournment is made to the goal of that side against whom it has been given. A yard—the longest yard that youthful legs can stride—from the goal the stoutest player of that side takes his stand with the ball between his feet, the rest backing him up in various positions so as to form a solid wedge-shaped front to the foe. Ranged in similar fashion the foe charges down on the ball, and then commences a struggle "grim and great" as that which avenged the slaughter of Hypatia, till the ball is either forced through the goal posts by one side, or carried by the other away from that dangerous vicinity back into the enemy's country. This is the roughest part of the Eton game, and is sometimes, no doubt, where the match is a keen one, as for the House Cup, very rough. While the game is confined to boys, however, no very great harm is likely to ensue, and, as a rule, the Eton game may, we think, be said to be less prolific of serious accidents than any other; certainly far less so than the Rugbeian indiscriminate pulling and hauling and kicking, which have, indeed, been of late considerably modified by the rules of the Rugby Union. A goal outweighs any number of rouges, but where the proportion of goals is equal, victory remains with that side which claims the greatest number of rouges.

In any game of football shins, of course, will suffer, and here and there a collar-bone perchance will snap. But the very spirit of the Eton game lends itself less to hard kicking than do others. Skill more than brute force is required to run a ball down neatly from one end of the field to the other; the enemy has rather to be dexterously avoided (not "funked") than encountered and overthrown. Still it would be idle to pretend that football is a delicate game, or one to be enjoyed without a fair share of hard blows, given and received. Given and received they were, in that consulship of Plancus which every man loves to talk of, with great equanimity and no complaint. It seems now, however, that this too, with so many other things, has been changed at Eton. Walking through the town the other day an old Etonian, who had known Plancus, observed in a shop-window certain leg-guards ("shin-pads," is, we believe, the technical term), not unlike those worn by cricketers, but lighter and less hampering to the limbs. As was the case with Nell Cook on a certain memorable occasion, "fury filled his eye," and he walked into the shop to ask if it were possible that Eton boys wore such things. "Well, sir," was the answer, "I think they don't like it known, but as a matter of fact they do!" Shins, no doubt, grow tenderer with advancing years, and in the Association matches pads now are common things; which is one reason, perhaps, among many, why with advancing years the game should be put aside. But that our boys should descend to such a depth of effeminacy is terrible indeed! One feels inclined to say with Cowley,

In all the bonds we ever bore,
We griev'd, we sigh'd, we wept; we never blush'd before.

THE MODEL LANDLORD AND THE MODEL PHILANTHROPIST.

SATURDAY and Monday last afforded two pleasing and indeed not easily surpassable studies for that reprehensible person, the modern cynic. The modern cynic might have seen both with his own eyes at no greater trouble than a leisurely journey between Dublin and London, during which he might have stopped on the way and admired the beauties of nature, and thought what a very funny animal the chief animated ornament of nature is. The scene on Saturday was the Four Courts, Dublin; the scene on Monday was the Palace of Westminster and that division of it called the Commons House of Parliament. Two very eminent persons figured in the two scenes. The hero of the Dublin commonty was Mr. Parnell, the friend of the oppressed Irish tenant, the sworn enemy of exterminators, the author, or at least the adapter, of the doctrine of prairie value, the originator of some very well-known directions for the practical reformation of wicked men who oppress their fellows for rent or take holdings on which others have refused rent, &c. &c. &c. The hero of the other was Mr. Gladstone, the flower and crown of modern philanthropists, the avenger of the massacred Bulgarian, the man to whom making light of the reported slaughter of women and children was not so very long ago a thing only to be atoned for by the prompt dismissal of the guilty person from office and the substitution of him, Mr. Gladstone, in the guilty person's place. These things, however, it may be fairly granted, are ancient history. Much water has flowed under the bridge since Mr. Gladstone thundered about Batak, and some since Mr. Parnell delivered lectures on the art and mystery of holding the harvest. And it is gratifying to those who believe in a cis-mortem distribution of rewards and punishments to observe that the good deeds of these two good men have had their reward. Mr. Gladstone has been Prime Minister for four years, and in the natural course of things the cancelled cheque for forty thousand pounds has long since been duly returned by Mr. Parnell's bankers to the drawers, and the amount snugly put to that patriot's credit. Both of them, in fact, to adopt the touching phraseology of the celebrated Mr. Brocklehurst, have "got two nuts for their infant piety." But it is an observed fact that the rewarding, especially the lavish rewarding, of piety, infant and other, is not seldom followed by a certain weariness in well-doing on the part of the infants.

However this may be, Mr. Parnell's appearance before a jury of his countrymen (perhaps including some subscribers to the Nation's Tribute, though, if we mistake not, most of that came from Yankeeland) might have been staggering to those who do not know how unsafe it is to judge from appearances. The rash and hasty judger would certainly not have conjectured from it that Mr. Parnell was the most illustrious of tenants' friends or that he had recently conducted a Land League agitation, or indeed anything at all like these things. Far, very far, from us be it to find fault with Mr. Parnell's proceedings in themselves. We, being in the gall of bitterness as to this land matter, do firmly hold that it is a tenant's business to pay rent, and a landlord's right, if the tenant does not pay it, to recover it in whatsoever way the law allows. True, some queer circumstances were alleged in this particular case. It was said that there was a cross-transaction in the money-lending way between Mr. Parnell and his tenant, and that, if the tenant was slack with his rent, Mr. Parnell was not extremely prompt with his interest (it is pleasant, by the way, to reflect that the Nation's Tribute will prevent such awkwardnesses in future if Mr. Parnell is fairly careful of it). It was even insinuated that Mr. Parnell had unaccountably delayed to proceed with an action in the tenant's life, when the tenant could have come forward to give evidence about a verbal agreement (very important to the matter) which was made in Kilmainham. Kilmainham seems, according to this story, to have seen more treaties than one, and bad luck would appear to have presided over them all. With all this, however, we have very little to do. The agreeable thing is to find the great champion of the Land League binding tenants down by leases containing agreements not to claim compensation for improvements or disturbance and bringing actions against widows for arrears of rent. This is great fun; and except Mrs. West, who has to pay the arrears and the law expenses, everybody ought to be pleased. Mr. Parnell gets his money, the British public has the height of diversion entirely in observing Mr. Parnell's proceedings, the cyouncillors of Ireland—a deserving body—have honourable employment, and it is to be hoped fees. Some weak-minded folk have suggested that the Irish public will not like the fun. But here we are inclined to think that they are wrong. Irishmen fully understand the spirit of the axiom laid down by a Scotch authority to the effect that "The Lord's lambs mun play," and they are quite accustomed to the spectacle which has been scandalously likened to that of one Irishman roasting and another turning the spit. The idea that Mr. Parnell will be much damaged by this transaction arises from the same Saxon stupidity which saw "queerness" in that memorable refusal of Sir Rufford Bufford to pay the bill for the horse he had himself sold at a profit "when it came jus" which is recorded in the Irish Sketch Book. Mr. Parnell may cease to be an uncrowned king—Irish uncrowned kings have nearly as short a term of royalty as, according to a rather misty history, their crowned predecessors usually had a thousand years ago or thereabouts. But it will hardly be owing to this little nibble at Mrs. Widow West's house. This, however, does not in the least diminish the fun of the thing to the stupid British mind. And generous Irishmen need not grudge us this fun. They have so much of their own, what with leaving cards with rifle-cartridges tied to them (a mode of menace terrific, no doubt, but somewhat inscrutable), with bags of dynamite, with surgeons' knives, and so forth, that it is only fair they should give the enemy a turn now and then. And in a quiet sort of way it must be admitted that this little play of "The Uncrowned King and the Widow; or, How I Taught my Tenant to Hold the Harvest," is very fair entertainment indeed.

The fun of Mr. Gladstone's contribution to this week's amusements is of a less unmixed kind. There were no bones broken in the Mount Avon matter, and, as apparently the deceased Mr. West was a man of some substance, his widow has perhaps bought her lesson not to have business transactions with patriots at no very terrible price. The signing of the lease with a strict covenant against claiming compensation for disturbance just about the time, August 1880, of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, and the interview in Kilmainham, that favourite place of counsel, and all the rest of it, may be laughed at without any nasty afterthought. The Westminster farce is much nearer to the tragedy, and the spectator has to keep his eye very steady on the object to avoid straying into quite other passions than laughter. On Monday night Mr. Bourke, as all men know, asked Mr. Gladstone (as usual in vain) for information about Egypt, and included in his question a special request for any information about "the state of affairs at Khartoum, Shendy, and Berber." Now every one was aware of a rumour that part of the garrison of Shendy, with a number of non-combatants, had been intercepted and massacred in an attempt to escape. In his reply Mr. Gladstone made no reference to this, but simply said, "Shendy is surrounded by hostile tribes." Mr. Bourke naturally called his attention to the omission of any notice of the reported massacre. To this Mr. Gladstone replied, in the decorous report of the Times next morning, "It was not in your notice." On the evening itself the words were elsewhere reported as having been bluntly "You didn't ask me." But the discrepancy is entirely unimportant. However, being yet further pressed, Mr. Gladstone observed, "My hon. friend the Under-Secretary has got a telegram and will give information." This airy style may have reminded some hearers of the agreeable manner in which the elder Mr. Osborne used to tell his son George that "Mr. Chopper has got something for you." The something, however, which Mr. Chopper had was usually a cheerful cheque. What Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice had was a confirmation of the massacre which Mr. Gladstone thought so unimportant that his attention not being specially or literally called to it, he said nothing about it. The state of affairs at Shendy does not appear to Mr. Gladstone to comprehend such trifling details as the massacre of a few hundred of the garrison and inhabitants of Shendy, and when by great effort his attention is attracted to this small matter, he has to turn to an Under-Secretary to give the answer. Even thus might a stately butler depute some very trifling office to the Buttons of the establishment, reserving himself for weightier matters.

There is really need of some new pamphlets from Mr. Gladstone. "Lessons in Massacre" are quite out of date, and what we want now is "Lessons in How to Make Light of Massacre." It is a great pity, too, that Mr. Gladstone's present constituency is so far off that he cannot reasonably be expected to deliver Blackheath speeches or an equivalent for them. It would be very agreeable to hear him crying, in one of his customary flights, "Oh, gentlemen, let me implore you to desist from this habit of considering rather the lives of miserable Egyptians than the necessities and convenience of a God-granted Government," and pointing out how idle and factious is the task of objecting to the slaughter of Arabs on the Nile by hundreds and Arabs on the Red Sea by thousands, when the real question is how to keep the Liberal party in office. And round him other voices ought to gather;—"Perish Gordon! perish our influence in Egypt! perish Egypt itself, and all the men and things thereof, rather than that Mr. Gladstone should be obliged to accept a responsibility which is disagreeable to him, or to make a damning admission in a Parliamentary answer." But we live in flat and prosaic times, far different, alas, from those of but a short while since. Still the actual appearance of the Prime Minister on this and on other occasions has been (always putting the more serious view aside) a pleasant spectacle enough. It has enabled any one with brains in his head to estimate the exact amount of sincerity that there was in the cries and denunciations of seven years ago, the exact amount of philanthropy and sympathy for man as man which Mr. Gladstone feels. Not one word of sorrow for the reported massacre drops from the lips that gushed and roared over the massacre of Batak, not so much as the stereotyped "I am sorry to say" or "There is too much reason to believe" decks the fate of these inconvenient persons who had dared to get massacred in a manner troublesome to Mr. Gladstone's Government. Their fate is first passed over as not worthy even of mention, then handed to an Under-Secretary to talk about. A scandal to human nature this? Oh dear no! It is not worth while to get into the heroics (Mr. Gladstone himself is our warrant for that) about a reported massacre of a few hundred men and women, still less about a politician leaving his humanity to be called for when he next goes out of office. But it is an excellent joke, and quite fit to run in a curricle with the joke of the hero of the Land League invoking the tyrannic Courts established by an alien Power to extract rent from the widows of his tenants.

These be your gods, oh England and oh Ireland!

ANTONY AT THE ODÉON.

THE complaint of a dearth of new writers and new plays is not confined to our side of the Channel. With the exception of Severo Torelli—a fine play brought out by François Coppée at the Odéon—and M. Jean Aicart's unfortunate drama, Smilis, at the Théâtre Français, we are not aware that any new piece worth mentioning has appeared during the past winter on the Parisian stage; for the drama at the Théâtre de Gymnase, Le Maître de Forges, is, after all, only a clever adaptation of a well-known novel. In consequence the theatres have fallen back upon revivals. The Théâtre Français is giving M. Dumas's L'Étrangère, with Mlle. Barthet as the Duchesse de Sept Monts, and Mlle. Blanche Pierson as Mrs. Clarkson. The former replaces Mlle. Croizette, and is allowed to be in all respects far superior to her; but Mlle. Pierson, who has been for some years the leading actress at the Théâtre du Vaudeville, would, we venture to think, have done well to remain there. Neither in appearance nor in dramatic method is she suited to the larger stage on which she now appears; and should Mme. Sarah Bernhardt-Damala revisit as a spectator the scene of her former triumphs, she would be more than human if she did not find a malicious pleasure in noticing how completely her successor has succeeded in divesting the character of all mystery and poetry, without which Mrs. Clarkson becomes nothing better than an ordinary adventuress. Another, and more interesting, revival here is Scribe's Bertrand et Raton; ou, l'Art de Conspirer. As this once famous play has not been performed for many years, we will just remind our readers that the scene is laid in Denmark in 1772; and that the conspiracy, which begins in the first act and ends in the last, is an attempt to overthrow Struensee, the Court physician, whose sudden accession to power and place by favour of the Queen is one of the unsolved problems of history. The play—like most of M. Scribe's productions—is extremely ingenious, but lacks reality, and the dialogue is stilted and old-fashioned. Struensee, like Queen Elizabeth in The Critic, is perpetually talked about, but never brought on to the stage; and the persons who are plotting his overthrow are, with one exception, no better than puppets, in whose fortunes it is impossible to feel the faintest interest. That one exception is Bertrand de Rantzau, who was understood, when the play was originally produced, to be intended to represent M. de Talleyrand. He is a real person, with all the finesse and readiness of resource with which his eminent prototype has been credited. The part was "created," as the phrase is, by M. Samson; but, great as he is said to have been, we are convinced that he could not have been superior to M. Thiron. Even his talent, however, fails to make the revival a success, and the play will shortly be withdrawn, or given only at rare intervals. Another interesting experiment at this theatre is the début of a pupil of M. Delaunay, Mlle. Marsy, who has lately won a premier prix de comédie at the Conservatoire. She has appeared as yet in only two parts—Célimène in the Misanthrope, and Suzanne in Le Mariage de Figaro. Both of these characters are difficult, and both are associated with the recollection of celebrated actresses; but Mlle. Marsy has been so distinctly successful in them, and gives such promise of future excellence, that confident hopes are entertained that a star of the first magnitude has risen on the dramatic horizon.

The enterprising managers of the Théâtre de l'Odéon, not having any new piece ready to succeed Severo Torelli, or perhaps thinking that it would be a waste of good material to produce one so late in the season, have followed in the steps of the Maison de Molière; but with this difference, that, whereas M. Perrin has been careful to revive only those plays which are tolerably sure to be successful, MM. de la Rounat and Porel have ventured on the boldest of bold experiments, and have revived the powerful, but gloomy, and, it must be admitted, repulsive play by M. Alexandre Dumas, Antony. It no doubt offers all but irresistible attractions to a manager in distress; for it not only possesses great literary merit, but at its production took the town by storm, and has since come to be regarded as a sort of standard and type of the Romantic school. It is by no means certain, however, that the success of 1831 will be repeated in 1884. A drama dashed off at fever heat, in which the passionate enthusiasm of a time of great political excitement is reflected, or a comedy in which some passing folly of the day is satirized, must pass through several stages before it can obtain a permanent place among the immortals. At first it achieves a triumphant success; then it is laid aside, or, if revived, is listened to with languid interest by scanty audiences; and it is only after a long delay that it can hope to become part of the literature which is independent of time or place. Antony has passed through the two first stages; but we doubt whether it possesses sufficient vitality to enable it to enter upon the third.

It was one of the principles of the Romantic school that human passions are essentially the same in all ages and in all countries; and that therefore a tragedy of our own time might be made as impressive as a classical one. M. Dumas cleverly introduces an episodic personage into the fourth act of Antony, who explains these theories in the interval between two quadrilles; and the whole play is evidently intended to be an illustration of them. The hero is an orphan, the child of unknown parents, compelled by their sin to live a life of isolation, homeless and friendless. The stigma of his birth cannot be shaken off. The lady of his love is taken away from him and married to another. After an absence of three years he suddenly returns to Paris, more sombre and disdainful than ever, with a bitter rage against mankind in his heart. An accident throws him into the society of his former love, now become Mme. Adèle d'Hervey, and, impelled by an irresistible passion, he determines to possess her, though by so doing his own ruin and hers are sooner or later inevitable. Those who have even elementary ideas of right and wrong will recognize that a man who sins as Antony sinned is weakest at the very moment when he ought to be strongest; but the notion of facing a guilty passion and overcoming it was one which few of the Romantic school of 1830 could admit for a moment; and it must be confessed that Dumas has succeeded in throwing round his principal personage an air of destiny and fatality which goes far to palliate his crimes. Even the terrible third act, in which Antony pursues his victim, and compels her to become his mistress by a device which reduces him to the level of a common felon, though a piece of brutal realism which even M. Zola's most fervent disciples would shrink from exhibiting, is so cleverly managed that Antony still continues to fascinate us, though we may cease to sympathize with him. Dumas has declared that his piece is not immoral; and, so far as the exhibition of vice triumphant is followed by that of swift and sudden retribution, it must be allowed that he has proved his point. We are shown, in the first place, Mme. d'Hervey shunned by her former friends, and at last imploring death at the hand of her lover rather than meet her husband, who, when he bursts open the door of the room in which the guilty pair have awaited his arrival, finds Adèle dead, while Antony, to save her reputation, exclaims, "Elle me résistait, je l'ai assassinée!" From a dramatic point of view this catastrophe is one of the most effective ever imagined by a dramatist; and certainly, as the author carefully points out, it does something to raise the piece above the level of an ordinary tale of adultery and murder.

In this gloomy drama of illicit love the twelve supplementary personages whose names appear in the list of characters are merely introduced to serve as a background to Mme. d'Hervey and her lover. Yet such is the art with which M. Dumas has developed his story that there is not a dull moment in any one of the five short acts; while the nervous, passionate dialogue goes straight to the hearts of the spectators, and makes them pity where they ought undoubtedly to condemn.

The play was written in 1829, the principal character having been suggested, as the author confesses, by the Didier of M. Victor Hugo in Marion de Lorme. The idea of the catastrophe, he tells us, came suddenly into his mind one day as he was walking along the Boulevard, and the story was framed to lead up to it; but the real secret of its dramatic success is revealed by another admission which he makes. M. Dumas could never hold his tongue about what concerned himself, and he informs us that there were circumstances in his own life which bore a close resemblance to those of his fictitious personages, and that he found a relief from a great sorrow in expressing his own feelings through the mouth of Antony. The piece was accepted as soon as completed by the Comédie Française, and the two principal parts were entrusted to M. Firmin and Mlle. Mars, both of whom undertook them very unwillingly, but immediately afterwards the censure intervened, and the play was forbidden. Then came the Revolution of 1830, the censure was abolished, and the Comédie agreed to put the piece into rehearsal. If M. Dumas is to be believed, the two principal actors had never any serious intention of performing it; but they nevertheless learnt their parts, and even the day of the first representation was fixed. Then Mlle. Mars gravely informed the author that she could not think of performing her part on that day; that she had spent a large sum on her dresses; and that she had made up her mind to wait till there was a new chandelier, in order that they might be properly seen and appreciated by the public. "Thereupon," says M. Dumas, "I said 'Adieu, Madame,' took up my manuscript, and walked out of the theatre." He probably would not have acted with such decision had he not known that he would be welcomed on the stage of the Théâtre de la Porte St.-Martin, then the chosen home of the new dramatic school. He was careful, however, to secure his interpreters before he entered into business relations with the manager, and carried the play straight to Mme. Dorval. Their interview, which is described at length in a very curious and characteristic chapter of Mes Mémoires, was in every way satisfactory; and indeed, if M. Dumas has not sacrificed truth to effect in his narrative, the reading of the play must have been nearly as dramatic as the acting of it. Next day M. Bocage was secured for Antony, and lastly the manager, M. Crosnier, made no difficulty about the immediate performance of the work. The first representation, on May 3, 1831, was one of those extraordinary scenes of tumultuous enthusiasm which are almost incredible nowadays, but which were not rare at that period of excitement. The audience became more and more frantic as each act carried them step by step towards the catastrophe, which was received, says Dumas, with "such cries of terror, astonishment, and grief, that probably not one-third of the spectators could catch the last words"; and when the curtain had fallen the author was seized upon by his friends, who cut off the tails of his coat that they might carry them away as relics. If that was the temper of the spectators in a theatre on the Boulevards, no wonder that it was preferred by emotional writers to the frigid propriety which dominated the atmosphere in the Rue de Richelieu. Antony ran for a hundred nights—a most unusual length of time at that period—with undiminished popularity, and not long afterwards was transferred to the Odéon, where it was performed for thirty more.

On the first night of the revival the theatre was crammed to suffocation, and though the spectators did not attempt to imitate the behaviour of those who received the piece at its first production, they were evidently intensely interested. It was, however, the interest of curiosity, not of passion. They had come to see what manner of play had moved the Parisians fifty-three years ago, not to be carried away themselves. The critical element was of course largely represented; and possibly on future performances, especially at those given at popular prices, the public may be more demonstrative. The play was produced exactly as it may have been produced originally; the furniture and the dresses being careful reproductions of those in fashion in 1831. M. Paul Mounet looked as gloomy and fatal as an ideal Antony ought to look, and acted with much power and individuality. We are sorry that we cannot say as much in favour of Mlle. Tessandier, who was at best but a prosaic Adèle. She may possibly improve when she gets over the nervousness of representing a difficult character in a play which the actors probably regarded as a dangerous experiment; but she seemed to us to be sadly wanting in pathos, and phrases the rendering of which by Mme. Dorval has become historical, fell unnoticed from her lips. Even the famous "Mais je suis perdue, moi!" when she learns her husband's return, failed to make any impression on the audience. The rest of the characters, none of which, as we said above, are of any great importance, were all acted with propriety; and the young poet, Eugène d'Hervilly, was especially worthy of commendation.

POINT-BLANK RANGE.

AMONG the lessons of the short campaign in the Soudan, not the least important is that, however sudden and determined the rush, the difficulty of charging home through breech-loading fire to actual hand-to-hand combat is, if the riflemen are steady and resolute, almost insuperable. So far as the infantry were concerned, General Graham's battles of El Teb and Tamanieb afford good examples of the practical effect of modern rifle-fire at what is commonly called "point-blank range." Perhaps it may be well to determine as nearly as we can what this term means.

Into the origin of the combination of the two words point and blank we do not now mean to enter. We beg to commend the double term to the care of the compilers of the New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. If that useful work fulfils its promise, "Point-blank" is sure to be well treated in its proper place. Perhaps a connexion may be traced between the point-blank of curt refusal and the point-blank of a firearm. Anyhow, an English philologist may be trusted to do ample justice to a term which smacks so strongly of James's Naval History and Napier's Peninsular War. Perhaps we may be allowed to bring to the compiler's notice the story of the veteran Irish Fusilier who, being asked with reference to the battle of Barrosa what the meaning was of fighting at "point-blank range," replied, "Faith! it just manes that we never fired a shot till we could see the whites of the Frenchman's eyes." The story is an old one, but not altogether without point. Some years ago, General (then Colonel) Lefroy, of the Royal Artillery, proposed, apparently unsuccessfully, that the term "point-blank" should be discontinued. He contended that it was of no use, and without any practical meaning. Since that date it seems to have been a good deal misused, and to have fallen into partial disuse. In all probability men who wished to be exact avoided its use. Still in its own sphere it has held its own. It is one of those words that refuse, so to speak, to fall out. There is a sound of sharpness about it which makes it expressive in spite of its vagueness; at the same time it is vague enough to be used in a manner which is slipshod without being absolutely incorrect. When a word is down at heel, it is difficult to say whether it is a fitting one or not. The term is not, of course, a common one in the sense that it is in everybody's mouth; but by a certain set of persons it is used not uncommonly both in writing and conversation. We see it in the reports (lately, for the most part, exceedingly good ones) sent from the battle-field by the war correspondents. It is precisely defined in the Manual for the use of the Royal Artillery, 1881. It is quoted in the specifications of an "Express" rifle, and so on. But let a score or two of men—naval, military, big-game shooters, gunmakers, and others—who have used the term, or heard it used, from their youth up, be asked to write down what they conceive to be its meaning as generally understood. A few might declare there was no such thing; the minds of others would, if one may say so, be blank upon the point; of the remainder, one-half might be in practical agreement, while the answers of the rest would, we suspect, differ considerably. The reason of this is that the expression cannot be brought to book. Nowhere, so far as we know, can a good definition be found of "point-blank range" when used with reference to a small arm. Nor will the rifleman find much comfort if he hunts up the gunnery definition. He will not even have the satisfaction underlying disappointment when a covert has been drawn properly but blank. He will find certainly, but the thing found will be of the wrong sort, and not straightgoing. The sooner we run it to ground the better.

At page 129 of the Royal Artillery Manual, 1881, we find the following definition:—"Point-blank—A gun is laid point-blank when the line of sight is parallel to the axis. Point-blank range is due to the jump of the gun." This "jump," we may explain for the general reader, is caused by the recoil, and is in fact the lifting of the muzzle, relatively to the breech, at the instant that the shot leaves the bore. The result of the "jump" is a slightly increased elevation, and a corresponding increase in the range. The method of obtaining the point-blank range of a gun is as follows:—Let the axis of the bore be directed horizontally on a mark placed at a short distance from the muzzle, and at the same height as the axis from the ground. When the gun is fired, the shot, owing to the "jump," will strike above the point on which the axis is directed, whereas, if there were no "jump," the shot, owing to the force of gravity, would strike below the point. Then, if the point be taken back in the direction of the axis until the shot will exactly strike it, that distance—namely, from the muzzle to the point struck—is (in Royal Artillery parlance) the point-blank range of that particular gun. Now a rifle, unless it be held firmly in a fixed rest, jumps in a somewhat similar manner at the moment of explosion. It is also pretty certain that, in addition to the jump, a rifle-barrel "buckles," as it is called, when the bullet quits the bore, thus causing the muzzle to droop. The effect of the jumping of the whole arm tends to send the bullet high, and of the "buckling" of the barrel to send it low. But, since the amount of "jumping" and "buckling" varies a good deal with the way in which the rifle is held and rested at the moment of firing, it is evident that the point-blank range in the Artillery sense cannot reasonably be applied to the shooting of a small-arm. Nor, in fact, is it so applied. What a gunmaker or any one used to guns means by the point-blank range of a rifle will be presently considered. He certainly does not mean to refer to the measure of the effect, or of the mean joint effect, of the buckling and the jumping just mentioned. Here it may be noticed that several superior officers in our service who some years ago wrote with authority on gunnery matters are all silent about the jump of the gun. Their definitions, while agreeing with one another, do not correspond with the Artillery definition of to-day. The books we particularly allude to are Owen's Modern Artillery, 1871; General Sir Howard Douglas's Naval Gunnery, 1855, and the "Aide-Mémoire to the Military Sciences," written by the officers of the Royal Engineers (1847–1852). Colonel Owen's definition may stand fairly for the rest; it runs thus:—"The point-blank range of a gun is the range obtained by the first graze of the shot, when the piece placed on its carriage is fired with the service charge on a horizontal plane with no elevation: that is to say, when the gun is parallel to the plane." Point-blank range in this sense sounds rather vague, inasmuch as it depends on the height of the gun-carriage, which of course may vary; but no doubt the term represented roughly the relative power of a gun; there is nothing, however, to lead one to suppose that the expression referred in any way to the range due to the "jump" of the gun. For Colonel Owen's definition there is no French equivalent. The "portée de but en blanc" of the French service meant, and probably still means, much the same as our gunnery "line of metal range." In the "Manual of Naval Gunnery for Her Majesty's Fleet" there is, we believe, no mention of the terms "point-blank" and "point-blank range"; and in all probability most Royal Artillery officers would say that the terms, however precisely defined, are definitions merely, and of no practical use. We think that it would have been rather a good thing if Colonel Lefroy's advice to abolish the expression as a gunnery term had been definitely adopted. We have thought it better to try to clear the front of artillery before getting to point-blank range with the rifle.

If it is necessary in rifle-shooting to have a term at all to express what we believe the usual meaning of point-blank range to be, then that term is convenient enough and as good as any other. It is already recognized, and to a certain extent understood, in the gunmaking trade and in the forest, and to a less extent in the navy and army and among the Volunteers. If it were only definitely explained and more generally understood, it would have a much closer application and a much wider use. A somewhat rusty term would, in fact, become more useful with the using. Mr. Greener, in his excellent book, The Gun and its Development, 1881, mentions the point-blank range of a rifle as if everybody knew what it meant. It is certain that a great many of his readers, who are for the most part learners, could not say what it meant. Some expressions, like muzzle-velocity, explain themselves; but a conventional term (if that can be called conventional about which the agreement is both tacit and partial) should, if possible, be defined in a book which is full of special information. A definition, or an explanation amounting to definition, would have come very well in Mr. Greener's instructive chapter on sporting rifles. From time to time we have had the opportunity of talking to rifle-makers and deer-stalkers who were masters of their craft, and we believe that most of such would agree with the following explanation of point-blank range. The point-blank range of a rifle is the distance in yards measured from the muzzle to the mark throughout, and up to, which the bullet will strike the said mark when aim is taken straight at it with the lowest sight, called sometimes the fixed sight, and, not uncommonly, the "point-blank" sight. This, in as many words, is, we believe, the meaning as generally understood. Briefly—as to a boy who is a beginner—it might be said point-blank range is the distance, not only at which, but up to which, you will be well served by your lowest back-sight, if there is no fault behind the trigger. Point-blank range may be made more of by aiming a little higher or lower, thus humouring the curve, so to speak, according as the object is at the far limit of, or well within, the point-blank range. The longer the point-blank range, the less dependent is the firer on knowing the correct distance. The length of point-blank range depends chiefly on the flatness of the first part of the trajectory, and also on the size of the mark intended to be hit. A bullet, it need hardly be said, does not move in a straight line for any part of its flight; nor, beyond a few yards from the muzzle, will any rifle, however accurate, put shot after shot literally one on the top of the other. Some margin of mark, however small, must be presented to the trajectory, however slightly curved. The mark (in big-game shooting) is that vulnerable patch which, and which only, it is desired so earnestly to hit. This mark being a fixed quantity, the great endeavour must be to get a trajectory as flat as possible. Flatness of trajectory is the result of very high velocity, or, what is the same thing, of a very short "time of flight." The shorter the time of flight the less exposure is there of the bullet to the action of the force of gravity, which, as every one knows, acts in proportion to the squares of the times, and is the sole cause of the downward curve of the bullet. In order to get a very high velocity at short ranges (as with an "Express" rifle), a comparatively heavy powder charge is used with a comparatively light—generally a hollow—bullet. The effect is that the bullet is whipped up, so to speak, from the muzzle to the mark in the shortest possible time. On the other hand, a light "Express" bullet has, comparatively speaking, very little ranging power. This is easily shown by a few figures. Let a ·450-inch "Express" bullet and a ·450-inch Martini-Henry service bullet be started at the same instant from their respective rifles. We will assume that the "Express" bullet, weighing 270 grains, and fired with a powder charge of 130 grains, has, as is not unusual, a muzzle velocity of 1,764 feet per second, and that the service bullet, weighing 480 grains, and fired with the service charge of powder—viz. 85 grains—has a muzzle velocity of 1,315 feet per second. (The superiority in muzzle velocity is due to the comparatively heavy powder charge and comparatively light bullet.) But a light weight in this sort of race cannot stay. Weight tells from the first. The difference in velocity of about 450 feet per second at the muzzle is, at 100 yards from it, reduced to a difference of 200 feet per second. At 200 yards the difference is only 50 feet per second. At about 300 yards the "Express" bullet begins, in Turf talk, to come back to the Martini-Henry bullet, and just about 500 yards from the muzzles—and in as nearly as possible one and two-fifth seconds from the start—the comparatively heavy Martini bullet comes up to and passes the light one, the race being all over but shouting. From a game-killing point of view, a military rifle cannot be compared to an "Express" sporting rifle in the matter of flatness of trajectory at short ranges; but, in respect of fighting, the greater curve of the military rifle is to a certain extent compensated for by the larger mark afforded by the stature of an enemy standing or running at distances within 250 or 260 yards of the firer.

We notice that the term "point-blank" sight (but not point-blank range) is now introduced into the Musketry Regulations, 1884, just issued to the army. At p. 112 the soldier is instructed, when firing at the "figure" target at distances under 250 yards, to use the lowest, or "point-blank," sight, which, though nominally for 100 yards, does actually give elevation for 140 yards. Then the "figure"—aim being taken at its breast—is under the power of the rifle for 250 yards; in other words, it ought to be hit somewhere, either higher or lower, throughout the whole of that distance. This "figure" practice illustrates very well the meaning of the "point-blank range" of a military rifle. Conversely, the term is a convenient expression for the hitting power of a rifle under certain conditions within a limited distance. Though, as we have seen, the conditions vary as between a sporting and a military rifle, particularly in the height of the object, the principle is the same for both.

To try to explain a term that has a shifting and indefinite meaning is not, we have found, an altogether easy task. To define the term and procure its general recognition would in all probability be much more difficult. Still such an attempt, if the term is to be used at all, might at all events be made. A mixed jury of gunmakers, big-game shooters, and soldiers could possibly be got together (say at a Sportsman's Exhibition) to define—in a rifle-shooting sense—the meaning of the term point-blank range. If the jury were of the right sort, their definition would be sure to bear the stamp of authority.

BARNUM'S.

THERE are things so mighty, so awful, so truly gigantic that the mind of man shrinks before them and shrivels, and man himself must needs confess his utter nothingness. One of these things is Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth. Before this marvellous aggregation of wonders man stands aghast, and he begins to comprehend the unspeakable feelings of Coleridge before Mont Blanc and of the traveller silent upon a peak in Darien. As Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains, and as the Pacific is the vastest of oceans, so is Barnum's alone in its glory, supreme in its majesty, unapproachable in its might. For Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth is not one show only; it is now nine shows combined. It is the result of a union, a fusion, an amalgamation—perhaps, after all, an alliance is the better word—between Barnum's original show and another second only to it, and known in America as the Great London Circus and Sanger's Royal British Menagerie. The combination bears the exalted title of the Grand International Allied Shows. Having once swallowed the Great London Circus and Sanger's Royal British Menagerie, Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth developed a faculty of growth on its own account. Last year the huge entertainment it offered was said to be the result of a combination of Seven Shows. This spring the pointed advertisements and flamboyant posters declare that it now offers Nine United Monster Shows; thus following the precept and the practice of Mr. Barnum's famous French predecessor M. Nicolet, whose motto was always de plus fort en plus fort. It is to be noted, with proper awe and due respect for so great a mystery, that the performances of the Nine United Monster Shows do not last any longer this year than the performances of the simple Seven Shows last year. Next year there will probably be Eleven Shows in One, and the year after we may look for Thirteen Original Shows—E Pluribus Unum—with an apt allusion to the Thirteen Original States. But we venture to express a belief that, however many shows may finally get themselves together on Mr. Barnum's programme, the performance which begins at eight will be over by ten o'clock.

There can be no denying that Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth is emphatically a Big Thing, after the most approved manner of American Big Things. It is the largest of nomadic exhibitions; and we incline to believe that the announcement setting the daily expense of the Show at nearly 1,400*l.* is not quite as exaggerated as the picture which represents the lordly and lofty Jumbo holding up the telegraph-wires and with his elevated trunk taking the eleemosynary bun from the charitable fourth-story window. In New York the exhibitions of Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth are given in an enormous building which served formerly as the terminus of one of Mr. Vanderbilt's railways. A part of this building is screened off to contain the menageries and the living curiosities of all kinds. Two-thirds of it are given up to the circus, with seats arranged as in the Hippodrome in Paris, which Barnum's Own and Only Show on Earth resembles in size. Outside of New York there are two or three large tents for the animals, and savages and dwarfs and giants, and one enormous tent for the circus performances—a canvas tent as large as the iron building of the Hippodrome in Paris. In the centre of a building or a tent as vast as this, and capable of containing between five and ten thousand people, a single circus ring would make a mean and miserable appearance; therefore are there here side by side four circus rings, or rather three tan-bark rings and a wooden platform for bicycle riding, roller-skating, and so forth. In these three rings and on this stage sometimes as many as eight different performances are given simultaneously. Instead of a single manège or bareback act, there are three at once. Instead of a single trick-mule or trained horse, there are half-a-dozen comic donkeys in one ring, half-a-dozen educated ponies in another, and half-a-dozen Trained Ukraine Stallions in a third, all at the same time. This multiplication of blessings is indeed an embarras de richesses. It is impossible to see all that is set before you, and no matter how diligently you may have looked over the whole arena, or how much you may have been pleased with what you saw, you cannot help having an uncomfortable certainty that what you missed altogether was probably to the full as interesting, if not more so. This is most annoying, and makes a man feel that he has not had the worth of his money. And, moreover, it gives an unfair advantage to the man who squints, for he can benefit by his obliquity of vision, and take in at least two simultaneous sights, while the owner of normal eyes is confined to a single object. A Cyclops, could he be resuscitated long enough to sit through the two hours of Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth, would go mad with disgust and despair before the performance was half over; while Argus, if he were also recalled to life, would revel in his visual advantages. When the herd of eight huge elephants are giving proof of their quick intelligence and elaborate training in the ring on the extreme right, and a herd of eight small elephants are going through exercises very similar in the ring on the extreme left, it is altogether tolerable and not to be endured that the clown elephant, Tom Thumb, should be exhibited on the platform in the centre of the arena. To see all three things is absolutely hopeless, and to miss any one of the three is unspeakably annoying to any one with the old Roman and new American liking for Barnum et circenses.

It is thus that Mr. Barnum makes up his full tale of Nine United Monster Shows. There are Three Circuses in Three Rings; there are Two Menageries in Two Tents; there is One Museum of Living Curiosities; there is One Hippodrome with a half-mile track (this refers to the broad path surrounding the circus rings and used for chariot racing); there is One Elevated Stage (this is the platform slightly raised above the level of the circus rings); and there is One Ethnological Congress of Savage Tribes (this is Barnumese for two dozen or so of Sioux Indians, Zulus, Botocudos, and Nautch girls). The performance always begins with a procession around the outer track of the elephants (of which there are twenty or thirty), camels, giraffes, buffaloes, elks, and other animals, gaily caparisoned, while Cavaliers and Dames in flashing costumes are going through the intricate convolutions of the Grand Entrée in two or three of the inner circus rings. This Triumphal Pageant is really a very showy spectacle; it is truly a sight worth seeing. It is followed by a sight worth crossing the Atlantic to see, so delightful an instance is it of the great showman's knowledge of effect. After the Triumphal Pageant and Grand Entrée have taken their departure, the Star Elephants come forth. The Star Elephants are the two Baby Elephants and the great Jumbo. The only elephants ever born in captivity are in Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth, and they are most amusing little cusses, as A. Ward would say. Here is the great effect. Jumbo is not allowed to appear in the Triumphal Pageant with the vulgar herd of educated elephants; he is too great a creature. So when the track is empty, the younger Baby Elephant comes forth, a tiny beast; after him comes a Baby Elephant, a little older; after him comes the mother of one of the Baby Elephants, a beast of moderate size; and last of all comes the towering Jumbo, who looms up twice as large as life when seen in immediate contrast with the petty and pretty Baby Elephants. The same keen knowledge of effect has been shown in the exhibition of the more or less Sacred White Elephant. In the first place, the advertisements declare that the beast is exhibited to dispel for ever the illusion that the Sacred White Elephant was ever really white. In the second place, to accentuate the lightness of the beast, which, if not holy, has been at least holystoned, all the other elephants in Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth, from the innocent and frisky Baby Elephants to the high and mighty Jumbo, have been darkened; they have been washed with some sombre mixture, apparently of lamp-black. Thus it happens that, although the White Elephant may not be as white as he is painted, Jumbo and the other elephants are not as black as they are painted.

It is a thousand little artistic touches like this which makes Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth a pure joy and a well-spring of pleasure to the man of receptive mind and humorous capacity. The American appetite for humour is enormous, and Mr. Barnum is part of what Mr. Howells, speaking of Mark Twain, has happily called the "great American joke." Barnum's Own and Only Greatest Show on Earth is one of the best possible specimens in the concrete of the American humour which is much talked about and little understood. Mr. Barnum himself is the greatest Living Curiosity of his own Ethnological Congress. He does not expect to be taken seriously, and he is not taken seriously; but he gives a good show, and in America a man who gives a good show makes money.

CHARLES BADHAM.

THE news of the death at Sydney, New South Wales, of Dr. Charles Badham, will be read with regret by all lovers of classical scholarship, and with something more than regret by his old pupils and personal friends in this country. Well known as he was in certain circles, there were nevertheless reasons which prevented him from taking that high public position to which his many gifts entitled him. He was debarred from promotion in the Church of England by the fact of his holding opinions which were at any rate thirty years ago a very serious hindrance to preferment. Though he never, so far as we know, gave printed utterance to these opinions—having declined, in fact, to collaborate in the once famous Essays and Reviews—his habitual frankness and fearlessness of speech left no doubt in the minds of those who knew him as to what they were. And, though a great scholar, he cannot, notwithstanding years of experience, be said ever to have become a good schoolmaster. One faculty, indeed, of a great schoolmaster, and this the highest of all, he possessed to perfection. He was able to impart to his pupils the same zeal and enthusiasm for intellectual things which he himself felt. But he lacked the methodical and businesslike habits which the successful management of a large school requires. And, though the most warm-hearted and placable of men, he suffered from passing infirmities of temper which could not fail to some extent to impair his influence. He was still, at the age of fifty-four, master of a second-rate provincial school, when he was appointed to the Headship of Sydney University, a post with which were associated the Professorships of the Classical Languages and of Logic. This position he held for the last seventeen years of his life. Dr. Badham was the son of Mr. Charles Badham, once Professor of Physics at the University of Glasgow, and author of a book entitled Fish Tattle, which is still known to the curious. On his mother's side he was connected with the poet Campbell and with the present Professor Campbell whose services to Greek literature are well known. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, whence he afterwards migrated to Cambridge. After passing some years abroad, he became successively Head-Master of King Edward's School, Southampton, of the Grammar School at Louth, and of the Birmingham and Edgbaston Proprietary School. The latter post he held for about twelve years before his departure for Australia. We have indicated above two of the reasons which help to explain, though they do not justify, the fact that a man of his eminent gifts and learning should have been suffered to go into what he and his friends both felt to be exile.

At a time when his name was a passport into learned society in most European countries, he was able, in acknowledging the degree conferred upon him by the Senate of the University of Leyden, to write, with equal irony and pathos, as follows:—"Quantum enim numerum esse eorum oportet qui cum aliqua laude literas aut philosophiam coluerunt, si quidem in hac terra quæ tot et tam splendida præmia studiosis afferre dicitur, in qua Reginæ consiliarii, nobiles, episcopi, Academiæ, civitates, municipia suffragiis suis de virorum doctorum sorte decernunt, his tam diversis Mæcenatibus nihil indignum videtur me in ludo municipali elementa docentem consenescere. Nimirum omnia illa munera, in quibus aliquid otii ad has literas colendas habuissem, a dignioribus occupata sunt. Quod si vobis minus verum videtur, ne tamen mea causa indignemini. . . . Mea autem incommoda jamdiu patienter ferre didici, et eorum placita et decreta, quibus huc detrusus sum, non sine aliqua hilaritate contemnere." It is not a fact to be proud of, that genius and learning should have found a welcome in the centre of the hardware industry which was denied to them in what Dr. Badham speaks of as the "antiquis scientiæ sedibus, ut vocantur." It may be hoped that, had he been born a generation later, he would have met with worthier treatment.

The pressure of school work, acting on a constitution by no means strong, left him comparatively little time for the work nearest his heart. He is known as a writer principally by his editions of several Greek dramas, of which one in particular, the Ion of Euripides, is intended as the student's "first Greek play," a purpose which it admirably serves; by his editions of the Philebus of Plato, and by his editions of the Euthydemus, Laches, and Symposium. The latter are prefaced by lengthy discussions on various questions of scholarship. Dr. Badham, in common with his eminent friend Professor Cobet of Leyden, treated the received text of Greek authors with less respect than is usual in this country or in Germany. A wide and close study of Greek manuscripts, large numbers of which he photographed, led him to the conclusion that corruptions in the text were much more largely due to the mere ignorance or carelessness or stupidity of the scribe than is commonly thought to be the case; and that an emendation which at once restores to the passage the required sense and explains the transcriber's blunder is more than an "ingenious conjecture," and is, in fact, a scientific certainty. He always repudiated the charge that there was anything arbitrary or fanciful in his method. The only difference, in fact, between him and his critics in this respect was that he applied the method much more freely than they, and was not easily tempted, as in his opinion they often were, to justify one corrupt passage by another. His memory was marvellous. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that he knew all Greek poetry by heart. He constantly taught his pupils with no book before him; and, if they misread a single word, would correct them. He had an almost equal mastery over Latin, English, French, and Italian literature, and was well read in German; and, through his habit of constantly illustrating one author by another, and one literature by another, he taught his pupils to look on letters as a whole. In Sydney, notwithstanding his inevitable sense of expatriation, and notwithstanding the comparatively unprepared state in which students come to the University, he probably found the most favourable sphere of work which fell to his lot throughout his life. His influence there was wide and strong in favour of intellectual culture. A few years ago he succeeded in raising ten thousand pounds in the colony to be devoted to founding exhibitions at the University. One of his earliest enterprises after his arrival in New South Wales was, in order to meet the desire for knowledge of persons living in the outlying parts of the colony, to establish a system of teaching by correspondence. He was an admirable talker, and, unlike many good talkers, knew also how to listen to others; and many of his friends will agree that he was the best companion they have ever known. By the colony at large, as well as by those who knew him personally in Europe and Australia, his loss will be long and deeply felt.

PROGRAMMES AND CONCERTS.

THE Richter Concerts have become an institution. They date from but four or five years back, and without them the musical season would already seem quite other than itself. This is as it should be. Herr Richter is an extraordinarily strong conductor; and while it is a standing cause for regret that we cannot see him in command of that permanent orchestra which the richest city in the world should possess, still, as half a loaf is better than no bread, Herr Richter for eight or nine weeks in the year is very much better than no Herr Richter at all. There are many, it is true, who prefer to him both M. Lamoureux and M. Colonne. But MM. Colonne and Lamoureux choose to stay where they are. To hear them, the one in Berlioz and the other in Beethoven, one must needs go to Paris; and in London the supremacy of the Viennese artist remains unchallenged. Herr Richter has tact, energy, decision, the instinct and the habit of command; and he has, what is rarest of all, the capacity of imposing his own volition on a multitude of executants, and of so informing them with his own vigorous personality as to make them practically one with himself, the creatures of his will, and the instrument of his expression. This is the true conductor, under whom, as has been said, an orchestra moves and works "with the unity of purpose and sentiment of a single perfect organism." And that this is Herr Richter none, we take it, who has heard him at his best—in the third Leonora overture, for instance, or in certain passages of Wagner—will hesitate one moment to agree.

Against all this it has to be admitted that, in the matter of his programmes, Herr Richter labours under certain limitations. His announcements for the coming season are characteristic. Beethoven, to whom he has hitherto been admirably loyal, is represented by five or six works only; the Third, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Symphonies, and the Egmont overture. Mozart appears as the author of a single symphony and an overture—that to the Zauberflöte, to wit. Of the five-score symphonies which Haydn left we are promised a solitary one; Weber stands out as the musician of a couple of overtures—that to Oberon and that to The Ruler of the Spirits; Mendelssohn is down for a symphony—the Italian; while Bach, Gluck, and Handel are simply ignored, as also are Glinka and Schubert, are Spontini and Cherubini, are Reyer and Stanford and Saint-Saens. Of Liszt, however, we are to hear the third Hungarian Rhapsody and the Mephisto Walzer; of Raff, the Roméo et Juliette overture; of Brahms, the Schicksalslied, the Gesang der Parzen, and the Third Symphony—the last an absolute novelty. Then we are promised the ballet music from Mr. Mackenzie's Colomba; Marschner contributes his Hans Heiling overture, Volkmann his overture to Richard III., Méhul (the representative of ancient music) his overture to Le Jeune Henri, and Schumann his Third Symphony; while Berlioz, hitherto as good as ignored at these concerts, but in England, for all that, in some ways the most popular of modern musicians, is brought forward as the author of the Fantastique and of a selection from the Roméo et Juliette. Of Wagner there is, of course, an abundance. In the programme at present under consideration there is more of him than of anybody else. He is represented by the Faust overture; by excerpts, vocal and orchestral, from the Parsifal; by a couple of numbers from the Götterdämmerung; by the "Liebesduett" from the Walküre; and by the "Trauermarsch," the "Siegfried's Tod," as well. If we add that, in addition to all these, the Huldigungsmarsch was given at the first concert of the series, and that in the same way we may be favoured with numbers also unannounced and unexpected, we shall have said enough.

A programme of this quality leaves much to be desired. An agreeable and instructive contrast is afforded by the announcements made, and fulfilled, by Mr. Manns for his last series of concerts with the Glasgow Choral Union. Glasgow is Glasgow, and London is London; but the advantage remains with Glasgow. From Mr. Manns's programmes, as from Herr Richter's, Bach is conspicuously absent; Haydn is only represented in them by a single movement —the Adagio in B flat, for strings—and Mozart by a single symphony, the "Emperor"; while of Beethoven Mr. Manns only produced the first and fourth concertos for piano and orchestra, the Violin Concerto in D, the Coriolanus overture, and the Third and Sixth Symphonies. From Gluck, however, he conducted a portion of the ballet music of Orfeo; from Mendelssohn the First Walpurgis Night, the Italian Symphony, and the Violin Concerto in E minor; from Handel the Acis and Galatea and the Messiah: from Berlioz the Messe des Morts, the Fantastique, the Carnival Romain and King Lear overtures, and the Queen Mab scherzo. He produced Gounod's Redemption, Félicien David's half-forgotten "Ode symphonique," Le Désert, and Mr. Mackenzie's orchestral ballade, La Belle Dame sans Merci. He threw in symphonies by Schubert, Schumann, and Sterndale Bennett; overtures by Wagner, Rossini, Brahms, Weber, and Cherubini; concertos by Chopin and Piatti. He presented his public with serenades by Mr. Villiers Stanford and Mr. Allan Macbeth; with orchestral numbers by Ponchielli, Sullivan, Raff, and Cherubini; with Mr. Cowen's suite, In the Olden Time, with the ballet music from Délibes's Coppélia, with one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, and with three of Wagner's preludes. It will be seen that in the matter of Brahms and Beethoven Herr Richter has the advantage of Mr. Manns. It will be generally admitted, we think, that in every other respect Mr. Manns, working for a provincial audience, has the advantage of Herr Richter, working for musical and fashionable London.

The first concert of the season (principally composed of Wagner and Liszt, but rounded off with a symphony of Beethoven's) was played to an audience comparatively thin and small. The first three numbers were all Wagnerian. Herr Richter began with the Huldigungsmarsch, the motives of which are a little trivial, but the craftsmanship of which is very brilliant and taking. It was admirably played and realized, and after it the Faust overture of the master produced an effect of anti-climax. This curious work was composed in Paris in 1840, and rewritten at Zurich in 1855; it is prefaced by a passage from Goethe's Faust to the effect that, for certain reasons, existence is burdensome, "and death desirable, and life detested"; it has nothing whatever to do with Mephistopheles and Gretchen, but is merely, says the analytical programme, "a Stimmungsbild—i.e. a musical portrayal of feeling"; in a word, it is Wagner's commentary on what he suffered in France as a failure and in Switzerland as an exile. It consists of two movements. The first—described as "sehr gehalten"—is finely scored, and is in itself romantic and impressive enough; the second—"sehr bewegt"—is mannered, pretentious, and—to the uninitiate, at least—dull. It was followed by the "Vorspiel" to Parsifal, of which we gave a full account some time ago. It is of course less effective in the concert-room than on the stage.

The first part of the first concert was concluded by a magnificent performance of Liszt's third "Hungarian Rhapsody," a little masterpiece of orchestration and arrangement. The second part consisted of the Third Symphony of Beethoven, the immortal "Eroica." In the first movement, on some points of which, as it seemed to us, Herr Richter has adopted a new reading, the tempi were at times a little dragged. The second movement, however, the tremendous "Marcia Funebre," was better and more impressive than we ever remember to have heard it; while the two last, save for a little weakness in the horns on their entry in the Trio, were, to say the least, quite admirably done. Coming last in the programme, the symphony appeared to absolute advantage. Certainly there is no such foil for the music of the present as is afforded by the music of the future.

The fourth and last concert this season of Mr. Willing's Choir was given at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, when Mr. Cellier's interpretation of Gray's Elegy and Mr. Wilfred Bendall's Parizadeh were performed, the latter for the first time. In the rendering of Mr. Cellier's cantata the Choir showed a decided advance, compared with last season, towards the attainment of those higher qualities of execution which can only be evolved by assiduous rehearsal and the utmost vigilance of the conductor. Mr. Willing's Choir is yet in its infancy, and has much to master before it can compete with older choral associations; its excellent performance, however, on Tuesday merits recognition; the admirable attack, effect, and general precision with which the choruses of both cantatas were given being clearly the result of frequent rehearsal and sound conductorship. If any fault may be found in the distribution of the Choir, it could be traced to an occasional want of power and unity among the tenors. Mr. Cellier's clever and effective setting of Gray's Elegy was much criticised on its production at Leeds last October, on the ground of its undramatic treatment, an objection that would have more weight if there were any inflexible canon which ordains that the cantata must be a dramatic composition. Cantatas that profess to illustrate dramatic subjects and fail to present them dramatically justly incur censure; but Gray's poem is not only undramatic in character, but unlyrical in form, and the strongest objection to Mr. Cellier's composition lies in his choice of theme. A series of moral reflections among the tombs, varied only by a few rustic pictures coloured by the meditative strain of poetry, certainly offer little to the composer; there are neither persons to be represented by the vocal parts nor incidents to be depicted. There is, however, a wide range of treatment in modern cantatas, extending from the more dramatic examples which approach the oratorio to works like Mr. Cellier's, where dialogue is dispensed with, and the composer supplies the lack of dramatic characters by an arbitrary division of the poem among the various singers. The propriety of assigning to a chorus any portion of a monologue which is so peculiarly unisonal in expression as Gray's Elegy is very doubtful; our chief concern, however, is not whether Mr. Cellier has achieved the almost impossible task of giving a dramatic setting to a subject essentially undramatic, but to consider how far his music reflects the beauty and truth of the poem. The opening chorus, "The curfew tolls," presents the visual scene with most literal fidelity; but it has the effect of a painted landscape denuded of poetic inspiration; it possesses the semblance, but not the significance, of the original. A similar failure of inspiration is felt in the recitative and air, "Can storied urn?" and in the quartet, "For who to dumb forgetfulness a prey," which, though skilfully scored, possess merely a superficial beauty. With these exceptions, Mr. Cellier's music illustrates the text successfully, and sometimes with distinct felicity. His spiritual insight and grasp of subject are very impressive in the exquisite soprano solo and chorus "Full many a gem," in the tenor solo "Some village Hampden," and in the quartet and chorus "The boast of Heraldry." The solo parts were most efficiently sustained by Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss Mary Beare, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frederic King.

The performance of Gray's Elegy was followed by Mr. Bendall's Parizadeh, the pianoforte score of which we noticed last week. The metrical version of Mr. Bendall's cantata is a little bald and prosaic, but it has not proved an obstacle to the composition of music which is not only full of promise for the future, but contains several numbers instinct with expressive fancy and delicate melody. Among the most attractive of these are the chorus "The sun sinks low," the song "Not with loose or evil heart," the effective chorus of Peris "We sink with the dew," and the dance of Bayadères; the first duet is somewhat deficient in the fervour and piquancy that the situation demands, and Mr. Bendall's instrumentation is too uniformly unsubstantial, even when the ethereal nature of his theme is considered. In this fresh essay in dramatic composition the composer has exercised great discretion in avoiding an exacting subject and choosing one which his present experience, as well as his undoubted talent, justified him in undertaking. The solos, entrusted to Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Mr. Frederic King, were excellently rendered.

The programme of Mme. Liebhart's concert at St. James's Hall last Tuesday was too long and comprehensive for possible fulfilment. Even with the inevitable curtailment the most experienced concert-goer must have felt it trying to have the sweet continuity of song interrupted by a musical sketch and a recital, though given by Mr. Grossmith and Miss Minnie Bell. Nothing more varied than the programme could well be conceived; almost every species of ballad and aria being represented, besides the addition of instrumental performances by M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Signor Erba, the violinist, and Mr. Ganz. A new ballad, by Mr. G. B. Allen, afforded Mme. Liebhart the opportunity of displaying her executive skill with much of her old charm and facility. M. Vladimir de Pachmann's playing of Liszt's arrangement of "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" and Weber's "Rondeau brillant" was distinguished by all the excellence of his style, his charm of touch, and finished execution. In his rendering of the G minor Nocturne of Chopin—the most profound and subtle of the series—his expression scarcely sounded the depths of that most pathetic composition, though otherwise his playing was faultless. Mme. Marie Roze was recalled for her brilliant singing of an uninteresting aria by Poniatowski, and sang "Coming thro' the rye" with a humour and vivacity that lent additional charm to the old ballad.

RACING AT NEWMARKET AND EPSOM.

THE opening of the Newmarket racing season was far from brilliant, but the Crawfurd Plate gave it a fresh interest. Twenty-one horses came out to compete for this new race. The victory of The Prince was very unexpected, and he started at the long odds of 20 to 1. Much had been expected of this horse on many occasions, but he had so often disappointed the larger proportion of his backers that they had long since discarded him, yet now he galloped in an easy winner with many pounds in hand. His victory was such a surprise that it may be worth while to take a glance at his past history. As a two-year-old he was unplaced three times, and he ran second once. He won one race, and that happened to be a very valuable one; but the horses which he then defeated were but a moderate lot. In the early spring of the following year he won the Newmarket Biennial at the Craven Meeting; but he only beat Grandmaster by a head. In this race Ossian, the subsequent winner of the St. Leger, was unplaced. A few weeks later he was only beaten a neck by Galliard, and a head by Goldfield, for the Two Thousand. Here appeared to be public form sufficient to give him a chance for the Derby, if, as was believed by certain good judges, he could be made a few pounds better by the Epsom Meeting. A gentleman who apparently held this opinion gave 10,000*l.* for him, and he started for last year's Derby at 5 to 1, but he was unplaced in that race. For the St. Leger he started at 10 to 1, and again he failed to get a place. In his next race he was a bad third to Ossian. As much as 200 to 1 was laid against him at the start for the Cambridgeshire, and again he ran nowhere. This spring his first appearance was in the race for the Lincolnshire Handicap, in which he received a most ignominious beating. In the Crawfurd Plate he was giving weight to eighteen of his opponents, but he was receiving 15 lbs. more than weight for age from Geheimniss, and 4 lbs. from Energy. In spite of the weight she had to carry, Geheimniss was the first favourite, and, with The Prince out of the way, she would have won easily, as she finished nearly five lengths in front of everything else, but she was fully that distance behind The Prince. Looking back on the racing career of The Prince, one may be inclined to consider it unsatisfactory and unfortunate, yet the horse has won nearly 3,000*l.* in stakes, and if 100*l.* had been put upon him for every race for which he started, there would be a balance in his favour of more than 2,000*l.*, although he lost ten races and won only three. The victory of Mr. Houldsworth's Royal Fern in the Biennial Stakes, and that of Mr. Foy's Scot Free in the Craven Stakes, are matters which will come in for their share of attention in our notice of the Two Thousand, as they may be said to form part of the story of that race; but we may make some reference here to the success of Lucy Ashton II. in the Two-Year-Old Plate. This filly is very much inbred to Bay Middleton and Touchstone, having three separate strains of the blood of the last-named horse in her veins and two of the former, and she is by the little-known stallion Lammermoor. She is a mere thoroughbred pony, standing about fourteen hands and two inches only. Her first race was for the Brocklesby Stakes at Lincoln, in which she defeated nineteen opponents, and her second was for the Two-Year-Old Plate at the Craven Meeting. In the latter race she met a field of eight, and again she was successful. Both races were hardly earned, and perhaps it can scarcely be expected that she should continue her victorious career; but it is wonderful that such an undersized filly should have won more than 1,000*l.* in stakes for her owner by the middle of April, and she affords another instance of the success which occasionally attends inbreeding.

At the Epsom Spring Meeting backers met with a serious disappointment in the race for the Great Metropolitan Stakes. The Duke of Hamilton's Loch Ranza, a three-year-old that had won the Northamptonshire Stakes, was backed as if he could not lose; but he never appeared to run kindly over the twisting and awkward Metropolitan Course; and, although he came with a wonderful rush at the end, he made his effort too late, and was beaten by three-quarters of a length. The race lay between two other three-year-olds, Zadig and See See, neither of whom had won a race before, and the former won by a head.

For some time before the race for the City and Suburban Handicap the chief interest lay in the question whether the winner of last year's Derby would be able to win under the weight allotted to him. He was handicapped at 8 st. 12 lbs.; but that was 2 lbs. less than the weight carried by Bend Or when he won the City and Suburban the year after he had won the Derby. It is natural enough that a horse which likes the Derby course should run well for the City and Suburban; but it does not follow that, because one winner of the Derby has won the City and Suburban, another will. Opinions varied about St. Blaise's Derby; but it was very commonly believed that it had been to some extent a fluky one. Good excuses could be made for his two subsequent defeats, on the ground of his sea voyages; but his previous failure in the Two Thousand remained to be accounted for. His backers comforted themselves with the reflection that Sefton, as well as Bend Or, had proved that a Derby horse should win a City and Suburban, although in his case the latter race had preceded the former, and he had won under an exceptionally light weight. But they overlooked the fact that their arguments told far more in favour of another horse that had shown a liking for the Derby course. Lord Bradford's Quicklime had run within three-quarters of a length of Shotover for the Derby, and he had won the Epsom Grand Prize over the same course. Now St. Blaise was to give this horse a stone and a half, or, at weight for age, an advantage of 25 lbs. Until he was within a quarter of a mile of the winning-post, St. Blaise ran very well, and Archer followed the example set by Wood, when he rode the horse in the Derby, of "hugging the rails"; but when the real struggle began, St. Blaise gave way to a number of his opponents, and the race was won by Quicklime, against whom as much as 20 to 1 had been laid at the start. This horse deserves every credit for his victory, but the real honours of the race were earned by Thebais, who gave Quicklime two stone with the exception of one pound, and ran within half a length of him. As Thebais had won the Oaks, she afforded another instance of the wisdom of selecting Epsom winners for Epsom races.

THEATRICAL MATTERS.

GOOD taste should have forbidden the introduction of so nauseous a play as The Ironmaster, which, thanks to a use of the French dictionary that seems to have been rather industrious than discriminating, Mr. Pinero has been enabled to adapt for the St. James's Theatre from M. Ohnet's Le Maître de Forges. A story worse flavoured and more completely unsympathetic has rarely been put forward. We are in no way straitlaced, and by no means demand that the tragedy and comedy of human passion, as set forth on the stage, should be limited by a stern observance of the moral law; but there is to us something in the highest degree offensive about these intimate details of the terms on which a man lives with his wife. The St. James's Theatre is one of the last in London at which such a play was to have been expected. In a recent number of the National Review Mr. Alfred Austin revealed to the world the principles on which Mr. and Mrs. Kendal conducted their dramatic enterprise. They thought, Mr. Austin told us, that only husband and wife should play lovers. To prevent the entrance of an unlicensed thought into the mind of the Romeo he must be married—by a bishop if possible—to the Juliet; and if the marriage certificate were kept framed and glazed in the box-office, it seems to have been felt that a comfortable assurance would be experienced by ladies and gentlemen who went to book their seats for the performance. Mr. Austin did not quite say that, but it was, if we are not mistaken, the general tenor of his article; yet it is at the St. James's Theatre that The Ironmaster is produced. What class of spectators it is sought to attract by the story of this unwomanly woman and unmanly man it would be difficult to say. The play is very much too dull for the class that finds delight in the intrigues and innuendo of Palais-Royal farces, and it is certainly a play to which many men would rather not take the ladies of their family, especially as the men themselves would have a very tedious evening. In order to justify these strictures, it may be briefly said for the information—assuredly not for the edification—of those who do not know M. Ohnet's work that the principal personage in the plot is a young lady named Claire de Beaupré, who has been jilted by the Duc de Bligny. She is beloved by a wealthy Ironmaster, one Derblay, whose chances of success are infinitesimal until the engagement of the Duc, from mercenary motives, to Athénaïs, the daughter of a rich chocolate-maker named Moulinet. For purely theatrical reasons the Duc appears in the Château de Beaupré, the last place where one would have thought to find him, and introduces Athénaïs as his intended wife; to which Claire, who has given Derblay a hint that he will be accepted, responds by introducing the Ironmaster as her intended husband. For no comprehensible reason, except that it adds to the suggestiveness of the scene which is to follow, Claire insists upon being married at midnight. The marriage takes place, the guests depart, bride and bridegroom are left alone. We may have missed the reason why all this takes place at dead of night; if it be other than the unworthy one hinted at, we can only apologize for our denseness. Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, who play Derblay and Claire, are, it will be seen, strictly within the canons of morality in so far as that they, having been lovers in the story and being now married, are married in their own proper persons. This gratifying reflection apart, there is little to gratify in the proceedings of M. and Mme. Derblay. To many persons it will seem that there is, on the contrary, much to disgust in these revelations of the secrets of the nuptial chamber. Derblay goes to embrace his wife. She shrinks from and repulses him; and it seems that she has been to the altar, with a man who is devoted to her, simply because she was disinclined to appear what Mr. Pinero, by the aid of the dictionary aforesaid, has made out to be an "abandoned woman." Is it possible for any section of a decent audience to sympathize with such a vilely selfish woman as this? Derblay is given to understand that he has been cheated. His wife is no wife. She has married him to soothe her despicable vanity. He is alternately tearful and furious—in a somewhat hysterical manner, which suggests that Mr. Kendal may have been to Paris and studied the "business" of M. Damala at the Gymnase. One gesture, that of rushing forward with upraised hands as if to strike the woman who has so basely deceived him, is peculiarly French in conception and execution. The character being a Frenchman, it might be urged that this is appropriate enough; only it looks awkward when done by a Frenchman who is speaking English, and otherwise, for the most part, comporting himself like an Englishman. There is no dignity in Derblay's grief, nor any reality in his passion. The Claire looks cold and statuesque, with a hard-set, pale face, and all this is well enough, if anything about such a scene at an English theatre can be called well. In Mr. Austin's article he dwelt, with a courage we dare not imitate, upon the very delicate question of Mrs. Kendal's suitability for the parts of youthful heroines. It is, however, impossible not to note that the Claire of the St. James's Theatre scarcely suggests the girl who has only been away from school for a few months. This will particularly strike those who have seen Mme. Hading in Paris; but it is a matter which must be lightly passed over here. We are inclined, indeed, to pass as lightly as possible, and as speedily, over the rest of this repulsive drama. Derblay informs the wife who rejects him that the day will come when she will plead to him for love and he will reject her. It does come, after some perilous flirtations between these ill-assorted couples; for De Bligny pays marked attention to Mme. Derblay, and the Ironmaster flirts with the Duchess—or, to be more accurate, she flirts with him. It is an odd regulation in that code of morality which Mr. Austin so considerately made plain that, whereas lovers must only be played by husbands and wives, flirtations with dangerous intentions may be represented by actors and actresses who, away from the theatre, have not the sanction of the Church for their intimacy. It seems to us—but perhaps we, in our grosser nature, do not rightly understand the code—that it would be better for the unmarried actor and actress to play at being honest lovers than dishonest ones. A duel between the husbands, in which the lady who has been engaged to both is wounded as she rushes between them, is an incident which it takes the last two acts to bring about. For the rest, Mr. J. F. Young shows some humour, marred by exaggeration, as Moulinet; Mr. Alexander plays with much freshness and sincerity as Claire's brother; Mr. Hawley acts adroitly as the Duc; Miss Vane, a newcomer, gives point and emphasis to the part of Athénaïs; and useful assistance is afforded by Miss Linda Dietz, Mrs. Gaston Murray, Miss Webster, Mr. Maclean, and Mr. Waring. We can only regret that their ability should be wasted on a play which can give no wholesome gratification to any spectator.

Mr. Bancroft's advertisement with reference to the coming production of The Rivals is amusingly impertinent. There is often a naïveté about his confidential announcements to his audiences. It was he, we believe, who invented the idea of printing on the programmes of his theatre requests that visitors would be seated by a certain hour, as also that they would keep their seats till the fall of the curtain, "as the interest was sustained to the end of the play." There is something deliciously funny about the latter statement; which omits all consideration of the circumstance that the audience may not have felt interest at any period of the play's development. With regard to the managerial instruction to arrive at a certain hour, again, there would be right and reason on the manager's side if he gave away his seats and made punctuality a condition of the gift. But the ceremony of going to the theatre or to a library, and paying half a sovereign for the lease of a seat during the evening, puts the visitor on a somewhat different footing. A gentleman will naturally endeavour to avoid the necessity of passing down a crowded row of stalls, and so inconveniencing and distracting the attention of their occupants; but he will do this because he is a gentleman, and not in obedience to managerial direction. We have lost sight, however, of the advertisement of The Rivals, which states that, in submitting a performance of Sheridan's comedy for public approval, the management is actuated by "a desire to heighten the effect of the author's play without encumbering its action." This is suggestive of that great dramatist Ravenscroft's description of his own relations to Shakspeare:—

> So far was he from robbing him of's treasure,
> That he did add His own to make full measure.

But Mr. Bancroft's desire is more ambitious than praiseworthy. No sensible person wants to see the effect of Sheridan's plays "heightened." If Mr. Bancroft can succeed in preserving the effect, he will have done exceedingly well. The effect of The Rivals, adequately interpreted, is ample without any heightening. "While strictly preserving the text," the advertisement continues, "it has been found possible, by means of a few transpositions in the dialogue and some variation in locality, to avoid shifting the scenes in view of the audience. For this arrangement of the comedy Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero are jointly responsible." It is very good of Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero thus to exploit the possibilities of Sheridan's play. One can only regret that Sheridan is unable to acknowledge their endeavour to heighten his effects, and show him what he might have done with the piece if he had only understood his business as a dramatist. What overwhelming objections there are to "shifting the scenes in view of the audience," Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Pinero omit to state. Why should not scenes be so shifted? Poor Sheridan, with that lack of knowledge which, in the opinion of the Haymarket management, prevented him from seeing how to write comedy, found the shifting of scenes necessary to the development of his story. Is it not just possible that he was as sound a judge of how The Rivals might be made effective as Mr. Bancroft or Mr. Pinero? We are perhaps old-fashioned, but we are well content with Sheridan's Rivals, and do not want a new version by Messrs. Sheridan, Bancroft, and Pinero.

It is not often that it falls to our lot to be able, both from opportunity and from opinion, to speak in terms of high praise of a provincial performance. The company, however, which is taking Fedora round the country under the management of Miss Laura Villiers affords a striking proof that, in spite of the abolition of stock companies and the introduction of what the Americans call combinations, the supply of dramatic talent in England is just now very far from being at a low ebb. The piece is capitally played all round, and in the case of the two principal parts, Fedora and Ipanoff, and especially, it may be said, of Ipanoff, which is possibly the stronger part, it is given with singular passion and truth. No actor who has undertaken the part in England has approached Mr. Arthur Dacre in fervour and in control, and the great scene in the last act between Miss Villiers and him, in which both players are at their best, is as moving a thing as we have seen for a long time. It is gratifying to find that among our younger actresses there is one so thoroughly qualified as is Miss Villiers to take a leading place in London. As has been hinted, the play is well given all round; but, among the smaller parts, very special praise is due to Mr. Gilbert Farquhar's admirably studied and executed performance of Dr. Loreck, and to Mr. Denison's natural and pleasing Siriex. Mr. Girardot, a clever actor, whom we have before now had occasion to praise, would do well to leave out the senseless gag which he introduces in the part of Lasinski, especially as it is a gross blunder for him alone among a party of French people to speak in French.

The death of Mrs. Alfred Wigan, who for so long a time held a leading position on the stage, must not be passed without notice. Forty years since Mrs. Wigan was a favourite actress at the Lyceum Theatre, when the house over which tragedy in the person of Mr. Henry Irving now rules was given over to low comedy and the Keeleys. Mrs. Wigan made successes in many quarters, and from 1853 did a vast deal to establish the popularity of the Olympic, of which her husband had become manager. Those were the days of Adelphi guests who wore Berlin gloves, and, as they entered their host's apartment, were overwhelmed by its magnificence. Theatrical representations were marked by an amount of crudeness which offended Mrs. Wigan's sense of the fitness of things; and she strove with excellent results, which still endure, to make the detail of performances more true and life-like. She filled many parts, and in none that she made her own has she since been approached in the mixture of power and finesse which was displayed by what it is certainly not too much to call her genius. There will rise to the recollection of playgoers, amongst other parts, her Mrs. Sternhold, in Still Waters Run Deep, her Suzanne, in the second adaptation of Les Pattes de Mouches that found its way to England—the first was the work of Mr. Charles Mathews—her fine performance in The House and the Home, and her exquisitely comic creation of Miss Yellowleaf, in A Bengal Tiger.

Following hard on the death of Mrs. Alfred Wigan came that of the Comtesse de Voisins, better known to the world at large as Taglioni, probably the most beautiful dancer of modern times, the principal figure in the celebrated Pas de Quatre of the days when ballet, in the true sense of the word, still existed at the Italian Opera. In the case of Taglioni, even more than of Mrs. Wigan, no kind of successor has been found, for the public has taken too much to delighting in the mere gymnastics of the dance; and when a poetical dancer does appear among us (two such have appeared within the last ten years or so), it is from the few comparatively that she meets with due recognition.

THE COMING RUSSIAN LOAN.

THE financial embarrassments of the Russian Government have obliged it to make such concessions to Germany as have secured Prince Bismarck's good will; and it has been rewarded by promptly obtaining a loan of fifteen millions sterling. Since the close of the Russo-Turkish War, successive Russian Ministers of Finance have endeavoured in vain up till now to negotiate a large foreign loan. When their agents failed, they have themselves on more than one occasion visited Western Europe, and proposed terms to the great financial houses, but without success. At last the difficulties of the Treasury became so great that M. de Giers a few months ago visited Berlin, and made his peace with Prince Bismarck so completely that the Prince has allowed the Seehandlung Society, which is practically a department of the Ministry of Finance, to undertake the issue of the coming loan for Russia. The Russian Government, it is said, will not have to wait for the success of the issue, Herr Bleichröder having advanced the amount already. But, of course, the fact that the Seehandlung Society issues the loan is greatly in its favour. This Society has never before openly participated in the issue of a foreign loan, and that it has now been permitted to do so marks in a demonstrative form the desire of the German Government that the loan should be a success. In Germany and Holland the fact will have great weight. Already, indeed, Russia has reaped substantial benefit from her reconciliation with Germany. Her old Five per Cent. Loans have risen about ten per cent. on the Stock Exchanges of Europe, and the purchasing power of the rouble has also been considerably raised. What Russia has paid in return remains to be seen. Of course she must have given full assurance that the money, when obtained, will not be used against Germany or German interests; and doubtless Prince Bismarck has obtained other political advantages. Nor is it improbable that he may also get some economic advantages. The high Customs duties which Russia maintains, and has been raising again and again of late years, have seriously injured the foreign commerce of Germany; and it is earnestly desired by German merchants that some kind of commercial treaty should be concluded between the two Empires. Not impossibly M. de Giers may have consented to make to Germany some concessions on this point in return for the countenance of Prince Bismarck in raising a foreign loan. But intending subscribers would do well to recollect that nothing is known of the nature or permanence of the new understanding between Germany and Russia. Germany is allied to Austria as well as to Russia; and, as far as one can judge, the alliance of Austria is much more valuable to her than that of Russia; but the aims of Austria and Russia in the Balkan Peninsula are antagonistic, and at any moment a situation may arise in which Germany may be forced to side with one against the other. Even if the strong will of Prince Bismarck postpones the danger, it is not to be forgotten that the German Emperor is very old, and that his successor may not inherit his friendly feeling towards the Imperial house of Russia, and may not have as strong a desire to support a brother sovereign against revolution. In any case, though the reconciliation between Germany and Russia for the present removes the danger of a war between the two, and so far improves the financial position of Russia, the internal condition of Russia itself remains as desperate as it was before. The Nihilists are still active, and though they appear unable to raise a formidable revolt, they succeed in keeping the public mind in perpetual alarm, and if they can win a considerable portion of the army, there is no knowing what may happen.

Certainly the prospect in Russia to-day is at least as dark as was that of France a hundred years ago on the eve of the Great Revolution. In any event, however long peace may be maintained in Europe, and however successful the Russian Government may be in keeping down the Nihilists, Englishmen ought not to assist in supplying Russia with funds which, in all human probability, will be used against English interests. If Russia ceases to be aggressive in Europe, she will probably for that reason push forward her boundaries with greater eagerness in Asia, and thus will threaten more seriously every day our own position in India.

Between the close of the Crimean War and the outbreak of the Russo-Turkish War there was apparently a great improvement in the economic condition of Russia. This was due, in the first place, to the emancipation of the serfs. The emancipation was carried out on an unsound principle, and the terms on which the serfs were compelled to redeem their lands have proved to be entirely too onerous. But the first result of the emancipation was to stimulate the industry of the peasantry throughout the Empire, and therefore to increase prosperity. Unfortunately, the peasants have fallen of late more and more into distress. A combination of circumstances has checked the growth of well-being in Russia, and has added to the burdens on the peasantry to such an extent that they are unable to pay the annuities due from them for the redemption of their lands. The purchase-money of the lands was advanced by the Government to the peasantry, the peasantry being bound to repay the advances by annual instalments. How great their financial embarrassments are is proved by the last Report of the Comptroller of the Empire, which shows that the peasantry have been falling more and more into arrear every year with the payment of these annuities. Although the Government has forgiven a portion of the arrears and has reduced the amount of the annuities, it appears from that Report that the arrears were only 40 per cent. of the annuities in 1879; in 1880 they rose to 45¾ per cent.; in 1881 they were as much as 52½ per cent.; and in 1882, the last year for which we have the figures, they had risen to 62·1 per cent. In other words, in 1882 the peasants were able to pay little more than one-third of the annuities to which they were legally bound. It would be difficult to find figures that more conclusively prove how bad is the present economic condition of Russia. The difficulties of the peasants originated, as we have said, first in the fact that the terms of purchase were too onerous; but they have been aggravated partly by a succession of bad harvests, partly by the enormous sacrifices imposed upon them by the Russo-Turkish War, and partly by the increasing competition of other countries in the wheat markets of the world. The Russo-Turkish War, by alarming the public opinion of Europe and by seriously lessening the credit of Russia, disabled that country, as we have already observed, from borrowing abroad. In consequence the Government had to raise practically the whole cost of the war at home. In so doing it drained the Empire of its accumulated capital; it competed too fiercely with merchants and manufacturers for the money needed by them to carry on their commercial operations, and it added so enormously to the debt that it had to increase the burden of taxation beyond the capacity of the taxpayers. Moreover, the war obliged the Government to withdraw vast masses of men from productive employment and to send them abroad. The peasants, already embarrassed, thus withdrawn from their fields, found on their return that their affairs had fallen into hopeless confusion, and instead of recovering, as already shown, they have been falling more and more hopelessly into distress. Another circumstance that has told most adversely against Russia is the competition of the United States, India, and Australia in the wheat markets of Western Europe. Formerly Russia supplied Western Europe with the greater part of the wheat it bought from other countries. For some time past, however, the United States have taken the place of Russia, and now the competition of India and Australia is becoming so severe that the price of wheat is forced down so low as scarcely to pay the Russian grower. Russia thus is deprived of a great amount of the wealth she used to receive for her crops, and at the same time the Russian seaports have lost the large outlay attendant upon numbers of ships lying in the harbours. Another circumstance that has been potent in augmenting the distress of Russia is the refusal of Western Europe to lend. Before the Russo-Turkish war, Russia was constantly raising immense loans which she spent to some extent, no doubt, in augmenting her armaments and extending her frontiers; but largely in constructing railways, founding manufactures and establishing banks. While Western Europe was pouring all this wealth into the country enterprise of every kind was stimulated, wages were raised, and a deceptive prosperity was produced. As soon, however, as the influx of borrowed capital ceased, the false prosperity died out, and then Russia had, somehow or other, to raise out of her own resources the money for paying the interest upon the loans.

The result of all this is the anarchy which is known under the name of Nihilism, general distress amongst the peasantry, and collapse in manufactures and trade. Politically and economically the condition of the Empire is as bad as it can be. Year after year the expenditure is growing, but the revenue does not grow in proportion, and in consequence every year ends with an enormous deficit. In 1873 the total expenditure of Russia but slightly exceeded 539 million roubles; in 1882 it exceeded 701¼ million roubles, an increase of 162¼ million roubles, or about 30 per cent. But the increase is almost entirely in the non-productive branches. In the administration of justice, in the maintenance of roads, in the outlay upon public instruction, and in the Home Ministry, the growth of the outlay is quite trifling—it is in the debt, the army and the navy, that almost the entire increase is. In 1873 the annual charge of the debt but slightly exceeded 100¼ million roubles; in 1882 it exceeded 200½ million roubles. In the ten years, therefore, the charge for the debt had nearly doubled, and it is growing at an alarming rate. Every year there are internal loans and external loans, while the floating debt is believed to be of unmanageable magnitude. Now there is to be another loan of fifteen millions sterling, involving an additional charge of about three-quarters of a million, and probably before the end of the year there will be more borrowing. The growth of the debt to some small extent is due to the construction of railways; but it is mainly a consequence of the Russo-Turkish war and of the reorganization of the army, which has resulted from the desire to pursue an aggressive policy in all directions, and present a front equal to both Germany and Austria. The increase in the charge of the debt, indeed, was quite trifling up to 1877. In that year the charge barely exceeded 115 million roubles; between then and 1882 85½ million roubles were added to the charge by the Russo-Turkish war, and, as we have said, the charge is rapidly growing. In addition to the enormous military expenditure shown in the growth of the debt, the ordinary outlay on the army grew in the ten years about 20 per cent., and the outlay on the navy about as much more. The Russian Government thus is pauperizing its peasantry, checking all enterprise, and cutting off nearly all commercial communication with the rest of the world, for the sake of keeping up enormous armaments; and at the same time it is starving the entire internal administration of the country, and leaving a people who are but little above barbarism in the depths of ignorance. The whole of the Imperial outlay upon public instruction of every kind in 1882 barely amounted to 1,800,000*l.* As a natural consequence of this extravagance and maladministration the revenue is practically stationary. In 1874 the personal and land taxes yielded somewhat over 120 million roubles; in 1882 they yielded less than 113 million roubles, being a falling off of more than 7 million roubles, and there is no important growth in any branch of revenue except in the drink duties and customs. The drink duties increased from somewhat under 179½ million roubles to somewhat over 201¾ million roubles. The Customs duties also increased from somewhat over 55½ million roubles to somewhat under 94½ million roubles. It is to be recollected, however, that in 1877 the Customs duties previously payable in paper and silver were ordered to be paid in gold, being practically an increase of about 15 per cent. at a stroke, while there was also a surtax imposed of 10 per cent. In 1880, again, there was a considerable increase made to the Customs duties. The growth of these duties, therefore, is not the result of the growth of the trade of Russia, but of an enormous addition to the rate of taxation. Hence it appears that the duties have practically remained stationary for some years. They exceeded 93 million roubles in 1870, and in 1882, notwithstanding the additions made, they yielded less than 94½ million roubles. Again, the drink duties have been raised in the ten years about 40 per cent., with the result that, whereas in 1872 duty was paid upon 83,875,000 gallons of spirits, in 1882 it was paid upon only 76,313,000 gallons. The consumption, therefore, has fallen off very greatly, and the revenue is kept up solely by the heaviness of the tax. It would seem, therefore, that Russia has now reached her utmost limit of taxation; and yet, while there is no hope of increasing her revenue, her expenditure is annually increasing at a very rapid rate, while every year ends with a large deficit which is swelling the already unmanageable floating debt.

MR. CARL ROSA'S OPERA.

THE opera at Drury Lane under the direction of Mr. Carl Rosa merits the support which it receives. Nothing slipshod or careless is to be found in any detail of the performances. There is a solid foundation for success in a really excellent orchestra, directed and always governed by either M. Randegger or M. Goossens, and a chorus as good as any that has been heard at a London opera-house for many years past. Mr. Rosa's choice of operas is singularly catholic, and he casts them well. The Bohemian Girl and Maritana have been heard with Mr. Maas as Thaddeus and Don Cæsar. He sings the familiar melodies purely and sweetly, and is capitally qualified for such work as this; indeed in this way Mr. Maas—always as vocalist, for as actor he is crude and heavy—has no superior. He has been heard to great advantage also as Edgardo in Lucia, and in each case Madame Georgina Burns shared the tenor's success. Why an English lady should be called "Madame" because she is a vocalist, when she would of course be merely "Mrs." if she were not a vocalist, is a mystery into which we need not penetrate. We quote the published casts of operas given. Carmen and Mignon have also been performed. The picturesqueness, power, and beauty of Bizet's work have taken a strong hold of audiences. Mme. Marie Rose throughout gives vitality and distinction to the part of Carmen, and sometimes, notably in the third and fourth acts, rises to remarkable passion. Mr. Barton McGuckin as Don José showed that he is making decided progress as an actor. The same part has been creditably filled by Mr. Davies. Mr. Leslie Crotty has been known for some time as an excellent actor and singer. On a later occasion Mr. Ludwig gave the part of Escamillo very well in all respects. The new arrangement of the stage in the last is striking and imaginative; Mr. Harris's stage management is beyond all praise; and, take it all round, the performance of Carmen by the Carl Rosa Company is the best that has been seen in London. Novelty is added to the last act of Carmen at Drury Lane by the very truthful introduction of the preliminaries of a bull-fight. In this opera Mr. Barton McGuckin showed, as Don José, that his education as an actor is making progress. He is a singer and has a voice, and the same may be said of the baritone, Mr. Leslie Crotty, who, however, is the more experienced actor. In the representation of Mignon Miss Clara Perry sang correctly, and indicated the lines of the character with some address. The two English operas which Mr. Rosa produced last year, the Colomba of Mr. Mackenzie and the Esmeralda of Mr. Goring Thomas, have both been given. The former was found to be heavy and scholastic when first produced in London, and the provinces have returned the same verdict. Esmeralda, on the other hand, has been received throughout Mr. Rosa's tour with the admiration which it excited at Drury Lane. Both works have been played in Germany, where audiences at large have unanimously welcomed Mr. Goring Thomas's opera, and a section of audiences have accepted Mr. Mackenzie as a disciple of the German school. In Italy, the house of Ricordi, the musical publishers who do much to make or mar operas, and would naturally rather make them for the profit which successes bring, have purchased Esmeralda, but declined to print Colomba. These things being so, it is passing strange that Mr. Gye should have chosen Colomba for production during the Italian season. If he desired to play an opera by an English composer, why not a popular one instead of an unpopular one, both being equally available? Esmeralda was heard on Tuesday with keen attention and genuine pleasure by an audience evidently familiar with Mr. Goring Thomas's work. The composer has been sparing of airs or ballads which do not aid the progress and development of the story. The "Swallow Song," given with sensibility by Miss Burns, the Esmeralda of the evening, is worthy to be named with the beautiful "Swallow Duet" of Mignon. Mr. Barton McGuckin, as Phœbus, was induced to repeat the tenor song, "O vision entrancing," which nevertheless he did not sing with his accustomed fluency. The music which falls to Phœbus is notably expressive throughout its varied sentiments, of carelessness and affected sincerity to Fleur de Lys, and of growing earnestness in his relations with Esmeralda, till a depth of fervour is reached in his final duet with the girl in the third act. The uncontrollable fierceness of Claude Frollo's passion as signified in his music is forcibly brought out by Mr. Ludwig, a fine singer with true dramatic instincts. For the sake of contrast to the Frollo, in all probability, Mr. Goring Thomas has made his Quasimodo rather tame, but some of the most melodious music in the opera falls to Quasimodo, who is represented as admirably as on former occasions by Mr. Leslie Crotty, and this music could scarcely have been better given. Mr. B. Davies is an excellent Gringoire and Mr. Snazelle a capital Clopin. The cast, it will be seen, is in no way altered from the original so far; but Miss Bensberg replaces Miss Perry as Fleur de Lys. Her duet with Chevreuse, in place of the song first given, is not remarkable; but the new ballet movement is charming, and the new finale to the last act has great merit. It is to be regretted that Mr. Rosa's short season should clash with the season at the Royal Italian Opera.

REVIEWS.

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.*

"I FEEL that I am to be a man of war against all parties, that I may be a peacemaker between all men." In these words, written to Miss Hare in 1849, shortly before her marriage to him, Maurice describes the character of his own life. It was devoted to a noble struggle to reach an unattainable end by inappropriate means. Like every man possessed as he was "with the strong sense of a vocation to be a Church reformer," he stirred up strife against himself, yet never was there a reformer with less definite aims, or a "man of war" with more loving heart or humbler spirit. In the volumes before us Colonel Maurice may be said to have compiled an autobiography of his father, for they mainly consist of a collection of his letters. As both Maurice and his friends often, and indeed not without cause, complained that he was misrepresented, it is satisfactory to have his own account of himself and of his work. At the same time the use of letters to express the progress of events becomes somewhat tedious, unless they are the work of a master-hand, and Maurice had no great skill in this respect. His letters savour of the pulpit in style as well as, in many cases, in matter, and however deeply the reader may be interested in their subjects, he will sometimes long for a little more brightness. Nearly all of them are written in the same strain; for, wide as Maurice's experience of life was, his mind was one-sided. He looked at all things as a theologian. Writing to a favourite pupil, he bids him never to read Burke without steadying his mind by the study of the Epistles and the Apocalypse. Theology was to him "the scientia scientiarum, whose business it was to assign to all other sciences their proper place." It moulded his political ideas. Starting from an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God, he held kingship to be a divine institution, and "the sovereignty of the people in any sense or form the silliest and most blasphemous of all contradictions." This intensely theological mind was to no small extent the fruit of his bringing-up. He was the son of a Unitarian minister, and, as his mother and sisters left the father's religion, theological questions were brought before his mind in early life. The members of the Maurice family were in the habit of writing letters to one another while living under the same roof, and the reserve they maintained on religious subjects probably led him to ponder them more than if he had heard them freely discussed. He must have been a strangely precocious child; for we are told that he took delight in Neal's History of the Puritans, and that when ten years old he wrote a report of a British School Society's meeting to one of his sisters, full of such sentences as, "He then lamented that, while Bristol held such a distinguished rank in its benevolence and extensive usefulness, it should be disgraced by such bigotry that a Churchman would not unite with a Dissenter." After this, it is not surprising to find that before he was fifteen, he and another boy of the same age signed a pledge of their own composition that in after life they would "promote the good of mankind." A boyhood of this sort naturally produced a man unable to attach himself to any party, and conscious of a mission as a reformer. Although he never was a Unitarian, he did not choose when at Cambridge to declare himself a member of the Church of England, and therefore left the University without taking a degree. For a short time he devoted himself to journalism, and became editor of the Athenæum. The circulation of the paper declined under his management; and, after a time of mental depression, he decided on joining the Church, and began to contemplate taking orders. He chose to complete his University career at Oxford rather than Cambridge, believing that a dose of "barren orthodoxy" would check his tendency to incoherent speculations. He took his degree in 1832, and was ordained two years afterwards.

Although the Oxford High Church movement had small attractions for Maurice, he lent his aid to the leaders of the party in resisting the Bill to abolish the subscription to the Articles required at the Universities. In his pamphlet Subscription no Bondage he argued that the subscription on matriculation at Oxford was "not a test, but a declaration" of the terms of the University's teaching, a characteristic theory of which he repented in after days. A curious illustration of the Oxford of fifty years ago is presented by the attempt to elect Maurice to the Professorship of Political Economy in order to secure his polemical services, and by his readiness to accept the office, while at the same time he wrote:—"I shall of course endeavour to master the details of the subject—with its principles, alas! I am not acquainted, for I cannot call the notions which I find in the books about it by that august name." His temporary co-operation with the High Church party was brought to an end by the publication of his Letters to a Quaker, in one of which he combated the views set forth in Dr. Pusey's Tract on Baptism. His appointment to the chaplaincy of Guy's Hospital, in 1836, gave him leisure for literary work, and he now definitely took a position apart from all the various Church parties. Holding strongly the catholicity of the Church, he made Baptism the sign and assurance of each man's place in the family of God. While he considered the Church of England as "merely one branch of the true Church," he rejoiced in her Articles and formularies as safeguards against the tyranny of opinion. He claimed for the Church—in this case, as it seems, using the term as equivalent to the clergy—the right to educate the nation, but differed from Mr. (Archdeacon) Denison in accepting the compromise of 1840. He detested whatever was distinctive in religious parties. Protestantism and Popery he declared to be alike un-Catholic, allowing Protestantism to be predicable of the nation, not of the Church of England. High Churchmen seemed to him to narrow the bounds of the Church. He disliked the artificial and feeble theology of the Evangelicals, and considered that they made a fundamental error in basing their system on man's sinfulness. Nor, resting as he did all his hopes for human culture and for the reconciliation of opposing schools on theology, had he any sympathy with the anti-theological spirit of the party since called Broad Church. Standing thus aloof, he was made the object of attack by the religious press and, above all, by the Record. Few parts of this book are more important as regards the Church history of our time than those describing the influence once exercised by the Record in the religious world, and the collapse of its "tyranny," which Colonel Maurice dates from the defeat it sustained in the institution of his father to the chaplaincy of St. Peter's, Vere Street, in 1860.

If Maurice made enemies by the expression of his opinions, no one ever exercised a deeper influence on those who knew him personally. His sympathy with his fellow-men, his passionate scorn of intolerance and wrong, his earnest faith and his exalted spirit, which now and again burst through the natural nervousness of his disposition with a torrent of eloquent words, endeared him not merely to his private friends, but to all who were brought into close connexion with him. And the number of these was large; for, as a professor at King's College and as chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, he never spared himself when he thought he might help others. Nor was he content with the opportunities for usefulness afforded by these offices. Queen's College in part, and the Working Men's College wholly, owe their foundation to his unselfish labours. In the same spirit he strove to guide the discontent prevailing among the London workmen in 1848-50 to a desire for religious brotherhood. Arriving, by a confusion of ideas not unusual with him, at the conclusion that "the Church is communistic in principle," he joined C. Kingsley, T. Hughes, and Ludlow in "the Christian Socialist" movement, and took an active part in showing the need for a change in the laws respecting co-operative trading and in the promotion of Trade-Unions, as well as in fostering some abortive attempts to carry into practice schemes of associated labour. His connexion with men far more violent than himself, and his lack of caution both in writing and speaking, caused a considerable outcry against him, and brought him into some trouble with the Council of King's College. His dismissal from the College, however, was caused by the publication of his Theological Essays. Adopting in this work the divine definition of eternal life as the knowledge of God, he argued that the assertion that eternal death was a state of endless torment rather than of ignorance of God, from which the sinner might hereafter be delivered on repentance, was not grounded on Scripture. The whole story of the angry clamour of the religious newspapers, of the fears of the Council and the Principal lest the interests of the College should suffer, and of the manly bearing of the Professor, is told in a series of unusually interesting letters, and what is wanting in them is supplied by Colonel Maurice in a singularly temperate spirit. Maurice's next great conflict was with Professor Mansel, and is connected with a question of to-day. Believing eternal life to be nothing else than the knowledge of God, he found his whole theology attacked by the famous Bampton Lectures, and in spite of the advice of some of his friends, wrote boldly against the assertions they maintained. It is not long since almost every orthodox clergyman was zealous, not indeed always according to knowledge, in praise of Mansel. Now, as Colonel Maurice points out, the step further than Mansel has been taken, and the advocates of Agnosticism exhibit what they declare to be the logical conclusion from the doctrines preached by the former champion of orthodoxy. There was little in common between the two opponents. Maurice failed to recognize that the wit of the Oxford common-rooms was a man of no less earnestness than himself, while the logical mind of Mansel was impatient of the vagueness of his adversary's ideas, and the dispute began with some bitterness on both sides. At last after so much obloquy and so many labours, the hard measure dealt to Maurice at King's College was made up to him by his election to the chair of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, and the last years of his life were spent happily in the discharge of the duties of a Professorship at the University which he had been constrained to leave without a degree. While pointing out how constantly his father's ideas were misrepresented by his opponents, Colonel Maurice allows that there were causes which made him hard to be understood, and has described them with the fairness and good taste conspicuous throughout his work. No more satisfactory comment on Maurice's writings and no clearer picture of his mind can be imagined than this biography in letters, and whatever opinion may be formed of his wisdom, and in whatever light his theological speculations may be regarded, it is impossible to read these volumes without recognizing that they contain the record of an unselfish life, the life of "a man that is dear to God."

FIVE NOVELS.*

THE Dailys of Sodden Fen have nothing to do with newspapers. They are a family which has had losses, and has come down from possessing much landed estate got by draining in the seventeenth century to the status of tilers in the nineteenth. The Daily of the period is, however, by no means a sagacious tiler; on the contrary, he is rather more than half mad. His ancestor, the draining Daily, perished, it seems, in a somewhat unintelligible popular riot, and bequeathed his interest to the community who had rabbled him. But the community did not get it; on the contrary, it passed into the hands of a farmer of the uncommon name of Smith. How it was restored to the original intention is the theme of the story which the clever author of Four Crotchets to a Bar has here told. We say the clever author, and we mean it, but unluckily cleverness is not everything in novel-writing—as, for the matter of that, it is not everything in other matters. You must have cleverness plus common sense, and it is a too notorious and too lamentable fact, that one of the hardest things in nature is to get these married. There appears to have been some doubtless just cause or impediment to that marriage in the case of the author of Four Crotchets to a Bar. However, these are reflections which should perhaps be left to the reader to draw. He will, at least, in the case of The Dailys of Sodden Fen, not have that initial difficulty in the way of drawing them which ensues from the fact of the book being unreadable. It is quite readable; and, generally speaking, it is readable with much pleasure and amusement, despite a certain flavour of excentricité voulue. The hallucinations of Daily père and the heroism of Daily fils would be more interesting if they were not apparently connected with some extremely hazy politico-economical views of the author's; and the consummation which makes the author quite happy will probably not so much please the too-experienced reader. Sodden Fen having been restored to the commune of Slumsby, the results, according to history, are quite clear, and not at all cheerful or encouraging. But that may pass. Neither does the reader (speaking representatively) feel much interest in Miss Jessie Apers or Mrs. Jessie Smith, who brings this result about by marrying a ne'er-do-weel and divesting herself of his inheritance. But that part of the book's underplot which treats of the successive loves of Aurea Chapel with one Leopold Stuckley; then with George Apers, the parson; and, lastly, with an agreeable baronet, Sir Crowsby Welland, is very cleverly done, and, though still somewhat unnecessarily eccentric, generally commendable. But why does the author describe Stuckley as "a vulgar name" in Devonshire, of all places in the world? It is true that the Stukeleys usually spelt themselves in this latter fashion till they took up with Stucley. But the name itself is about as vulgar in Devonshire as Kemp or Berney is in East Anglia, with which district the author is probably better acquainted than he or she is with the West-country.

Miss James is a bold person. She is not bold in that she has made her novel turn on very much the same general story as that which ends "And you shall still be Lady Clare"; but in the details which precede the catastrophe. A sister—a wicked, if not cruel, sister she—attempts to pass her sister off as male heir of entail, the fraud being facilitated by the fact that the epicene Claud Aylmer has been brought up abroad, and does not return to England till the eve of his or her coming of age. Now, to speak moderately and delicately, there are considerable difficulties in the way of this kind of personation. A great philosopher now dead did indeed once speak of "the merely accidental difference of sex"; but the majority of human kind who are not philosophers think otherwise, and it must be owned that in this special case the precedents of Achilles, Pope Joan, and various other personages of repute are on the side of the majority. No awkward accident, however, betrays Claud Aylmer, but only her own good feeling and determination not to be a party to fraud. She is rewarded in the fashion at which we have not obscurely hinted, but only after proper revolutions and discoveries. The fact is that, notwithstanding the decidedly risky character of the earlier part of its plot, The Heir of Aylmer's Court is very far from being a bad novel. There is some unnecessary line writing in it, for which the patient and much-tried reader becomes prepared when it is evident that the greater part of the second and third volumes are to be passed in Italy. "Italia, oh Italia, would thou wert" anywhere else, is the too-frequent prayer of the said patient person. But the book has redeeming points. The tragic and fraudulent Judith who devises the extremely perilous scheme already indicated is not good for much; but there are some very nice minor characters, especially an old lady who speculates on the probability of somebody being a Roman Catholic or an Agnostic, "or both! How terrible if he were both!" The comic heroine, Sally Brand, is also not at all bad. Even Claud is rather agreeable, though we cannot believe that she really "lay prone on the terrace with the bats wheeling and flitting round her fallen head and the lizards venturing to scurry lightly over her motionless body.' A lizard, unless of the dimensions of an iguana, is not likely to "scurry over" an obstacle of the size of a full-grown young woman's body, and the bats would have probably brushed her cheeks with those remarkably sharp claws of theirs, and would certainly have hissed in her ears after a fashion which would make the most passion-strung young woman wake up.

It is said that there are some wicked men and women who always look at the end of the third volume of a novel before beginning properly at the beginning of the first. It is to be hoped that nobody will do this with The Pity of It, for it is but too probable that on that day and of this book they will read no more. Mrs. Smith, on the three hundred and fifth page of the third volume, speaks of "that meretricious ipsi dixit 'noblesse oblige,'" and the phrase, however the reader may come across it, carries him off into a boundless field of contemplation and reflection. First of all, an ipsi dixit is in itself a thing to dream of, a thing for which to shed a thousand lives, as some one observes somewhere in a work of fiction. And then, if cold reason suggests that pure ignorance or the carelessness of the printer may be responsible for this lovely false concord, imagination falls back on a "meretricious ipsi dixit." How can an ipsi dixit, supposing that such a thing existed, be meretricious? Shall we hear next of a meretricious nisi prius, or a meretricious ex cathedra? And then, supposing that by great good nature a meaning is found for a meretricious ipsi dixit, the example of this singular phenomenon which Mrs. Smith vouchsafes launches the reader once more forth into a sea of delightful doubt. A person who writes ipsi dixit may possibly think that noblesse oblige means "nobility is obliging," "you ought to be obliged to the nobility," or, in short, anything else. But, even so, it is not easy to bring anything meretricious into it. To tell the truth, this chance phrase, for we came upon it quite by chance, does not altogether mislead the reader as to the book. It has some liveliness, and the adventures of a certain Margaret Elmore, who calls herself and is called "Wiggles," may amuse some people. There are also crimes and mysteries, and plenty of that sort of ware. If the writer had not attempted (probably from feelings to which, in the case of a reader who can see very far into a millstone, the above extraordinary compound of false Latin and false English may give some clue) a great deal of satire on Society, it might have been a book of some merit. But, like most satirists of Society nowadays, it is pretty clear that Mrs. Smith knows nothing, or at any rate has observed nothing, of the Society she satirizes, and is content with the backstairs gossip of certain notorious periodicals for gospel. She also labours (as the meretricious ipse dixit may sufficiently have shown) under the disadvantage of not being able to write English. That is "the pity of it," though perhaps Mrs. Smith did not intend that particular construction to be put on her title. Her heroine, with many drawbacks, has some points about her which show that, if Mrs. Smith could write and would write about what she knows, the result might not be bad.

We remarked of the author of The Heir of Aylmer's Court that she is a bold woman; it may certainly be said, though for a rather different reason, of the author of Julian Trevor that he is a bold man. Indeed, novelists nowadays are not wont to require the admonition which Britomart saw writ everywhere, but rather that which she saw writ only once—that is to say, "Be not too bold." Mr. Tristram's audacity stands in the following of Lord Beaconsfield, a not easily imitable novelist. Not only is he introduced personally, under the name of the Earl of Slitherington, but the whole of the first volume, which tells the fortunes of the hero's father, President of the Local Government Board and conscientious politician, is studied very closely after Lord Beaconsfield's overtures, especially that to Endymion. Perhaps the highest praise that can be given to Mr. Tristram is that, though no one can possibly mistake his model, his imitation of it is in parts by no means an unhappy one. The scene between Lady Trevor and Lord Slitherington, wherein she endeavours, partly by diplomacy and partly by a kind of mild flirtation, to get the placable Minister to reconsider her husband's resignation, is not at all ill done. Neither is the whole conception of Sir George Trevor, a weak man who tries to pose as a strong one, unhappy. But to work out this conception would require a man of greater age and experience than from his book we suppose Mr. Tristram to be. Julian Trevor has the further drawback that, beginning as a rather ambitious and more than rather political novel, it slides during the second volume into an ordinary story of private and not very remarkable life. Mr. Tristram's Oxford sketches are not without liveliness, but there is something in them which suggests that he might not have written them if Mr. Sturgis had not been beforehand with him. A third fault is that he has succumbed to the temptation of introducing some very conventional and second-hand types in the personages of the critic Copperville, the poets Fassett and Paris, and some others. It is a temptation, no doubt—indeed very few but the very elect escape it—but it has to be resisted. Except in a purely imaginative romance or in a historical novel, both belonging to lotteries in which there is one prize to ten thousand blanks, no character ought to be inserted that is not, in French literary slang, vu. Thus, for instance, a really agreeable person in Mr. Tristram's book, one Mark Turner, who is a straightforward young Englishman and nothing more, is vu. He might be better, no doubt, but it is quite clear that Mr. Tristram has seen him, or the traits of which he is made up, and has noted them and inwardly digested them. His Fassetts and his Parises are not much more like the actual fact than Mr. Du Maurier's Maudles and Postlethwaites, and he has less excuse, because Mr. Du Maurier, from the circumstances of the case, was bound to look chiefly at the outside, and entitled to exaggerate it a little. Still there is some merit even here, and the book, taken as a first and a rather ambitious attempt, might very easily have been much worse. The dialogue is often decidedly good, and that is a great thing, while one character, Trevor's tutor, Sidney, is much better than the rest. In any future effort Mr. Tristram should get himself a more definite story (the story of Julian Trevor is, vernacularly speaking, "all over the place"), and stick to characters that he has thoroughly grasped. Then his faculty of conversation-writing ought to stand him in good stead.

The author of The Hidden Picture has, in a sense which the courteous reader will please to believe is quite honourable, bribed us. It is not by putting on his or her title-page (for Carrick is a district of Ayrshire, and also in the French language a kind of garment, and in neither sense can it have any exclusive gender as applied to a human being) the words, "There are more things in heaven and earth than our philosophy dreams of." That is a misquotation, and we do not like misquotations at all. Nor is it by informing us that a face "can only be described as wonderfully beautiful," for we love not italics. Nor is it by writing sentences which by no means infrequently extend to the length of half a page, for that is not according to knowledge. But to have at this time of day a novel which contains galleries with secret openings behind the pictures, and white monkish figures with cowls thrown back and glittering daggers in their hands, and dungeons with trapdoors and coils of rope and underground passages, and all sorts of delightful things of the same kind, is too agreeable to leave the critic in the full possession of his ordinary bloodthirstiness. The particular curse (it is needless to say that there is a curse, or the book would not be complete) seems to us, however, rather unreasonable. No daughter of the Castellano family, it seems, can dare, without terrible things happening, to read a letter between sunset and dawn. This might have been all very well in the days when regular post-offices were not; but it clearly will not stand the altered conditions of an advanced civilization. Why, in London at any rate, the last post at night is usually more interesting than any, save the first in the day! However, the scene of The Hidden Picture is not London, but Naples, and the times are the times of Napoleon I., not of Mr. Fawcett. Allowance must be made for this, and also for the exigencies of cloak-and-dagger romances, of which, with the little drawbacks gently hinted at above, The Hidden Picture is a fair enough specimen. It would be altogether contrary to the rules of the game to protest against bloodshed in such a book; but surely it is not necessary to kill your heroine? The heroines used to get through all the daggers and dungeons and curses and unwholesome vaults in the most surprising but satisfactory manner. Now Mr. Carrick Brodie's heroine does not, and as she is really a very nice heroine in other ways than being "wonderfully beautiful" in italics, we weep for her, and refuse to be comforted or to forgive Mr. Carrick Brodie.

(Second Notice.)

WE promised to give some specimens in detail of the New Dictionary's method. The difficulty is to know where to begin. Not at the beginning; for the various duties done in modern English by the monosyllable a—letter, symbol, numeral, pronoun, or particle—cover four pages so full of matter that if we began to discuss them we should have no room for anything else. Let us pause on Abate, a verb of many senses. A chain of instances, from Maundevile to a modern Act of Parliament, shows how the transitive sense "to beat down" has become obsolete except in law. Then the legal meaning of "abating" a nuisance (which, by the way, is ignored in Richardson) is separately worked out. (If we mention Richardson now and again by way of a foil, it is not that we ignore the intermediate steps of improvement in this and that direction; least of all such excellent clearing of the way in etymology as has been done by Professor Skeat and others. But Richardson, with all its faults, is the only serious attempt since Johnson at a literary as distinguished from a purely grammatical or etymological dictionary.) Then the more general literary uses, current or obsolete, are carefully discriminated; then, passing over obscure technical uses of the word in falconry and horsemanship, we come to the other legal "abate," which is the Old French enbatre or embatre, not abatre, meaning to intrude. But for the conclusive evidence of Britton's French text, it would be easy to go astray over this by thinking it had to do with abating, in the sense of injuriously affecting, the estate of the rightful owner intruded upon.

Before we light on another considerable title, here is a grotesque word that has had its day of a couple of centuries and passed out of use as the thing signified passed out of knowledge in England:—"Abbey-lubber: a lazy monk; a reproachful name in regular use after the Reformation." Under Abbot we see that the variant form Abbat (a twelfth-century Latinism) is treated as obsolete. Our impression, though we have no proof at hand, is that sundry modern ecclesiastical writers have revived it in the last thirty or forty years. In this region two words come pretty close together which are good examples of false etymology affecting the orthography of a word, in one case for a considerable time, in the other permanently, and in both cases affecting the meaning and usage. These are "abnormal" and "abominable." Probably most of us who think at all on such matters would think "abnormal" to represent the Latin abnormis. But it does not; we have already the regular form "abnormous" (like "enormous" from enormis) which, though not common, is used by Hallam and Grote. And "abnormal" is really a distorted "doublet" of "anomalous"; the mediæval Latin anomalus (Gr. ἀνώμαλος) was corrupted into anormalus, whence a French and English anormal: later the b was interpolated in English through a mistaken reference to abnormis, and is fixed in the modern spelling. Again, we now write "abominable," but our forefathers down to the seventeenth century wrote "abhominable," misled by a fanciful derivation, as if it meant something ab homine, foreign or repugnant to man, inhuman. In Shakspeare's time the dropping of the h was just beginning to attract notice as a pedantic innovation. Not far off is "ache," with a still odder history. Properly the verb is "ake," the noun "ache," with soft ch; similar pairs are bake, batch, make, match, speak, speech. Dr. Johnson perversely declared "ache" the grammatical spelling of both, connecting them with Gr. ἄχος. Hence we have lost the distinction, and encumbered ourselves with an idle discrepance between the written and spoken word, writing "ache" while we say "ake" in verb and substantive alike.

The word "act" and its derivatives will be found very good reading. It is curious to learn that the forensic sense of "action" is the earliest that occurs in English; the same holds logically of "answer," which in its original meaning is "a solemn affirmation made to rebut a charge" (Dict. s. v.); but historically the common usage (= the later "reply," which is supplanting it, more's the pity, in middle-class language) is as old as Beowulf. Under "act" we think there is one deficiency. The phrase of two or three writers of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, "God is a pure act," is left obscure by explaining the term as "activity, active principle"; what is meant is the actus of the scholastic philosophy (ἐνέργεια) as opposed to potentia (δύναμις). And under another special sense, that of an instrument in writing, the common form "I deliver this as my act and deed" has escaped notice. While we are on law terms we may pass to "agreement" and note that the definition, "a contract duly executed and legally binding on the parties making it," is too narrow. There are plenty of agreements not duly executed, or though duly executed not legally binding, as being, for example, without consideration, or for an unlawful purpose. An agreement is no more necessarily enforceable in English law than pactum in Roman law. We constantly have occasion to speak of an agreement being bad or void. The Indian Contract Act has defined "contract" as an agreement which is enforceable (Lat. contractus, or legitima conventio); but only one or two English writers have adopted this usage. Something like this would have come nearer the current legal sense:—"A promise or set of promises intended to be legally binding; a document embodying such promises." But it may be doubted whether it is really possible to mark any definite line between the legal and the popular meanings of the word. We should have liked a quotation to bring in the old conceit about aggregatio mentium; but no doubt the proper business of a dictionary is with real etymologies.

Compound adjectives of the type Anglo-French, Anglo-Catholic, and so forth, afford an interesting study. In all the examples of this formation before the last decade of the eighteenth century the first element qualifies and limits the second. Thus "Anglo-Saxon," as the Dictionary fully explains, does not mean "Angle and Saxon," but Saxon of England as distinguished from Saxon of the German mainland. The proper corresponding Latin is Angli Saxones; though the compound Angul-Saxones, presumably a transcription from the English Angelsaexan, is found in charters. The later misapprehension of "Anglo-Saxon" as if it were "Angle and Saxon" led to the framing, by a practice apparently not more than a generation old, though now common enough, of such phrases as Anglo-Turkish convention, Anglo-French alliance, Anglo-American law, where the two elements of the compound adjective are on an equal footing, and the whole imports reciprocity or community. "Anglo-French," however, is capable of use in the older sense, as "French of England"—namely, the dialect of French "retained and separately developed in England"; and thereby hangs a tale, which may be read in a note (all too short) to the General Explanations prefixed to this part. We have been accustomed to laugh at the patriotism of our Elizabethan lawyers who maintained that the law-French of the Year Books and Abridgments had a claim to exist as a language of itself. But the lawyers were not so far out. In their time the dialect was a decrepit jargon, eked out with wholesale interpolation of Latin and English words; it had been a true dialect nevertheless. Cut off from its native stock, and "distinct not only from Parisian, but from all dialects of Continental French," it underwent in England "a distinct and independent development" in both speaking and writing. The importance of this fact for modern English philology is that down to the fifteenth century the Romance words adopted in English were taken for the most part not from the French of France but from the French of England—Chaucer's "scole of Stratford at-te Bowe," which thus is seen in its true light. The Prioress did not speak bad French, as a modern Englishwoman might; "frensh of Paris was to hire unknowe," not in the sense that she tried to imitate Parisian speech and failed, but that what she spoke was something different. At the same time the passage shows that by Chaucer's time the French of Stratford-at-Bow was felt to be artificial, and was beginning to be ludicrous to men of learning and travel. It had already ceased to be spoken in the law courts. However, modern English spelling constantly preserves "the actual Anglo-French forms, as distinct from those of Continental Old and Modern French." There is evidently much more to be learnt and told about this (we believe the ground is almost new); and we hope that Dr. Murray or some of his chief fellow-workers may one day give us a monograph on it. The Year Books of Edward I. lately printed in the Record Office Series acquire, in this point of view, a fresh interest; the material afforded by them ought to be useful.

The conventional "one word more" is not a happy formula for taking leave or preparing to take leave of a dictionary—for one word necessarily implies a good many words. But, at all events, we may pause on one more word of special interest, "allow." The Old French alouer, later allouer, is really two words rolled into one. It represents the wholly distinct Latin verbs allaudare, "to praise, commend," and allocare, "to bestow, assign." The uses of the double word in these two meanings run so near one another, and have had so much mutual influence, that often it is difficult in a particular case to say whether allouer or "allow," as it may be, stands for allaudare or allocare or a mixture of both. In a well-known line from The Merchant of Venice we read, "The law allows it, and the court awards it." Is this with the meaning allaudat, approves or sanctions, or allocat, assigns as due to you? Dr. Murray gives it as an illustration of the latter sense, we cannot say wrongly. But our own inclination would be to take the former, sacrificing strict grammatical uniformity to avoid a tautology:—"The law allows (sanctions) it (your course of proceeding, or the right claimed by you), and (therefore) the Court awards it (the right of taking the pound of flesh)." This is one of the points which, however the commentators may labour for an impossible certainty, must remain open for every man's private judgment. And the general treatment of the word is a good example of the orderly method which Dr. Murray and his staff are substituting for the chaos of previous dictionary-makers. A few other such examples may be indicated; for clear understanding of what has been done the Dictionary itself must be consulted. For the patient historical and logical discrimination of meanings, take "account," either the substantive or the verb. An Englishman fairly well accustomed to the careful use of language, if asked offhand how many distinct meanings the substantive "account" is capable of, might say perhaps half a dozen. The Dictionary gives five principal heads, comprising sixteen minor ones, and some of these are subdivided again; nor can any of the divisions be fairly called superfluous. For the disentangling of etymology and orthography in the various stages of a word's life, and the careful separation of similar but unconnected words, see "afear," "affray," and "afraid"; a pretty simple instance, but comparison with other dictionaries will show at once how much more thorough the work is here. Or look at "afford," the derivation of which Richardson gives up, clutching however in the air (after Horne Tooke, it seems) at "affeer," a wholly unrelated Romance word. Dr. Murray gives us a complete chain of evidences from the earliest form "gefordian" through the mediæval "aforth," or "avorth," to "aford," and thence to the present "afford," which dates from the Latinizing period of the sixteenth century, by a kind of corrupt following of the Latin prefix in such words as "afflict."

If we must grumble at something, we should say that the literary selection of authorities is capable of improvement. In a great national monument—for such this Dictionary will be—we feel entitled not only to sufficient illustration and authority, but to the best. Under the first sense of "account" (the noun) we miss the clerk of Chatham who "can write and read and cast accompt" (K. Hen. VI. Part II., Act iv., Sc. 2). Better than newspaper warrant could easily be produced for "actuarial value"—a phrase familiar enough in the old Court of Chancery and in its reported judgments, delivered sometimes by judges who were no mean masters of English—and generally we find the quotations from newspapers rather out of due proportion. We can quite understand that gaps have to be filled up by the editorial staff at short notice. But Dr. Murray ought to have (we mean that the Clarendon Press, or the nation, ought to provide him with) a competent reader told off for the special purpose of getting him really good authority for the common words that have been neglected. Of course the rare ones are safe enough. It is the fairly common ones, but short of being so common that Shakspeare, or Addison, or Macaulay will afford them in a few minutes' turning over, that are in peril of this kind. Thus under "agonizing," Gray's "shrieks of an agonizing king" would surely have been better than a poor line from Thomson's "Spring," where, moreover, the sense of the word is less clear. But it is easier to find points for minute criticism in a work like this than to be thankful for it as one ought.

GUN AND ROD IN AMERICA.*

IF life at American centres of business be lived at a higher pressure than in the Old World, if the pursuit of gain be more absorbing, and the nerves be kept thereby at a higher state of tension, the very size of the country, the vast extent of its forests and prairies, afford a ready and never-failing mode of relief. It is yearly becoming more and more the custom for Americans to spend their summer holiday in camping out—i.e. in reverting for a while to the primitive employment of savage man; and, in the self-imposed toils and fatigues of the chase, finding a welcome contrast to the artificial pleasures of civilization. Forty-eight hours' travel from New York or Boston will suffice to land one in the forests of the Adirondacks or among the wild lakes and rivers of Maine, away out beyond the precincts of permanent habitation; and if these resorts become appropriated or too much frequented, a few days' journey will always enable the sportsman to reach the solitudes of the "Rockies" or the still wilder hunting-grounds of the Yellowstone, or of the Sierras of the Pacific Slope. Although of course game-laws, properly so called, have, as a relic of feudalism, never been allowed to exist in America, the good sense of the people has taught them the necessity of enforcing a close time. Most of the States have passed laws for this purpose; while some have even made enactments against trapping birds and animals in winter, when the snow makes it easy to capture them in such numbers as would soon lead to their extinction. The love of sport has of late years developed very rapidly among Americans; clubs have been formed for keeping up shooting and fishing quarters in favourable localities, and the wholesome rivalry of these associations assists materially in enforcing the execution of the laws relating to close time. Americans have had one great advantage in learning the science of woodcraft; they have been able to call to their aid the services of the native Indians, a race whose necessities have developed an instinct for the tracking of animals which amounts almost to a sixth sense. From the time of Fenimore Cooper downwards the interest of any book relating to life in the prairies or backwoods has always centred in the matchless skill of the Indian scouts, trappers, or guides. It is some comfort to reflect that the extirpation of the red man may be arrested by the necessity which his white brothers lie under for these services, owing to the impossibility of a highly civilized race acquiring for itself these inherited instincts and capabilities. Any one wishing either to learn in his own armchair the haunts and habits of all sorts of American game—fur, fin, and feather—or even to know where to go and look for it himself, cannot do better than consult the two sumptuous volumes before us. They are got up with the highest technical skill as regards paper, printing, and illustrations. The latter especially are deserving of praise. Eleven proofs on tinted Japanese paper, loosely gummed in only at the edges, are each of them worthy of a place in a portfolio as specimens of the engraver's art; two are engraved direct from nature. Any one who doubts the superior excellence of a proof may satisfy himself by comparing the vignette "Head of Mule Deer" on the title-page of vol. i. with the same subject as an ordinary engraving on p. 259. In addition to these proofs and about thirty full-page engravings, the volumes are thickly interspersed with illustrations by various artists in a style with which we are now becoming familiar in American books and periodicals, and in which they were certainly far ahead of us. The contents of the two volumes are, for the most part, not original; neither are they by one hand. The compiler, Mr. Alfred M. Mayer, Professor in the Stevens Institute of Technology at New York, suggested to the editor of the Century Magazine that the various articles on hunting and angling which had appeared in that periodical should be collected into a book. The editor, in adopting the suggestion, happily placed its execution in Mr. Mayer's hands, and the latter has made the subject complete by embodying Lord Dunraven's paper on Moose-Hunting, originally published in the Nineteenth Century, as well as half a dozen articles which had previously appeared in various American periodicals.

Mr. Mayer opens his subject by an account of the Prehistoric Hunter, with illustrations of the weapons made from flint, bone, and bronze, with which they did not hesitate to attack the fiercest animals. With the exception of the crossbow, which they do not appear to have used, Mr. Mayer is of opinion that their arms were as effective as any which preceded the use of gunpowder. The work falls naturally into three divisions:—Large Game, Fish, and Feathered Game. Among large game the first place is assigned to the Black Bear of the Eastern States, the much more dangerous "Grizzly" of the Rocky Mountains and Pacific slope being, somewhat unaccountably, left unnoticed. The principal resorts of the Black Bear at the present day are the great forests of Maine and New Brunswick, and the cane-brakes of the Lower Mississippi. Two interesting chapters by Mr. Charles C. Ward and Mr. James Gordon, each illustrated by sketches made by respective authors, describe the very different country and circumstances in which the bear is found in the extreme north and south of the Union; while towards the end of the book Mr. Dudley Warner contributes a humorous account entitled "How I Killed a Bear." Englishmen will not complain that a prominent position is assigned to fox-hunting. In Virginia the fox is still sometimes pursued in the orthodox English fashion with horse and hound, though even there the nature of the country has kept the sport more like what it was in England a hundred years ago. A slow hunting hound, such as was fashionable in the days of Squire Western, is of more use in America to-day than would be the choicest draft from the fast-racing Quorn or Pytchley, which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to follow over the thickly-timbered country and high rail-fences of Virginia. Very different is the pursuit of the fox in New England; there, even when not covered with snow, the country is rock and forest, impracticable for horses; the hunter goes on foot alone or with one companion, and only two or three hounds; armed with a gun loaded with heavy shot, he tramps perhaps many miles before he finds a fox, and then, when his hounds run out of sight, stations himself at some point where his knowledge of the country leads him to suppose that the fox is likely to pass. Many are the alternations of hope and disappointment, as the baying of the hounds, now faint and far off, now swelling nearer and louder, shows him that they are following Reynard through all his wiles and artifices, till at last they bring him within range of the gun. Even should they fail in this, the day is not counted as a blank:—

> The truest sportsman is not a mere skilful butcher, who is quite unsatisfied if he returns from the chase without blood upon his garments, but he who bears home from field and forest something better than game and peltry and the triumph of a slayer, and who counts the day not lost or ill-spent though he can show no trophy of his skill. The beautiful things seen, the ways of birds and beasts noted, are what he treasures far longer than the number of successful shots.

Dr. Grinnell contributes a chapter on the North American Cervidæ, in which he says that the one hope of preserving the grandest of them—the moose—from extinction, lies in the enforcement of proper regulations in the Yellowstone National Park. In Mr. Charles Ward's paper on "Moose-hunting" he gives a curious sketch of a moose "riding down a tree" by getting astride of it and bearing it down by his weight until he can reach the branches. A similar device is well known to be practised by elephants in India. An instructive instance of the way in which organs become specialized for certain functions may be seen in the hoof of the caribou, figured on p. 210. Their construction is different to that of all others of the deer tribe, and enables the animal to travel over deep snow and icy crusts, when moose and other deer are at the mercy of their enemies. Another instance of adaptation is to be found in the feet of the "Big-horn," or mountain sheep of the Sierra. The wide posterior portion of the bottom of the foot, instead of wearing down and becoming flat and hard, bulges out into a soft pad, which grips tight on the smallest protuberances or cavities. Mr. Muir discusses their alleged habit of diving down precipices and alighting on their horns, and comes to the conclusion that such a boulder-like mode of progression is impossible. The most frightful descents are safely accomplished by hugging close to the rock and controlling their velocity by striking at short intervals, and holding back upon small ledges and roughened inclines. The pronghorn or antelope of the central plains and the musk-ox of the Arctic regions complete the list of big game. By the way, why does not the latter animal conform to the rule, nearly universal in those latitudes, of changing his coat to white in winter? Perhaps because from his size and strength he does not require to do so as a means of protection; while, not being carnivorous, he does not, like the polar bear, depend for food on being able to approach unseen.

The part of the book relating to fishing opens with a chapter on the primitive fish-hook, by Mr. Barnett Philippe, secretary of the American Fish Culture Association. The evolution of the fish-hook is traced, with the aid of illustrations, from the almost straight stone fish-gorge of the Neolithic period, similar in principle to the double-ended needle, slung by the middle, which is used in France at the present day for catching eels. The early bronze-worker copied this in metal, with an open curve in the centre to which the line was fastened. At a later period the wire was twisted into a loop in the centre; then the ends were turned upwards, and, barbs being subsequently added, we get the double fish-hook. The salmon, as the king of fishes, has a chapter to himself. The region where, at the present day, they can be taken with a fly is a circumscribed one; it is restricted to the northern shore of the embouchure of the St. Lawrence below Quebec, the coast of Labrador, New Brunswick, and a few streams in Nova Scotia. The salmon in the rivers running into the North Pacific, like those of rivers discharging into the Baltic, refuse to take a fly. Several chapters are devoted to trout-fishing, which is more easily within the reach of most people. Mr. Edward Seymour describes sport on the Rangeley Lakes in Maine, where speckled trout up to 10 lbs. in weight are to be caught, and where several angling associations have their head-quarters. Sea-trout-fishing is to be had by camping out on the affluents of the St. Lawrence, while higher up, among the Thousand Islands, you may stay at a comfortable hotel, and indulge yourself by catching black bass, pickerel, or the monster muskallonge. The grayling has a very limited range within the United States, being only found in Michigan and perhaps in one or two of the remote North-Western States. The American species is much more slender than the European, and has a larger dorsal fin; hence the Esquimaux name for it, which denotes wing-like fin. It must be very different, however, from its European congener, if, as is stated in the work before us, its play is as vigorous as that of the trout. Our grayling gives one or two good kicks or plunges, and then allows itself to be dragged in as tamely as a red herring. A singular kind of fishing is that of casting a baited hook with a rod into heavy surf for striped bass. This is chiefly practised on the rocks and islands of the New England coast. The fisherman, attended by a "chummer" who throws out bait to attract the bass, takes his stand at the end of a plank built out over the waves, which not unfrequently drench him from head to foot. The fish attain a large size—50 lbs. or 60 lbs.—and show great sport. The best resorts are in the hands of different clubs; and the title of "High-hook," with a diamond-mounted badge in the shape of a bass-hook, is conferred on the member taking the largest fish of the season. The details of construction of the split-bamboo rod are well worth perusal. It appears to have been invented in England, but perfected in America. Its lightness, combined with extraordinary elasticity, have brought it into general favour, both for salmon and trout rods.

Little space remains for noticing the part of the book devoted to feathered game. The different American grouse are well known, as also the "Bob-White," or Virginian quail. This latter has been introduced, but with indifferent success, into England. There is a good description of wild-fowl shooting, including geese and cranes, in Minnesota; and a chapter on the famous canvas-back, and the way to cook and eat him. Smaller birds, such as the American woodcock and snipe, and the Carolina rail, each in their proper locality and season, are shown as contributing to the varied "bag" that may be made in the States. At the close of the work will be found a chapter on bow-shooting by Mr. Maurice Thompson, in which he relates how he made himself an expert game shot with the old English long-bow. The terms of sport may be somewhat different in America; they talk of a fox being "holed," instead of gone to ground; of "still-hunting," instead of stalking; of "still-fishing," instead of bottom-fishing. But the whole tone of these volumes proves that our American kinsfolk thoroughly understand the essential qualifications of a true sportsman; while the contents of the work show how keenly they practise them.

MORELLI'S ITALIAN MASTERS IN GERMAN GALLERIES.*

FEW books in the literature of a special subject have created so great a stir on their first appearance as that of which the present volume is a translation. Its accomplished author, the Senator Morelli, holds among his countrymen a somewhat paradoxical position. He is one of the most conservative of politicians, and at the same time one of the most revolutionary of critics. A member of the Right of the Italian Senate, and staunch upholder of tradition in the sphere of society and the State, he devotes his leisure to the subversion of traditions in the sphere of art-criticism, and history. He has long been well known among the practical connoisseurs of Europe, not only as the possessor of one of the choicest private collections of pictures and drawings in Italy, but as one of the first living authorities on Italian art. But his public and literary reputation in connection with these matters is of comparatively recent growth. It dates in the first instance from the publication, some dozen years ago, in the pages of a German special periodical, the Zeitschrift für bildende Kunst, of a series of essays on the pictures in the Borghese gallery at Rome. This was followed after a considerable interval by the issue of the volume of which an English version is now before us. In it, under the guise of a series of technical studies on the Italian pictures in the galleries of Munich, Dresden, and Berlin, Signor Morelli put forth in a concentrated shape the results of his close and life-long study of the works and the characteristics of Italian masters both great and small. By special students, in spite of its unpretending form and title, the book was quickly recognized as a contribution of the first importance to their study; while the peculiar originality and piquancy of its literary flavour commended it before long to a wider circle of readers. By a kind of irony characteristic of his temperament, Signor Morelli chose to treat it as an acknowledged fact that of all persons an Italian must needs be the last to deserve a hearing on questions of Italian art. He at the same time frankly recognized, without any irony at all, the truth that the only country where there exists a considerable public interested in the critical study of these questions is Germany. Possessing among his other accomplishments a complete mastery of German, he accordingly addressed himself to that public in its own language. Under the feigned name of "Ivan Lermolieff" he represented himself as a student and inquirer from the wilds of Russia, whose claim to a hearing, modest at the best, might at least be admitted on account of his Hyperborean origin. The disguise, of course, was not intended to deceive; but it accommodated itself excellently to the vein of half-ironic diffidence, blended with something of conscious authority and much of genuine courtesy, of the author's manner.

* Italian Masters in German Galleries. By Giovanni Morelli. Translated from the German by Mrs. Louise M. Richter. London: George Bell & Sons.

The purport of Signor Morelli's book was, from the nature of the case, to a large extent controversial. One of his objects was to expound and illustrate general methods of study which, without being altogether new, had not in his judgment been strictly enough practised among the critics and connoisseurs of art, and whereby their empiric judgments might attain something of scientific certainty and precision. His other main object was to correct the traditional attributions, and in some cases the traditional estimates also, of a number of particular pictures of various degrees of celebrity and value. In so doing he had naturally to point out errors and omissions in the official catalogues of the galleries under discussion, as well as in the works of previous historians of art, and especially, as the most comprehensive and industrious of such historians, of Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle. To the merits of those laborious authors, as having by their researches been the first to lay the foundations of a modern and critical general history of Italian art, Signor Morelli does abundant justice. On the worst of their faults, their inconceivable literary formlessness, and their frequent and teasing inaccuracy in technical and descriptive details, he is almost uniformly silent. Some of the German objects of his criticism, and especially the compilers of the (now disused) official catalogues of the Munich and Dresden galleries, fared a little more roughly at his hands. But, as a rule, Signor Morelli's manner in controversy is one of imperturbable urbanity and good breeding. Temper, however, is proverbially easy to arouse in most questions of connoisseurship and critical judgment, in which demonstration is rarely possible, and the ultimate decision depends upon the informal agreement of a miscellaneous international jury of students and experts, each of whom is apt to resent as a personal attack on his knowledge and discrimination any opinion differing from his own. Signor Morelli's book, as was natural, excited eager criticism, both friendly and hostile. His admirers proved the stronger party, and a whole school of the younger critics and historians of art have put themselves avowedly under his lead. But by others he has been fiercely assailed, especially in connexion with his views on the early life and work of Raphael. The most serious opposition came from Berlin. Among the experts of that city, learned and justly distinguished as several of them are, there exists a perhaps slightly dictatorial disposition to assume a monopoly of knowledge and acumen in these matters; and, in connexion with Raphael especially, a tendency to accord a dogmatic and quite unwarranted degree of authority to the writings and opinions of a veteran of their own number, Hermann Grimm. Signor Morelli, although, as he avows in the preface to his English edition, "to bickering and strife a declared enemy," has addressed to one or two of his chief censors in Germany replies which, both in temper and substance, are among the masterpieces of controversial criticism. The total result of his literary work during the last four years is that, among living experts in that fascinating study which he has made his own, Signor Morelli, alias Lermolieff, stands to-day easily the first. It is needless to mention that the terms in which his work has been once or twice lately spoken of in England, by critics upon whom both his knowledge and his good breeding have been thrown away, are such as among instructed students can only excite a smile.

From the present translation the peculiar literary form and flavour of Signor Morelli's work are wanting. He comes before the English public, no longer under his Russian pseudonym, but in his own name, and with a preface from which the agreeable irony of the original German version of his work has been withdrawn. The translation of the text by Mrs. L. M. Richter is correct and adequate, failing only in very rare cases from an imperfect acquaintance with English idiom: but as the book is thus presented to English readers, it will be read rather for the sake of its matter than of its form. To read it, if possible in the galleries themselves and before the actual pictures which it discusses, must henceforth be an indispensable part of the education of every lover and student of Italian art. One great merit of Signor Morelli's work is that he expressly disclaims all dogmatic authority for his judgments, and at every turn invites his "young friends" to observe his methods, follow his reasons, and test his conclusions for themselves. In the matter of method there are two points on which Signor Morelli especially insists. One is the paramount importance of an exact comparative study of the drawings and sketches of the Old Masters as an aid to the knowledge of their styles and the discrimination of their handiwork. This is a doctrine which no one would in terms contest; but the fact remains that the study and knowledge of drawings, even among professional connoisseurs and historians of painting, has hitherto been of a very elementary kind. This has been due partly to the reckless system of traditional misattribution, and confusion of genuine drawings with false, and originals with copies, which prevails in the majority both of public galleries and private cabinets; and partly also to the difficulty of comparing the authentic drawings of this or that master when they are scattered in various places. The latter difficulty has now been in great part removed by the publication by Messrs. Braun, of Dornach, and others, of many excellent series of reproductions after the contents of the principal known collections, so that the dispersed examples of any master can in this form be brought together for study. Few parts of Signor Morelli's work are more useful than those in which he directs the student how to take as his standard for the style and idiosyncrasy of this or that master a certain specified selection of his demonstrably authentic drawings, and to test by them all other work attributed to him. It is cordially to be hoped that our author will follow out these indications, as he seems to express an intention of doing, by a detailed and fully illustrated student's guide or introduction, which no one living is so competent to write, to the study of Italian drawings in general.
